The CHAIRMAN said the latter, part certainly, was not in order.

Mr. WISE. Oh! that's the best part of it.

Mr. ARNOLD said he understood it was not in order to move to strike out all after the enacting clause, until the bill had been gone through.

Mr. WISE said this amendment only proposed to insert a substitute for a section, and not for the entire bill.

Great confusion ensued, in the course of which it was understood that Mr. MOORE moved to strike out "six dollars as the per diem of Senators, and insert $7," to make it correspond with other portions of the bill.

The amendment was lost.

Mr. MOORE was then understood to move to strike out the last proviso. The motion was negatives.

Mr. WISE moved to strike out the word "six" wherever it occurred in that section, and insert "four," thereby proposing to reduce the per diem to $4.

Tellers were called for, and ordered on this amendment, and Messrs. COLES and REYNOLDS were appointed; and they reported 56 in the affirmative, and 82 in the negative. The motion was therefore negatived.

Mr. WELLER moved to strike out the word "six," and insert "five," in the clause of the bill, so as to make the pay of members of Congress five dollars a day.

Pending this motion,

Mr. PENDLETON moved that the committee rise: carried—ayes 88, noes 63.

The committee then rose and reported progress.

Mr. T. W. WILLIAMS offered a substitute for bill No. 548; which was ordered to be printed.

After ineffectual efforts on the part of various members to get in resolutions and reports,

On motion of Mr. READ,

The House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, February 15, 1843.

The PRESIDENT pro tem. laid before the Senate a communication from the Post Office Department, transmitting, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of the 7th ult., statements showing in detail the price at present received by the railroad companies for the transportation of the United States mail, the amount paid them, the extent of service, and the price formerly paid for the same service by the old mode of conveyance; which, on motion by Mr. MERRICK, was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

Also, laid before the Senate a communication from the Governor of Iowa, transmitting joint resolutions adopted by the Council and House of Representatives of that Territory, in favor of an appropriation by Congress for the purpose of holding treaties for the purchase of the lands of the Pottawotamie and other tribes of Indians; which, on motion by Mr. LINN, were ordered to lie on the table.

Also, presented the credentials of WILLIAM H. HAYWOOD, Jr. who has been elected by the Legislature of North Carolina a Senator from that State for six years from the 4th of March next; which were read, and ordered to be placed on file.

Mr. TAPPAN presented the proceedings of a public meeting of citizens of the county of Washington, Pennsylvania, in favor of the establishment of a mail-route from the town of Washington, Pennsylvania, to Steubenville, Ohio: referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. SIMMONS presented a petition from James Wilson, porter to watch the public grounds at the Capitol, (commonly called "posey watcher,") representing that he is employed seventeen hours per day, and praying Congress to allow him additional compensation: referred to the Committee on the Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. CONRAD presented a memorial from Reuben Drake and R. G. Quarles, proposing to Congress to enter into a contract with the Government to reclaim public lands now useless to the Government, for the consideration of a portion of the lands which may be reclaimed: referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. BENTON presented a memorial, signed by 48 captains of steamboats navigating the Ohio and Mississippi rivers, representing that the toll now exacted for going through the canal at Louisville, on the Ohio river, is ruinous to trade, and such as the commerce and business on the river could not pay; and representing that there are evils in the construction of the canal which unfit it for the business which is now done on that river; and, for the purpose of ridding the commerce of the ruinous exactions imposed on it for passing through this canal, and affording adequate facilities to the increasing commerce, they pray that a canal may be constructed by the Government, on the Indiana side of the river, of sufficient capacity for the passage of larger boats than those which now ascend the river.

Mr. B. proposed to refer the memorial to the Committee on Roads and Canals.

Mr. WALKER remarked, that the canal spoken of in the memorial was not now adapted to the commerce of the Ohio river, and to the boats which run on the Western rivers; that it was of such capacity as to prevent the construction of a class of boats which were of large dimensions, and of greater speed, and such as were called for by the increasing commerce. If boats of a large class attempted to pass, they were subjected to serious injury by the rocks which were permitted to project from the sides. A boat of which he was some time since on board, in attempting to pass through, was seriously injured. If the locks were considerably enlarged, and the canal cut square down to the bottom, it might be made of sufficient magnitude for all the boats which run there. There, however, seemed no disposition on the part of the company to do this, and to prevent the collection of these onereus tolls. If those difficulties were continued, he would go in for a sufficient grant of the public land in Indiana to that State, on the condition that she will construct a canal adequate for the accommodation of the commerce on those rivers.

Mr. SMITH of Indiana said he was much gratified to hear of the introduction of the petition by the Senator from Missouri. There was no subject, in connexion with the commerce on the Western waters, of more interest than that of the removal of the obstructions in the falls of the Ohio river. He then made some remarks on the great interest which the stockholders of that canal received on their investment, which was about 18 per cent. Commerce, he said, was obstructed to a very great extent; the large class of boats were excluded entirely from the upper river, owing to the unevenness of this canal. It was almost impossible for a single canal to answer the purposes of the increasing ascending and descending commerce on that river; therefore a canal on the other side of the river was demanded. He could not hope that anything would be done at the present session of Congress, in regard to the subject; but he did hope that the Western Senators and Western members would urge this matter until the navigation of the Ohio should be relieved from this obstruction, and commerce from the onerous burden which was imposed upon it by the exactions of the canal company. He believed that when the matter was examined by the committee, it would be found that it was practicable to construct to a canal on the Indiana side of the Ohio, to remove the obstructions to the commerce there.

Mr. TAPPAN did not agree with the other Senators as to their opinions of the best mode of removing the obstacles complained of. It was his opinion that a canal ought not to be made. The obstruction in that river, at the falls, was a ridge of soft limestone running across the navigation of the river. The current would be as smooth above as below, if the Government of the United States would (as it ought to do) improve the navigation at this point, by removing a considerable portion of the ridge, which would do away with the necessity of a canal on the Indiana side. When the matter came up, he would urge an improvement of the navigation at that point.

The memorial was referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals.

Mr. LINN presented a memorial from the Legislature of Missouri, on the subject of improvement of the great swamps in the southeast portion of Missouri, and the northeast portion of Arkansas; which was read, and referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Also, presented a memorial of a committee appointed by citizens of St. Louis, asking Congress to adopt measures for the occupation and settlement of the Territory of Oregon; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Also, presented a petition of citizens of Franklin county, Missouri, praying for the establishment of a mail route from Port William to Little Piney, in Pulaski county, Missouri: referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. HUNTINGTON presented a petition from Elizabeth Raymond, the widow of John Raymond, an officer of the army of the Revolution, for a pension: referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. BATES, from the Committee on Pensions, to which were referred the petition of Samuel Thomas for a pension, and the petition of Sarah Williamson for a pension under the act of July 7, 1838, moved that the committee be discharged from their further consideration, and that they be referred to the War Department, which was competent to grant the prayers of the petitioners: agreed to.

Mr. B. also, from the same committee, reported back, without amendment, and with a recommendation that they be indefinitely postponed, the bills from the House for the relief of Prudence Crouch, and for the relief of David Munn. The reports accompanying were ordered to be printed.

Mr. WRIGHT, from the Committee on Claims, made an adverse report (which was ordered to be printed) on the petition of William Morrow, praying to be indemnified for losses sustained by him in consequence of the violation of his contract for the performance of certain work at the Washington arsenal.

Mr. W. also, from the same committee, made an adverse report (which was ordered to be printed) on the petition of Charles Dehault Delassus, for remuneration for money forcibly taken from him for the public service at the capture of Baton Rouge.

Mr. TAPPAN, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, reported back, without amendment, and with a recommendation that it do pass, the bill for the relief of the heirs of Madame De Lusser and her legal representatives.

On motion by Mr. T., the previous orders were postponed, and the bill was taken up and considered as in committee of the whole; and, there being no motion to amend, it was reported to the Senate, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. WILLIAMS, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported back, without amendment, and with a recommendation that it be indefinitely postponed, the bill from the House for the relief of James Mount; and,

On motion by Mr. W., the previous orders of the day were postponed, and the above bill was taken up as in committee of the whole, and indefinitely postponed.

Mr. WILCOX, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back, without amendment, and with a recommendation that it do pass, the bill from the House for the payment of certain companies of Michigan militia.

On motion by Mr. PORTER, the previous orders of the day were postponed, and the above bill was taken up, as in committee of the whole; and, after a few remarks by Mr. KING, who contended that if the militia were entitled to pay, they could receive it under existing laws; and by Mr. PORTER, showing the reason why they could not receive pay without a special law; the bill was reported to the Senate, and ordered to a third reading; and accordingly was subsequently read the third time, and passed.

Mr. LINN, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, reported back, without amendment, and with a recommendation that it do pass, House bill for the relief of Joseph ——— of Missouri—[name not heard.]

Mr. LINN made a proposition, directing the Secretary of the Senate to place all the private bills on a separate calendar, with a view to expedite action upon them; but, after a few remarks by Mr. KING, showing that, instead of expediting action, it would retard the business of the Senate, the motion was withdrawn.

Mr. GRAHAM submitted the following resolution; which was agreed to, viz:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to communicate to the Senate, as early as practicable, what has been done by that department under the act of last session of Congress, entitled "An act making an appropriation for the erection of a marine hospital at or near Ocracoke, in North Carolina," approved August 29, 1842; especially whether a site for said hospital has been purchased or contracted for, and whether any reappropriation of money is necessary to complete it.

The resolution submitted by Mr. LINN on yesterday, fixing 11 o'clock, a. m., for the daily hour of meeting of the Senate hereafter, was taken up and rejected—ayes 18, noes 19.

Mr. BENTON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which had been referred the petition of a number of citizens of Missouri, praying that the settlers on the old military reserve, near Fort Leavenworth, may be allowed the right of preemption to the same, made a report, accompanied by a resolution, (which was agreed to by the Senate,) directing a copy of the report to be transmitted to the Secretary of War.

Mr. TALLMADGE presented the credentials of SILAS WRIGHT, JR., who has been elected by the Legislature of New York a Senator from that State for six years, from and after the 4th day of March next; which were read, and ordered to be placed on the files of the Senate.

On motion of Mr. BERRIEN, the previous orders of the day were postponed; and the Senate took up, as in committee of the whole, the bill from the House for the relief of Charles J. Jenkins and William Williams, assignees of Joseph McKinne.

Mr. BERRIEN explained the bill; and, after a few remarks by Mr. EVANS in opposition to its passage, and indicating a wish to make an amendment, it was postponed till to-morrow.

RETRENCHMENT, ECONOMY, AND GOVERNMENT RESOURCES.

On motion of Mr. MILLER, the unfinished business of yesterday was taken up; being the consideration of the following resolutions introduced by Mr. McDUFFIE, on Tuesday, the 7th instant, viz:

Resolved, That it is the solemn and urgent duty of the present Congress to adopt, without delay, efficient measures to revive the crippled and decaying commerce, replenish the impoverished exchequer, and arrest the alarming accumulation of the public debt of the United States.

Resolved, That a modification of the existing tariff on foreign imports, such as will render it strictly and in good faith a mere revenue measure, is indispensable to the accomplishment of those objects; and that the recent measures of the British Parliament, partially adopting the principles of free trade, the public indications of a disposition on the part of the present ministry to extend those principles still further, and the probability of the speedy organization of an extensive system of smuggling on the long line of our frontier, furnish pressing motives to Congress for acting on the subject during its present session.

Resolved, That a rigid system of retrenchment, economy, and accountability, such as will bring the annual expenditures within the annual income of the Government, is not less indispensable; and that, while this is rendered necessary by the deplorable state of the public finances, it is rendered just, and not injurious to the public service, by the great reduction of the currency, and consequent appreciation of the value of money.

To which Mr. EVANS had moved to append the following additional resolutions:

Resolved, That, among the causes which have contributed most efficiently to the depression of the foreign and domestic commerce of the country, and to the consequent impoverishment of the national treasury, and which have thus rendered a resort to loans inevitable, is the want of a currency of uniform value in all parts of the United States, commanding the confidence of the people; and no measure designed to revive commerce, replenish the treasury, and avert the further accumulation of public debt, will be complete or adequate to the accomplishment of these objects, which fail to supply their wants.

Resolved, That another of the prominent causes of the present prostrated condition of the business of the country, and of the public finances, and which has largely impaired American character and credit, which has exposed republican institutions to reproach and obloquy, is the failure of so many States of the Union to provide for the regular payment of the interest on their public debts; and especially the favor and countenance which have been given, to some extent, in some portions of the country, to the alarming and destructive doctrine, that these debts are not binding upon the people of the States which have created them, but may be annulled and repudiated at their discretion.

Resolved, That, while this Congress does not intend to adopt any measures for the payment by the United States of the debts of the individual States, it nevertheless deems it proper, in view of the disastrous consequences to the national character and credit, and to the institutions of republican government, of the failure of the States to fulfil their obligations, and of the principle which has been asserted—that these obligations are not binding on them,—to declare, that the debts of the States, created by the legislative authority thereof, respectively, are obligatory and binding upon said States, and cannot be by them annulled or repudiated; and that it is the solemn and urgent duty of the people of said States to resort to the most efficient means in their power for the preservation of their faith, and the fulfilment of their obligations.

Resolved, That it is the duty of Congress, by every constitutional and proper means in its power—by the adoption of measures to restore and preserve a currency of uniform value throughout the United States; by the collection and disbursement of the public revenue, and the regulation and administration of the public finances, in such way as shall be least burdensome to the people, and most conducive to the revival of trade and commerce; as shall secure the wages of labor from fluctuation; as shall give security and steadiness to the industry of the country,—to render every practicable aid and encouragement to the people of the several States in their efforts to meet their engagements, and to discharge the obligations into which they have entered.

Which Mr. DAYTON had moved to amend, by striking out the third of Mr. EVANS's resolutions, and inserting the following in its stead:

Resolved, That the distrust and obloquy cast upon the Federal Government by reason of the failure of certain States to make prompt payment of their debts, is an unjust and unfounded imputation upon its credit and good faith; that, while this Government deplores the misguided policy of those States which have embarrassed themselves, it disclaims all liability, legally or morally, for such delinquency; while, in vindication of its own unblemished faith and honor, it appeals with confidence to its past history.

Mr. DAYTON being entitled to the floor on the pending question, in relation to the adoption of his proposed amendment, addressed the Senate for upwards of an hour.

He stated that the offer which he made yesterday, to waive his claim to the floor, having failed to accomplish the object of their proceeding to the vote; and the question now pending being on his amendment, he felt it due to himself to submit a few brief remarks, in explanation of the reasons which induced him to think that amendment important and necessary. No Senator could deprecate more than he would a useless loss of the public time, at this late period of the session, in a mere discussion of abstract theories. But, if gentlemen on the other side chose to introduce resolutions of that character, tending to no practical result, the responsibility of wasting the public time could not be laid at the doors of his friends or himself, should they feel themselves placed in such a position as to demand either enlargement, modification, or discussion. The resolutions offered by the Senator from South Carolina reach to, and propose, no measure of public relief for the distress which they depict.

He (Mr. D.) had listened with great pleasure to the able speech which was delivered in support of those resolutions, in the hope that it would conclude with some definite and practical proposition for the relief of the country; more particularly as the Senator appealed, in the course of his remarks, to all parties to unite in effecting the object he had in view. But in this he was disappointed; for nothing was urged but the resolutions themselves; and they, and all that was said in their support, ended with a mere promulgation of abstract political principles. He could not discover, from them and the Senator's remarks, more than three main principles: in relation to the currency, to be let alone to work out its own salvation; to finance, to be improved by pulling down the tariff law; and to commerce, by reciprocating the action of Great Britain in favor of an approach to free trade.

On each of these points Mr. D. expatiated considerably at length, and then adverted to the resolutions submitted by the Senator from Maine, as an addition to the resolutions of the Senator from South Carolina. These additional resolutions he considered equally obnoxious to the charge of reaching to no practical result. Fully as he accorded with the general principles which they avowed, he considered them, as well as the original resolutions, unnecessary; because no definite action would grow out of them for the good of the country. As, however, they were before the Senate, he did not wish to let them pass to a vote without such modification as he thought essential; and, as he had strong objection to the wording of the third resolution of the amendment, he had proposed a substitute for that resolution, which he read.

In explaining his object in thus vindicating the credit and character of the United States, he stated his regret that hitherto every officer in the Government, from the highest to the lowest, had taken a course calculated to show to the world that they felt the character and credit of the country to be depressed, instead of boldly repelling the unfounded assertions of others that they were so. He insisted on it, that the credit and good faith of the United States never had been impaired; that they had been preserved without a blot or blemish since the foundation of the Government; and that, in this respect, we stood proudly pre-eminent above the nations of Europe, who now calumniated us in the foreign money markets.

In proof of all this, he entered into a long and minute history of the iniquities practised by Great Britain, in laying the foundation of her national debt, and enlarging it from time to time, till it had reached the enormous sum of upwards of thirty-five hundred millions of dollars—in comparison with which, our national debt shrank into a mere nothing, or at least a sum so small as to be scarcely capable of paying half a year's interest. He enumerated the debts due by France, Holland, Naples, Russia, &c., to show how deeply they were all involved; and contrasted their condition with that of this country—possessing unexampled resources, and an inheritance stretching from sea to sea, through a wide extent of country unequalled for fertility and natural advantages. Having evidenced all these things, as a vindication of the unimpaired good faith and credit of the United States, he commented with severity upon those portions of the President's message which he considered could have no better tendency than to give countenance to the calumnies uttered in foreign money markets against our credit. He particularly alluded to the unnecessary and imprudent exposure of the fact that an accredited agent, sent to Europe to negotiate the loan, had been sent back repulsed.

Speaking of the assumption of the State debts, he deprecated any proposition of that nature as unwise and impolitic, without giving any opinion as to the power of the Government in that particular. The question of the power of the Government to interfere he had not sufficiently examined into, to enable him to form an opinion; but he had fully made up his mind as to the imprudence of any such measure.

Mr. D. concluded by urging the adoption of his substitute for the third resolution of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Maine.

Mr. MERRICK next obtained the floor, and insisted on his motion (of which he had given notice yesterday) to lay the whole subject on the table. He again urged the impropriety of wasting the short time which yet remained of the session, so necessary to be applied to the legislative business remaining unfinished, upon mere abstract questions. He pointed out that, in his opinion, gentlemen were mistaken who supposed that his motion would carry with it the resolutions of the Senator from Virginia. That Senator had only given notice of his intention to offer them: they were not before the Senate, and could not be, as long as an amendment to an amendment of an original proposition was pending. No fitter time could, therefore, be chosen for pressing his motion than at present.

Mr. WALKER called for the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. RIVES inquired of the Chair whether, if the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey were either adopted or rejected, would he not have a right to move his amendment as a substitute for the resolutions of the Senator from Maine?

The CHAIR explained that a motion to strike out a larger portion of the resolutions, containing the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey, with a view of inserting others in their place, would be in order.

Mr. RIVES contended that his resolutions were in that case before the Senate, and would be affected by the motion to lay on the table.

Mr. MERRICK said they would not be involved in the motion a whit more than any other amendments which gentlemen might intend to offer.

Mr. CRITTENDEN asked if it was in order for gentlemen to catechise the Chair as to the course to be pursued with regard to something intended to be done?

The question was then called for on Mr. MERRICK's motion to lay the whole on the table; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 24, nays 23, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Barrow, Bates, Bayard, Berrien, Choate, Conrad, Crafts, Crittenden, Dayton, Evans, Graham, Henderson, Huntington, Merrick, Miller, Morehead, Phelps, Porter, Simmons, Smith of Indiana, Sprague, Tallmadge, White, and Woodbridge—24.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Archer, Bagby, Benton, Buchanan, Calhoun, Fulton, King, Linn, McDuffie, McRoberts, Mangum, Rives, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Sturgeon, Tappan, Walker, Wilcox, Williams, Woodbury, Wright, and Young—23.

Mr. RIVES then submitted his resolutions (which will be found in the proceedings of February 18) as a substantive proposition. They lie over one day, under the rule.

Mr. LINN submitted a resolution, that the daily hour of meeting after Saturday next shall be at 11 o'clock, a. m., for the remainder of the session, instead of 12.

The resolution lies over till to-morrow.

On motion by Mr. WHITE, the Senate went into executive session; and, after some time spent therein, adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, February 15, 1843.

Mr. LOWELL presented the petition of Solomon Thayer and 62 other citizens of Lubec, Maine, praying Congress for such an alteration of our commercial relations with foreign Governments as shall give to the navigation of the United States terms of just reciprocity; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Also, the petition of M. G. Buck and 76 other citizens of Bucksport, Maine, praying Congress to impose an additional duty on sawed lumber, firewood, fish, &c., from the British provinces; which was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. WARD presented a petition of 400 merchants and workingmen of New York and Brooklyn, in favor of Gilbert's floating dry-dock: referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. OLIVER presented the petition of Nathan Beard, asking to be paid for $5,606 of continental currency, received for services rendered during the revolutionary war in 1777 and 1778—the said continental currency being of no value.

Mr. REYNOLDS presented the memorial and resolutions of the General Assembly of the State of Illinois, stating the following facts: That certain citizens of Macon county and the vicinity, reside in the interior of the State, and are located 80 miles from the navigation of the Illinois river, and 130 from that of the Wabash. These citizens reside on and near the cross railroad route, extending from the Illinois river, at Naples, by Springfield, the seat of Government of the State, to the eastern border of the State, to meet the Indiana canal and railroad at Covington, which communicates to Lake Erie, through Indiana and Ohio. The memorial states further, that the abovenamed communication in Indiana and Ohio is completed for 235 miles, and will be finished in Indiana during this year from Lafayette to Covington, which is in the direction of the cross railroad route in Illinois. This communication completed, a direct inland channel for the commerce of the most fertile region of country in the Union would be established from the navigable waters of the Mississippi to Lake Erie, and by Buffalo to the cities of New York and Boston. This communication would shorten the distance from the Mississippi to Lake Erie several thousand miles less than the route by Chicago, Mackinack, and Detroit.

The memorial further shows that the country adjacent to this northern cross railroad is the most fertile in Illinois, and the farmers already raise a great surplus of products in it; but the location is so far from the means of transporting this surplus to market, that the crops are rotting on the hands of the farmers. It is also stated, that some considerable portion of the public lands are yet unsold on this route. It is also stated that this improvement is national, extending from the Mississippi to Boston; and that similar public works in the States of Indiana and Ohio have received donations in land from the General Government, to aid the States in such improvements. The memorial goes further, and says, that the price of the public lands will be enhanced in value more than double by the construction of this road in Illinois; and, in consideration of these facts, the resolutions of the Legislature pray that every alternate section of the public land along the route in Illinois, be granted to the State, to aid in the completion of this public improvement. The reserved land will be enhanced more in value by the donation, than the whole is at present. The memorial and resolutions were referred to the Committee on the Public Lands in the House of Representatives; and they are so just and reasonable, that no doubt a favorable action will be had on them, if the lateness of the session does not prevent it, as there is not much more than two weeks of the session yet unexpired.

On motion of Mr. PENDLETON, a memorial some time since presented by him, in relation to steamboat explosions, was ordered to be printed.

CLERKS EMPLOYED BY THE GOVERNMENT.

Mr. G. DAVIS rose, and submitted the following resolution:

Resolved; That the Secretary of State, the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Navy, and the Postmaster General, report to this House the number, classes, and compensation of persons employed in their several departments, respectively, on the 1st day of January, 1839, and on the 1st day of January, 1843; distinguishing, by bureaus, where they exist in the department.

Mr. FILLMORE said it appeared to him that a useless expense would be incurred by the adoption of that resolution; and it was especially unnecessary, as all the information which it would call for was already published in public documents.

Mr. G. DAVIS said if it was in the public documents, it would take so much less time to collect it in the shape which he proposed.

Mr. FILLMORE said, in the present state of the national treasury, they should save all the expense they possibly could.

Mr. BOWNE asked if that debate was in order.

The SPEAKER was understood to reply in the negative.

Mr. BOWNE then objected to it, and to the reception of the resolution.

Mr. G. DAVIS moved a suspension of the rules, for the reception of his resolution.

The motion to suspend was agreed to, and the resolution was adopted.

THE TARIFF.

Mr. READ said for two months he had been appealing to the House to place on the journal a resolution which he had offered on a very important subject. It was a subject of the deepest importance, and one on which the House ought to have acted at the commencement of the session—he alluded to a modification of the tariff. He admitted that he did not now, at this late period of the session, expect that the House would act on that subject; but he desired that his proposition should go on the journal. [Objections were made in various parts of the hall.] He continued: if it were objected to, he would object to everything out of order to the end of the session. [Laughter.] For two months he had been offering his resolution, but without effect.

Mr. STANLY objected to the continuation of the gentleman's argument.

Mr. READ said he was not arguing the question

Mr. STANLY insisted that the gentleman was arguing it.

[Cries of "Read the resolution."]

The Clerk read it accordingly, as follows:

Whereas the act of Congress entitled "An act to provide revenue from imports, and to change and modify existing laws imposing duties on imports, and for other purposes," passed 30th August, 1842, having been passed in the hurry and confusion of the last day of a session, and therefore greatly defective, not only in its details, but in some of its principles; imposing prohibitory duties on a great variety of articles, thereby so far defeating itself, both in regard to revenue and protection—the latter, by administering a powerful stimulant to the smuggling trade; therefore,

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to inquire into the expediency of reporting a bill, supplementary to the said act of the 30th August last, based upon the following principles, viz:

1. To provide an adequate revenue for the economical administration of the Government, and no more—say from twenty to twenty-three millions.

2. Articles classed as "necessaries of life," and entering into general consumption, of a description not grown or produced in the United States, to be admitted free of duty.

3. Articles imported, coming in competition with those grown or produced in the United States, to be taxed so as to give ample protection to our farmers, planters, manufacturers, and mechanics.

4. The measure of such protection to be, in all cases, so much duty as will make the cost of the foreign article in our markets equal to the cost of production in the United States, and no more: thus bringing the foreign and American manufacturer into our markets on a footing of perfect equality, increasing the supply in proportion to the demand, and thereby reducing the price to the consumer.

5. If it should be found necessary to impose higher duties for revenue than are required by the said measure of protection, in such case luxuries to pay a higher duty than necessaries.

6. No drawback to be allowed on foreign sugars refined in the United States, nor on spirits distilled from foreign molasses.

7. No drawback to be allowed in any case, except on goods imported and specially entered for exportation, and actually exported within ninety days from the time of importation.

8. All duties to be paid in cash at the time of importation.

9. All duties to be levied on the true value of the goods in the principal ports of the United States; the valuation to be made, in the first instance, by the collector of the port; and, if the importer shall appeal, the value to be finally ascertained by a board of commissioners, to be appointed for that purpose.

Mr. BRONSON interrupted the reading of the resolutions, and objected to their reception.

Mr. READ moved a suspension of the rules, an on this he called for the yeas and nays.

The House did not order the yeas and nays.

Mr. READ made some remarks on the course he was desirous to pursue; but his observations were not heard at the reporter's desk.

The motion to suspend the rules was then negatived.

RETRENCHMENT.

On the motion of Mr. CAVE JOHNSON, the Select Committee on Retrenchment, appointed on the 3d day of February last, was authorized to send for persons and papers, and to examine witnesses on oath.

THE WAREHOUSING SYSTEM.

Mr. J. P. KENNEDY submitted a resolution to make bill No. 730 (being a bill making provision for the warehousing of imported goods) the special order for Tuesday, the 21st instant.

Mr. HOPKINS objected, and said he hoped they would have no more special orders during this session.

Mr. J. P. KENNEDY moved a suspension of the rules; but it was not agreed to.

BILL No. 548.

Mr. FILLMORE inquired what the order of the day was.

The SPEAKER replied, House bill No. 548. [Laughter.]

Mr. FILLMORE moved that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. The motion was agreed to, and Mr. UNDERWOOD took the chair.

Mr. ARNOLD moved that the committee proceed with the consideration of the bill on which the committee was yesterday engaged.

The motion was agreed to; and the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WELLER] offered yesterday, to reduce the per diem of Senators from $6 to $5, was negatived.

The following amendment of another gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HASTINGS] was offered yesterday:

Strike out all after the word "assembled" in the second line, and insert:

That from and after the commencement of the present session, on the 5th day of December last, and henceforward, each member of the House of Representatives and Senate of the United States shall receive, during the sessions of Congress, six dollars a day, and four dollars for every twenty miles travel by the usual routes to and from the seat of Government. And that each member of future Congresses, on taking the oath to support the Constitution of the United States, do, at the same time, pledge his honor, in presence of the House or Senate, (to whichever he may belong,) that he will strictly confine the franking privilege in his own person to the exercise of his official duties, but may extend it in the broadest liberty to giving every information through public documents, and all other matter in his capacity of Representative, to his constituents and the country.

And be it further enacted, That, from and after the passage of this bill, the private soldiers of the army of the United States, and the sailors and marines of the navy of the United States, shall have one dollar a month added to their present pay.

And be it further enacted, That all laws or parts of laws conflicting with this act be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

This amendment was also negatived.

Mr. T. W. WILLIAMS offered a substitute for all that portion of the bill relating to the pay and mileage of members of Congress, providing for a reduction of mileage, and a computation of distance according to the Post Office books.

The amendment was rejected—ayes 31, noes not counted.

The second section was then read. It relates to the pay and mileage of the members of the House of Representatives.

Mr. MALLORY offered the same amendment which was adopted on yesterday in relation to the mileage of Senators, providing that no member shall receive a greater aggregate of mileage than $300 at each session of Congress.

Mr. ARNOLD rose to a point of order. He contended that, inasmuch as the amendment of the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. HOLMES,] cutting off mileage altogether, had been adopted, this proposition would make the section incongruous, and was, therefore, inadmissible.

The CHAIR remarked that it was true that the proposition would make the bill inconsistent in its provisions; but it was not for the Chair to judge in such a matter. It remained with the committee to put the bill in any form they thought proper.

Tellers (Messrs. POPE and A. V. BROWN) were appointed, and reported ayes 58, noes 65.

So the amendment of Mr. MALLORY was rejected.

[The effect of this vote is to limit the mileage of Senators to $300 a session, whilst that of members of the House remains unrestricted.]

The amendment of the select committee, reducing the mileage to $6 for every 20 miles travel, was adopted. Also, the next amendment, prohibiting any member from receiving pay when absent from the House, unless such absence be certified to be occasioned "by sickness of himself or family, or by leave of the House."

Mr. McKENNAN offered the following amendment, to be inserted in lieu of the 2d section. He said that, if it should be adopted, the first section might be similarly amended or stricken out:

Strike out the second section, and insert after the enacting clause of the bill:

That, in lieu of the daily pay and mileage now allowed, by law, to the Senators and members of the House of Representatives, each Senator, Representative, and Delegate, shall hereafter be entitled to receive eight dollars per day for every day he shall be in attendance, and six [altered afterwards to four] dollars for every 20 miles' travel, by the most usual route from his residence to and from the seat of Government, in all cases where the session of Congress shall continue no longer than three [subsequently changed to five] months. If the session shall be extended any time longer, and not exceeding two months, each Senator, Representative, and Delegate, shall receive six dollars per day for the additional time; and if the session shall be protracted longer than five [subsequently altered to seven] months, each Senator and member of the House shall receive four dollars per day for the remainder of the session. If any Senator or member of the House shall be detained by sickness on his journey to or from the meeting of Congress, or, after his arrival at the seat of Government, shall be prevented, by sickness, from attendance in the Senate or House, he shall be entitled to the same daily allowance. The President pro tem. of the Senate, when the Vice President shall be absent, or when the office of Vice President shall be vacant, shall receive double the daily pay to which he is entitled as a Senator for every day he shall attend the Senate; and the Speaker of the House of Representatives shall receive double the daily pay to which he is entitled as a Representative for every day he shall attend the House: Provided, That it shall be the duty of each Senator and Representative, and Delegate, before his account is settled and certified, to state the number of days he has been actually in attendance in the Senate or the House; and also the number of days he has been absent; and whether said absence has been owing to sickness or otherwise; and, unless such absence shall have been caused by sickness of himself or family, or by leave of the Senate or House, his daily pay for the time when he was thus absent without cause shall be deducted from his account.

Mr. FILLMORE suggested a modification. He thought that the end of five months should be fixed as the period for the commencement of the reduction of the per diem.

Mr. McKENNAN accepted the modification. The amendment was, by his direction, so altered as to make the first reduction of pay at the end of five months, and the second reduction at the end of seven months.

Mr. COWEN offered an amendment to this amendment, regulating the manner of computing mileage, but subsequently withdrew it.

Mr. GILMER offered an amendment, the effect of which would be to fix the pay of members at $4 per day after the first five months of any session. The amendment was lost—ayes 64, noes 66.

Mr. SLADE offered an amendment, to make the per diem of members of Congress eight dollars for the first five months of the session, and after that five dollars. Rejected—ayes 30, noes not counted.

Mr. J. C. CLARK offered an amendment to the amendment, to insert in the 8th line of the 2d section, the words "unless he shall have travelled the entire distance for which such mileage is claimed," so as to make the clause read: Provided, That no Senator, Representative, or Delegate, shall be allowed for mileage a sum exceeding six dollars per day from the end of one session to the time of his taking his seat at the next session, unless he shall have travelled the entire distance for which such mileage is claimed."

This amendment was adopted.

The question on the amendment of Mr. McKENNAN, as amended, was then put, and the vote resulted in ayes 88, noes 30.

No quorum voting, another count was taken, resulting in ayes 94, noes 30.

So the amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. McKENNAN then moved to strike out the first and second sections, in order to make the bill correspond with the amendment.

Mr. G. DAVIS moved to strike out the word "four," and insert "six," in the second section; but the Chair decided that it was not in order.

Mr. J. C. CLARK moved to amend the amendment of the committee, in the 7th line of the sixth section, by inserting after the words "one thousand," the words "two hundred and fifty;" so as to confine the reduction to salaries above $1,250. Rejected—ayes 50, noes not counted.

Mr. J. C. CLARK offered an amendment to the same section, in the 34th line, confining the reduction of the pay and emoluments of officers of the army and navy to those whose pay and emoluments exceed $2,000: rejected.

Mr. PENDLETON offered an amendment, confining the reduction of the pay of officers of the army and navy to those whose pay and emoluments exceed $1,500: rejected.

Mr. FILLMORE moved to amend the proviso of the fifth section, by striking out the following words:

"That no salaried civil officer of the Government shall receive any other pay for his services than what is allowed by said salary."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MOORE moved to amend the fifth section, so as to make the 20 per cent. reduction apply to salaries of $2,000.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. CHAS. BROWN submitted an amendment to change the scale of reduction, but in what precise way was not heard.

The amendment was not agreed to.

Other not very material amendments were submitted by Messrs. A. H. H. STUART, J. P. KENNEDY, FILLMORE, J. R. INGERSOLL, WM. O. BUTLER, CHAS. BROWN, and others.

Mr. McKEON offered an amendment, striking out the clause by which the diplomatic corps serving abroad were excepted from the operation of the reduction: rejected.

Verbal amendments were offered by Messrs. ARNOLD and FILLMORE, and adopted.

Mr. MERIWETHER moved to insert a proviso, preventing all officers who shall be "waiting orders," or "on leave," from being excepted from the operation of the reduction: rejected.

Mr. McKENNAN moved that the words "two hundred dollars" be inserted after the words "one thousand," in the clause limiting the operation of reduction, so as to cause no reduction to take place unless upon salaries of $1,200 and upwards, instead of $1,000, as at present provided for: rejected.

Mr. CHAS. BROWN offered an amendment, the effect of which would be to reduce the pay of midshipmen in the navy and cadets at the Military Academy 20 per cent. By the bill, as it now stands, their pay will not be affected. The amendment was rejected.

Mr. McKENNAN offered an amendment, (which was subsequently withdrawn,) providing that officers whose salaries exceed $6,000 shall be reduced 30 per cent.

Mr. S. MASON gave notice that he should move, when the committee rose, to non-concur in the amendment by which the mileage was reduced to $4 for every twenty miles. He wished the mileage fixed at $6 for every twenty miles.

Mr. GWIN inquired if it was in order to offer a substitute for the whole bill.

The CHAIR. Not now.

Mr. GILMER offered an amendment, the effect of which is to abolish the offices of recorder and solicitor of the General Land Office, and to provide that the duties now performed by those officers shall be performed by the Commissioner of the General Land Office, and such of his clerks as he may assign.

Mr. FILLMORE suggested that a bill had already been passed, which assigned other duties (those now performed by the President's private secretary) to the recorder of the Land Office.

Mr. GILMER said there was no probability that such a bill would pass the Senate.

The amendment was then adopted—ayes 78, noes 55.

Mr. MALLORY offered an amendment, providing that no portion of the bill shall have the effect of reducing the salary of any officer of a higher rank and of a longer standing, below that of his junior of lower rank and of a more recent date: rejected.

Mr. MERIWETHER again attempted, in vain, to have adopted a provision excepting officers on leave, and waiting orders, from the exemption from the reduction which is made to apply to all whose pay is above $1,000.

Mr. J. C. CLARK offered an amendment, providing that all officers whose salaries are between $1,000 and $2,000, shall be reduced ten per cent.; and all above $2,000, twenty per cent.: rejected.

The question then recurred on the 5th section of the bill as amended, and the same was adopted.

Mr. M. A. COOPER offered the following amendment to the bill, to be inserted as an additional section:

"Be it further enacted, That the army and navy be reduced: the army by companies, according to date, the oldest first, shall be discharged, till it be reduced to four regiments. The officers, field and staff, shall be discharged according to grade, by date of commissions, the oldest first, till there shall be left the number requisite to the organization and command of the four regiments. The navy shall be reduced by disbanding seamen and officers, according to date of service and priority of commissions, till there shall remain in the service only six vessels of war, with the requisite number of men and officers to man the same; and it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Navy to take the necessary steps to put the vessels so discharged in the best preservation possible, and at the least expense."

Mr. READ called for a division of the question on the amendment.

The first part, relating to the army, was rejected.

The second part, relating to the navy, was also rejected.

Mr. GILMER moved to strike out the words "militating against," and insert "conflicting with," in the repealing clause of the bill; so as to make it read "all acts and parts of acts conflicting with this act are hereby repealed." Agreed to.

Mr. CLIFFORD offered an amendment, the effect of which, if adopted, would have been to abolish the Military Academy at West Point after the 1st of September next. Rejected.

Mr. McKENNAN moved to strike out the first section of the bill, so as to make it correspond with the amendments that had been adopted: agreed to without a division.

Mr. SMITH of Virginia inquired whether the bill, as it stood, applied to the officers of the House and the public grounds, as it was doubted by some whether they were included in the designation of "officers of the Government."

["Certainly; certainly;" answered by several.]

Mr. GWIN then offered his substitute, as follows:

A BILL to retrench the expenditures of the Government of the United States.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That, from and after the 30th day of June next, the pay and emoluments of all offices existing on the 4th day of March, (inclusive,) 1825, under the Government of the United States, whether civil, military, or naval, which have been increased since that period, shall be reduced to the rate at which they then were: Provided, That, in every case where the pay and emoluments of any office have been reduced since the 4th day of March, 1825, this act shall not be so construed as to change such reduction.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That, from and after the 30th day of June next, the pay and emoluments of every office under the Government of the United States, whether civil, military, or naval, created since the 4th of March, 1825, shall be reduced at the rate of twenty per centum.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That no officer under the Government of the United States shall be allowed any extra compensation whatever.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That, whenever the session of Congress shall be protracted beyond five months, the per diem pay of the members thereof, thereafter, shall be at the rate of four dollars.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That all laws and parts of laws inconsistent with this act be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON moved to amend the amendment of Mr. GWIN, by striking out all after the enacting clause, and inserting the following:

That from and after the 30th of June next, there shall be reduced twenty per centum from the amount of pay or compensation allowed to officers of the navy, or other persons employed in the naval service, whose compensation was fixed or increased by virtue of the act of the 3d of March, 1835, entitled "An act to regulate the pay of the navy of the United States," or since that time.

That there shall be reduced, from and after the 30th of June next, 20 per centum from the pay or compensation of officers of the army, or other persons employed in the military service, whose pay or compensation was fixed or increased by virtue of an act entitled "An act to increase the military establishment of the United States, and for other purposes," approved 5th July, 1838; or whose pay has been increased since the 1st of January, 1835. And that it shall not in future be lawful to allow double rations to any officer or person in the military service of the United States, nor shall it be lawful in future to allow commutation pay in lieu of fuel and quarters.

That all persons in the civil employment of the Government, whose compensation exceeds twelve hundred dollars, and whose compensation has been fixed or increased since the 1st of January, 1835, shall be reduced 20 per centum from and after the 30th of June next.

That it shall not hereafter be lawful to allow to any officer or person in the employment of the Government, any extra or additional compensation for or on account of any service rendered the United States, of whatever kind or nature it may be.

The question being taken on Mr. CAVE JOHNSON's amendment, it was rejected.

Mr. MEDILL moved to amend the amendment of Mr. GWIN, by striking out all after the enacting clause, and inserting the following:

That, from and after the 4th day of March, A. D. 1843, the per diem allowance, salary, or other compensation of Senators, Representatives, and Delegates in Congress, and of all officers, or other persons elected or appointed by, or in any way serving in either branch thereof, shall be, and the same is hereby, reduced one fourth, or twenty-five per centum on the amount now authorized and received; and the mileage of Senators, Representatives, and Delegates, shall be reduced one-fourth for the first five hundred miles, one-half for the second five hundred miles, and three-fourths for any distance that they may be required to travel over one thousand miles.

SEC. 2 And be it further enacted, That, from and after the said 4th day of March, A. D. 1843, the salary, pay, fees, emoluments, perquisites, or other compensation, by whatever name the same may be called or known, of all officers and other persons in the service or employment of the Federal Government, other than those embraced in the first section of this act, whether in the civil, military, naval, judiciary, or other department thereof, (excepting those who are required to reside abroad in the diplomatic service of the country, and such as are protected by the Constitution,) shall be, and the same are hereby, altered and reduced from that now prescribed and fixed by law, as follows; that is to say: Where the salary, pay, fees, emoluments, perquisites, or other compensation of any one individual now amount to or exceed three thousand dollars per annum, the same shall be reduced thirty per centum on the present amount; where the salary, pay, fees, emoluments, perquisites, or other compensation of any one individual now amount to fifteen hundred dollars, and are less than three thousand dollars per annum, the same shall be reduced twenty per centum on the present amount; and where the salary, pay, fees, emoluments, perquisites, or other compensation of any one individual now amount to seven hundred dollars, and are less than fifteen hundred dollars per annum, the same shall be reduced ten per centum on the present amount: Provided, That the compensation of no person now receiving less than seven hundred dollars per annum shall be affected by this act.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That no extra allowance or compensation of any kind, not expressly granted and authorized by law, shall be paid to any officer of, or other person in the service or employment of the Federal Government, and any of the departments thereof, in any form, or under any pretence whatever.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That all laws, and parts of laws, inconsistent with this act, be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

The question was then taken on Mr. MEDILL's amendment; and it was rejected.

Mr. HUNT then offered his substitute, which was copied into yesterday's proceedings as an amendment to the amendment of Mr. GWIN; but, on taking the question, it was negatived.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Connecticut then offered, as an amendment to the amendment of Mr. GWIN, a proviso, that the mileage of members of Congress shall be estimated by the shortest mail route, or according to the Post Office book of distances, from the places of their residence to the seat of Government; but the amendment was rejected.

The question was then taken on Mr. GWIN's amendment; and it was also rejected.

Mr. ARNOLD moved that the committee rise, and report the bill.

Mr. BOTTS moved to strike out the enacting clause.

Mr. ARNOLD insisted upon his motion, and that the gentleman from Virginia had not the floor to make his motion.

Mr. BOTTS said that he would not insist on his motion; but would move to amend the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee, so as to read that the committee rise, and report the bill to the House, with a recommendation that it do not pass.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Connecticut then renewed his amendment as to the mode of computing the mileage of members of Congress, as an original amendment. It was read as follows:

"And that the mileage, in all cases, shall be estimated or computed by the shortest mail route, according to the Post Office book of distances, from the seat of Government to the post office nearest the residence of each Senator, Representative, or Delegate; and that the same rule, in computing all distances, shall apply to all other persons to whom travel is, or may be, allowed."

Mr. W. B. CAMPBELL moved to amend the amendment, so as to make the same mode of computing mileage apply to all persons receiving mileage from the Government.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Connecticut accepted the amendment as a modification of that offered by him; and the amendment was adopted.

Mr. ARNOLD asked how the Chair had got rid of his motion that the committee rise?

The CHAIR said that it had been superseded by amendments subsequently offered.

Mr. McKAY proposed to amend, by striking out that part which related to the compensation of members, and inserting a substitute which he had prepared, which was understood, in effect, to be a section to repeal all laws on the subject of compensation, leaving the next Congress to fix the sum for themselves.

The amendment was not adopted.

Mr. BOTTS then moved to amend the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. ARNOLD,] that the committee rise and report the bill to the House, by the addition of instructions that the bill be rejected.

Tellers were then called for, and Mr. M. A. COOPER and Mr. HOUSTON were appointed; and they reported 38 in the affirmative; the negative was not taken.

The amendment was not adopted.

Mr. BOTTS said he was desirous to see how many members expected to come back to the next Congress.

Mr. MATHIOT inquired if the 38 gentlemen expected to come back?

Mr. BOTTS was understood to say that he supposed they did.

The committee then rose and reported the bill to the House.

Mr. FILLMORE moved to amend an amendment of the committee, by changing the compensation for mileage from $4 to $6; and to the amendment the previous question, so that the public might get to other business.

Mr. BARNARD asked if that was in order.

The SPEAKER (amidst much confusion) It was understood to say it was.

Mr. SMITH of Virginia asked if it was not in order to move to print the bill, with all the amendments.

The SPEAKER said it could only be done by general consent.

Mr. CUSHING moved that the bill be laid on the table, and on that he called for the yeas and nays.

Mr. SMITH again inquired if there was no way by which they could get the bill and all its amendments printed, so that the House might know what it was. [Cries of "No, no."]

The SPEAKER replied, that it could only be done by general consent.

Mr. SMITH of Virginia urged the necessity of printing the bill and its amendments, that they might act understandingly.

The SPEAKER said, if the motion to lay the bill on the table should be rejected, the bill might be postponed and printed by a vote of the House.

The yeas and nays were then ordered and taken on the motion to lay the bill on the table, and it was rejected—yeas 42, nays 167, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Landaff W. Andrews, Barnard, Barton, Black, Botts, Bowne, Bronson, William Butler, John Campbell, Clinton, Mark A. Cooper, Cranston, Cross, Cushing, Fessenden, Howard, Hunt, W. W. Williams, Joseph L. Williams, Yorke, and Augustus Young—167.

The question then recurred on seconding the demand for the previous question, and there was a second. The main question was ordered to be put, and the question was then taken on the amendment of Mr. FILLMORE, by yeas and nays, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Arnold, Aycrigg, Black, Bowne, Aaron V. Brown, Milton Brown, Wm. Butler, William O. Butler, William B. Campbell, Caruthers, Casey, Chapman, Childs, Colquitt, Cravens, Crawford, Cross, Cushing, Garrett Davis, Doig, Everett, Fillmore, Gamble, Gentry, Houston, Howard, Charles J. Ingersoll, Joseph R. ceed with it, Rodney, Rogers, Roosevelt, William Russell, James M. Russell, Saltonstall, Saunders, Sewell, Shepperd, Truman Smith, Wm. Smith, Snyder, Stanly, Steenrod, Stratton, Alexander H. H. Stuart, Sumter, Talcott, Richard W. Thompson, Toland, Trotti, Trumbull, Tyler, Van Rensselaer, Ward, Weller, Westbrook, Jo. L. White, Joseph L. Williams, Winthrop, Wise, and Yorke—145.

So the House refused to adopt the amendment.

The amendments of the Committee of the Whole were then read through, (being the whole bill.)

Mr. McKENNAN suggested a verbal amendment. He moved to strike out the surplus words, "by the usual route," in the clause relating to mileage; since that clause now provided that the mileage should be computed according to the post routes.

Objection was made, and the motion was not entertained.

Mr. TURNEY inquired what would be the effect of rejecting the amendments of the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER said it would throw the House back upon the original bill before it was sent to the Committee of the Whole.

The amendments were then concurred in, without a division; and the bill, under the operation of the previous question, was ordered to its engrossment.

Mr. BRIGGS moved a reconsideration of the vote ordering the bill to its engrossment. This motion, under the operation of the previous question, was rejected.

The SPEAKER. When shall the bill have its third reading?

Many members. "Now."

Mr. SMITH of Virginia objected to the third reading of the bill at this time, and moved that it be printed, in order to enable members to see what they were voting on.

Mr. FILLMORE expressed a strong desire to have the bill now disposed of.

Objection being still made, on the ground that the bill was not actually engrossed—

Mr. FILLMORE suggested that 12 o'clock to-morrow be appointed for its third reading, and that it be printed in the mean time.

Mr. BRIGGS moved a suspension of the rules, in order to have the bill put on its third reading at this time.

Mr. SMITH of Virginia asked for the yeas and nays on the motion to suspend; but the House, by a vote of 24 yeas to 133 nays, (not one-fifth,) refused to order them.

Tellers were appointed, (Messrs. LINN and W. W. IRWIN,) who reported ayes 128, noes 54.

So the rules were suspended, with a view to put the bill on its third reading at this time.

Mr. JOHN CAMPBELL rose to a question of order. The House had suspended the rules so as to allow the question to be put, whether the bill should now be read the third time; but did not decide that the bill should be read the third time.

The SPEAKER said the rule was suspended for the purpose of reading the bill the third time this day; that rule declaring that no bill shall be read the third time on the same day that its engrossment is ordered.

The bill was then read the third time; and, under the operation of the previous question, was passed—yeas 166, nays 48, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Sherlock J. Andrews, Arnold, Arrington, Atherton, Babcock, Baker, Beeson, Bidlack, Blair, Boardman, Brewster, Briggs, Brockway, Bronson, Aaron V. Brown, Milton Brown, Charles Brown, Jeremiah Brown, Burke, William O. Butler, Green W. Caldwell, Patrick C. Caldwell, Calhoun, William B. Campbell, Thomas J. Campbell, Caruthers, Cary, Casey, Chapman, Childs, Chittenden, John C. Clark, Clifford, Coles, Mark A. Cooper, Cowen, Cravens, Crawford, Daniel, Garrett Davis, Richard D. Davis, Dawson, Dean, Deberry, Doig, Eastman, John C. Edwards, Egbert, Fillmore, John G. Floyd, Charles A. Floyd, Fornance, A. Lawrence Foster, Gamble, Gates, Gentry, Gerry, Giddings, Gilmer, Goggin, P. G. Goode, Wm. O. Mr. MOORE moved the reconsideration of the vote just taken on the passage of the bill, and moved the previous question on that motion.

The previous question having been seconded by the House, the main question on the reconsideration was put, and decided in the negative without a division.

Mr. FILLMORE moved to amend the title of the bill, by inserting after the word "territories," the words "and other officers," which was agreed to.

Mr. McKENNAN moved to amend the title as amended, by substituting for it the words "A bill to establish a uniform rule for computing the mileage and per diem compensation of members of Congress, and other officers of the Government:" rejected without a count. The title as amended was then agreed to.

Mr. W. W. IRWIN moved the reconsideration of the vote adopting the title of the bill; and called for the previous question, which was seconded; and, under its operation, the motion was negatived.

The House then adjourned.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, February 16, 1843.

The PRESIDENT pro tem. laid before the Senate a communication from the Treasury Department, and one from the Navy Department, showing the number, names, and compensation of the clerks employed in those departments, and bureaux connected therewith, during the year 1842; which were ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

Also, a communication from the Treasury Department, transmitting additional information, under a resolution of the last session, in connexion with the New York commission for the investigation of the affairs of the custom-house: referred to the Committee on Printing, to examine into the necessity for printing it.

Mr. STURGEON presented a memorial from the Board of Trade of the city of Pittsburg, recommending an appropriation for the erection of a marine hospital at or near that city. Mr. S. remarked that the session was so far gone, that he presumed, if the memorial was even referred to the appropriate committee, there was no probability that they would examine into the subject before the close of the session. He therefore moved to lay it on the table: agreed to.

Mr. S. also presented the proceedings of a meeting held in Washington county, Pennsylvania, in favor of the establishment of a mail route from the town of Washington, in Pennsylvania, to Steubenville, Ohio: referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE presented a memorial from the Mayor and City Council of the city of Monroe, Michigan, in favor of an appropriation for completing the works for the improvement of the harbor at the mouth of the river Raisin; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Also, presented the preamble and joint resolutions of the Legislature of Michigan, recommending appropriations for the improvement of harbors, and protection of commerce on the lakes: referred to the Committee on Commerce.

On motion by Mr. WOODBRIDGE, it was ordered that the preamble and resolutions of the Legislature of Indiana, presented at the last session of Congress, in favor of an appropriation for the completion of the works in the harbor of St. Joseph, Michigan, be taken from the files, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. EVANS, from the Committee on Finance, reported back, with an amendment, the bill making appropriation for the naval service for the half-calendar year beginning on the 1st of January, 1843, and ending on the 30th of June, 1843; and for the fiscal year beginning on the 1st of July, 1843, and ending on the 30th of June, 1844.

Mr. E. gave notice that he would, on to-morrow, ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the above bill.

Mr. WRIGHT, from the Committee on Claims, to which had been referred numerous memorials and resolutions of the State Legislatures on the subject of Congress passing a law to restore Mr. Kendall to his personal liberty, reported a bill to amend the laws relating to imprisonment for debt in the District of Columbia; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE, from the Joint Committee on the Library, to which the subject had been referred by resolution of the Senate, reported a bill to provide for the publication of the debates and proceedings of Congress, in connected series, and to authorize one or more contracts for the purpose; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. PHELPS, from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, reported back, without amendment, and with a recommendation that it do pass, the bill from the House for the relief of the heirs or legal representatives of Nathaniel Pryor, deceased.

Also, made an adverse report on the petition of the heirs of Joseph King, a paymaster in the revolutionary war, praying for the settlement of his accounts and an allowance of bounty land; which was read, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. PHELPS, from the Committee on Pensions, reported back, without amendment, and with a recommendation that it do pass, the bill from the House entitled "An act to allow a pension to Nancy Williams, widow of David Williams, who was one of the captors of Major Andre."

Mr. SMITH of Indiana, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported back, with an amendment, the joint resolution from the House relating to patents for bounty land.

Mr. S. also, from the same committee, made an adverse report (which was ordered to be printed) on the petition of Lewis Lambert, praying allowance of interest on certain moneys paid by him for public lands, the sales of which were cancelled, and the moneys refunded.

On motion by Mr. S., the Committee on Public Lands was discharged from the further consideration of the memorial of the General Assembly of Indiana, praying allowance of bounty land to the rangers and militia in the service of the United States during the last war; and it was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. S. also, from the same committee, reported back, with an amendment, House bill entitled "An act for the relief of George Mayfield," approved July 27, 1842; then,

On motion by Mr. S., the above bill was taken up, as in committee of the whole; and its provisions having been explained by him, and the amendment agreed to, the bill was reported back to the Senate, read the third time, and finally passed.

Mr. S., from the same committee, reported a bill explanatory of an act in relation to lands sold in the Greensburg (late St. Helena) land district, approved August 29, 1842; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

On motion by Mr. CONRAD, the previous orders of the day were postponed, and the above bill was taken up, as in committee of the whole; and, there being no amendment offered, it was reported to the Senate, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. WILLIAMS was understood to inquire of the chairman whether the object of the bill was to take back the lands, and to give the purchasers their money; if so, he wanted some explanation of its provisions.

Mr. SMITH replied that the bill involved the same principles as were involved in the bill for the relief of Clark Woodroof, which had passed. This bill was explanatory of the act of last session, which authorized a return of the purchase money; and was rendered necessary, in consequence of the construction of the department, that they had the right to withhold the patents for land purchased in this district, until a new survey of the country could be had.

The CHAIR informed the Senator from Indiana that any discussion was now out of order, as the bill had been ordered to be engrossed.

Mr. McROBERTS, on leave, introduced a bill establishing a collection district at Chicago, Illinois; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. GRAHAM, from the Committee on Claims, reported back, without amendment, and with a recommendation that it do pass, the bill for the relief of Captain J. Throckmorton.

On motion by Mr. GRAHAM, the Committee on Claims was discharged from the further consideration of the memorial of Juan Quarre, praying compensation for property destroyed by the British in 1814, at Cat Island.

Mr. WILLIAMS presented a petition from William K. Weston, praying that a bond deposited by him in the War Department, for the performance of a contract with that department, may be returned; which was referred to the Judiciary Committee.

The resolution of Mr. LINN, fixing 11 o'clock, a. m., as the daily hour for the meeting of the Senate, from and after Saturday next, was taken up and adopted.

ASSUMPTION OF STATE DEBTS.

The resolutions submitted by Mr. RIVES yesterday came up for consideration.

Mr. RIVES stated the circumstances under which these resolutions came up as a substantive proposition, distinct from the resolutions of the Senator from South Carolina, and the additional resolutions offered by the Senator from Maine, to which they were intended to be offered as an amendment so soon as the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey should have been disposed of one way or other, had not these other propositions been laid on the table by the vote given yesterday. But the question of the debts of the States, and the interference of the General Government on that subject, having been once brought before the Senate by the Senator from Maine, he (Mr. RIVES) considered it his duty to present these resolutions for the purpose of obtaining a direct and unequivocal vote of the Senate. It was of the greatest importance to set at rest the idea which had got abroad, that this Government can have any constitutional power to saddle itself, in addition to its own debts, with a debt of two hundred millions of dollars, incurred by a portion of the States of the Union in their individual capacities, and for their own local purposes, and in the prosecution of their own local policy. The very suggestion of such an idea appeared to him so monstrous, and tending so obviously to a course of policy subversive of every principle upon which this Union had its existence, that he considered Congress was bound in duty to itself, and to the country, to put upon it promptly and at once the seal of its condemnation.

It would not do for gentlemen to deny that any question of assuming the debts of the States had been mooted to Congress. If it was not done directly, and in a substantive form, the way was paved for the proposition, and in a manner so plain and obvious, that no one could be left an instant in doubt as to the end to be attained. The proposition was, at the present moment, before the other branch of Congress, in a direct form, to grant to the State Governments scrip, based on the public lands, for the avowed purpose of relieving them from their indebtedness. The Senator from Maine, in his resolutions offered as amendatory of the resolutions of the Senator from South Carolina, had in this chamber, but a day or two since, promulgated the doctrine that it is the duty of Congress, by every constitutional and proper means in its power, by the adoption of measures to restore and preserve a currency of uniform value throughout the United States, by the collection and disbursement of the public revenue, and the regulation of the administration of the public finances, and in such way as shall be least burdensome to the people, &c., to render every practicable aid and encouragement to the people of the several States in their efforts to meet their engagements, and to discharge the obligations into which they have entered. What did all this mean, if it did not mean that it was the duty of the General Government to assist the indebted States in the payment of their debts? Mr. R. here entered at large into the history of the origin of this suggestion, and alluded to the recent action of the Legislatures of two of the indebted States renouncing this idea. He argued that now was the time to extinguish all delusive hopes of aid from the General Government. Let Congress convince the States, by a decisive and unanimous vote, that nothing of the kind will be entertained, and they will at once apply themselves to their own resources for liquidating their indebtedness. It was not his intention to enter at large into a discussion of the various topics bearing upon this subject. He had merely risen to explain his motives in offering these resolutions as a distinct measure, and would conclude by recommending that the vote be taken on them, and such amendments as might be offered, with a desire to avoid discussion as much as possible, and to express the sense of the Senate at the same time, promptly and unequivocally, without further interruption to the business of the session.

Mr. ALLEN begged the Senator from Virginia would accept an amendment which he would send to the Chair, to come in after the word "States" in the eighth line of the second resolution.

The amendment was read.

Mr. MERRICK did not see why the Senator from Virginia, after having stated his views, should expect other gentlemen would refrain from making such explanations as might be necessary in relation to their votes. He would not himself, for one, yield the right of the Senate to be catechised by a simple yes or no upon each of the Senator's propositions. All knew his anxiety to lay aside unprofitable discussion on mere abstractions leading to no practical result, that the legitimate business of legislation might be disposed of within the few days yet remaining of the session. But if the gentlemen on the other side were determined to introduce and re-introduce their abstractions, and to force gentlemen, who preferred going on with the regular business, to enter into discussion, the responsibility must rest on them—not on him (Mr. M.) and his friends. He had no vote or avowal on the subject now brought up to shrink from. He could not conceive why there was such an overweening anxiety at this time of general embarrassment—why there was such a constant effort—such relentless zeal—on the part of the General Government to join in the out-door and foreign denunciations of the indebted States; States which had incurred their responsibilities for the public good; which had not invoked the interference of the General Government; and into whose domestic arrangements the General Government had had no invitation to obtrude itself. Mr. M. proceeded at considerable length, and with much excitement, to deprecate the hue-and-cry raised against the indebted States. While he disclaimed and denounced as impolitic and unwise the assumption of the State debts by the General Government, he claimed for his own State, as he would for each of the States, its right to its distributive share of the public domain, which, having subserved the purposes for which it was intrusted to the General Government, he contended should now be restored to the States; that they, in their turn, might be relieved from their embarrassments when they most needed them. He concluded by offering an amendment, to come in its proper order, after the pending question on the motion to amend should be disposed of: [For this amendment, see proceedings of February 18.]

The amendment having been read by Mr. MERRICK himself, was, at the request of Mr. CALHOUN, again read by the Secretary of the Senate.

Mr. WOODBURY said he did not rise to debate these resolutions, but to express an earnest wish that a direct vote would be taken by the Senate on both the material propositions. An evasion, or go by, by postponement, or laying them on the table, was derogatory to the deep importance of the questions involved. This course need not lead to any protracted discussion or delay of the public business. The first question, relating to the assumption of State debts, had been fully argued in this body on a former occasion. His mind had been long made up upon it. The State he partly represented had no doubts in respect to it. It was his belief that such an assumption was as fatal a measure in its effects, as a measure formally to dissolve the Union. It destroyed all the limitations between the powers and duties of the Federal Government, and those of the separate States. It was consolidation, and of the rankest and worst character, because it was indirect and insidious.

But he would not now be tempted into the argument upon the subject. It was proper, however, to repel suggestions which had recently been thrown before the public, that such an assumption had before been made by the General Government. This was a wretched misconception. It was not such an assumption at the close of the revolutionary war, or since the late war, of debts incurred by the States in the prosecution of those glorious struggles which achieved and maintained our independence. By that assumption, we then paid only our own debts—only what the States had paid or expended for us in the prosecution of those wars. We paid—or assumed, if you please—only debts incurred in prosecuting the wars of the Confederation and Union, in objects belonging to the central and General Government. But all these debts, the assumption of which was now the subject of discussion, have been incurred for State objects; for local purposes; and many even for banking and other purposes most injudicious and ruinous; and none of them either by the request of Congress, or under its legislation, or under any responsibility to its authority.

The other question was connected with the distribution of the public lands—either directly, or by an issue of stock founded on them.

The objections to the principles involved in such a course—whether in reference to the Constitution or expediency—had been fully discussed, in recent sessions, in both Houses of Congress. He would not go into any of them; and he thought the Senate need not be delayed much, if any, in their discussion.

But, in the present condition of the finances, to talk of giving away two or three millions, which the treasury estimates from the public lands; or to talk of imposing six millions more on the treasury, for three per cent. interest on two hundred millions of stock, seemed to him to be perfect insanity.

The Secretary of the Treasury and the chairman of the Committee on Finance both think that, with all the receipts from the lands, and the use of near seven millions more of borrowed money, we may be barely able to make the ends of this calendar year meet.

Do any gentlemen, under these circumstances, propose to borrow six millions more?—or to levy direct taxes for that sum, in order to issue this famous two hundred millions of stock?

Talk about this stock—for what, sir? To injure State credit, and not strengthen it. This talk discredits the character and means of the States, which, if let alone, are perfectly competent in time to redeem their own obligations. We thus intimate that they are unable; while, if we step in, we also become spendthrift, bankrupt, and all are discredited together. No, sir. Our conduct is not, as the Senator supposes, that of a harsh or hard-hearted parent. On the contrary, the States are our parents—we, their children: they created us, and not we them; and, as children, we should abide by the Constitution, and orders and powers they have prescribed for us.

Let us, then, speak openly, decidedly, manfully, on questions so momentous; and set the public mind, at home and abroad, at rest on this subject. It is due to the occasion, and to the expectations of the world; and can be accomplished with little or no loss of time.

Mr. MILLER submitted the following amendment for consideration, that, when in order, it might be appended to the resolutions:

That, while we disclaim all obligation on the part of the General Government to assume the debts of the several States, the justice, wisdom, and policy of making distribution of the proceeds of the public lands among the several States, according to the federal population, is hereby admitted and affirmed.

Mr. MERRICK remarked that it would not be in order.

Mr. MILLER merely read it as a notification that he would move it when in order, as an amendment.

Mr. CONRAD moved a postponement of the subject to Tuesday next.

Mr. WALKER, on this motion, moved an amendment, that the postponement be till to-morrow instead of Tuesday.

The CHAIR explained that the vote would first be on the postponement for the longer time.

Mr. WALKER conceived his motion, as an amendment to the motion of the Senator from Louisiana would have precedence.

The CHAIR decided not.

Mr. KING said the Chair was right. But he would submit to the consideration of Senators, that, inasmuch as the repeal of the bankrupt act was a question to be discussed on Monday, and there could be no doubt it would not be got through in one, or, indeed, two days, whether a postponement of these resolutions to Tuesday would not virtually be the same as giving the question the go-by, the same as if laid on the table. The subject involved questions on which every Senator had made up his mind; for he could safely assert that no one question of general policy had ever received a more thorough discussion than that of the distribution of the proceeds of the public lands to the States; and there was nothing in the new idea of an assumption of the State debts, or the power of Congress in the matter, that could not be fully considered in one night; so that gentlemen could come to-morrow as well prepared to vote, as they could on any day next week. If put over till Tuesday, either the resolutions or bill for the repeal of the bankrupt act will have to be laid on the table; whereas both subjects may be disposed of by proceeding with the resolutions to-morrow, and voting on them before Monday; leaving that day free to proceed with the subject of the bankrupt law.

Mr. WRIGHT said he was compelled to say a word in consequence of the remarks of the Senator from Alabama, [Mr. KING,] touching the suggestions which he (Mr. W.) made as to the day proper to which to postpose the resolutions under discussion. When Monday was moved by the Senator from Louisiana, [Mr. CONRAD,] he (Mr. W.) suggested that Tuesday would be a better day. His strongest objection to postponing the subject till Monday, was, because the bankrupt bill had been postponed to, and made the order for, that day; on which day he hoped that bill would be taken up, and proceeded in till final action. He was the more willing for that course, because the resolutions now before the Senate, being more properly morning business, could be proceeded in during the morning hour of each day. Monday being the day proposed by the Senator from Louisiana to which to postpone, he (Mr. W.) was compelled to reject one or the other of the subjects as the business for that day; and it was in that alternative he suggested to the Senator from Louisiana Tuesday. Extremely anxious as he was to have a direct vote and expression of opinion by the Senate on these resolutions, which involved so many serious considerations, yet he believed it was more important to the country that the act for the repeal of the bankrupt law should be passed, than to have an expression of opinion on these resolutions. It was his desire that both questions should be voted upon and disposed of; and, with that view, he would first vote to postpone the resolutions till to-morrow; and, if not then, to the next day; and, if the matter was to be postponed till the next week, he should feel it his duty to vote for Tuesday as the day for their final disposition, that they might not interfere with the bankrupt act. If they were postponed till Tuesday, Senators would come there with the understanding that they were to be finally disposed of on that day. He had no doubt that it could be accomplished.

Mr. CALHOUN remarked that he was not among those who believed that these resolutions are mere abstractions. He held them in a very different light. The subject involved was one of the greatest magnitude ever presented to the consideration of the Senate of the United States. It was fraught with consequences, that no man who anticipated the worst, anticipated half as bad as the reality will be. As the question was presented, in his opinion they were under the highest obligations to themselves, to the public credit, to the States, to the country, and to the world, to have a free and direct expression of the opinion of the Senate on the subject of these resolutions. Considering this, as he did, he held the repeal of the bankrupt law—as obligatory as he felt that to be on the Senate, both on account of its unconstitutionality and inexpediency—as nothing compared to an expression of an opinion on these resolutions—absolutely nothing. If it depended upon his vote to decide between the two, he would not hesitate the hundredth part of a moment. He would consider the time well consumed, if they devoted every moment of the remaining time of the session to the discussing of that subject, except what was necessary to be devoted to the consideration of the appropriation bills; and even these should not stand in its way. But he did not deem it necessary to occupy so much time upon it; for there was scarcely a single aspect of the question which was not fully understood by the country. The only one which had not been fully discussed, and public attention strongly called to, was the proposition alluded to by the Senator from Maryland, of issuing $200,000,000 of stock, founded on the public domain, or its proceeds. He rejoiced that that Senator had not expressed himself favorable to the scheme, because it showed, even on his part, a flinching.

Mr. MERRICK interrupted, and said he flinched from nothing which duty required of him.

Mr. CALHOUN said he had not intended to irritate the honorable Senator by making use of the word; what he intended was, that he had shown rather a hesitation about expressing himself in favor of the proposed scheme. He was glad that the honorable Senator had done so. He supposed he countenanced an opinion rather against it.

Mr. MERRICK said he had made no specific proposition. What he said was, that his State claimed, as she had always claimed, her share of the public lands; but he was not prepared to say in what mode they should be distributed, but to leave it to the wisdom of Congress to determine.

Mr. CALHOUN said he would pass that by. That was the only aspect in which the question was not thoroughly discussed; but it was an aspec which required full and ample discussion—such discussion as, from the nature of the question, it ought to receive. That was the only practical form in which it could be presented to the country; and if there were any in the Senate who concurred in that proposition—which, he must say, was one pregnant with the greatest disasters, involving, as it did, the sovereignty of the States, the purity of the Constitution, the permanency of the Federal Union, and the happiness of the people,—he must say that, if there was any Senator in favor of the scheme, he hoped he would move a specific proposition; if not, that some one would present it in a negative form, that a direct vote might be taken upon it. The two parties (those in favor of assumption, and those opposed to it) stood in very different positions. The postponement of action would be on the side of those in favor of assumption; for it would be considered as a decision against us. He claimed, as a matter of fairness, (which, he was sure, gentlemen would accord,) to give those who were opposed to assumption in any form an express vote upon it, that the country might truly understand what were the impressions of that body upon a subject full of such momentous consequences. They were now standing in the midst of extraordinary times; the consequences of which would run far beyond the days of the youngest amongst them. Decide the question one way or the other. All that he wished was, that an early day should be appointed for taking the vote upon the subject; for the longer it was put off, the more improbable it would be that they would get an expression of opinion. And as the subject was not unfamiliar to Senators, he hoped they would go on with it to-morrow: that would afford ample time to investigate and mature their judgments. With this view, he concurred that the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WALKER] had the right to make the motion that it be postponed till to-morrow.

Mr. CONRAD said he still retained his original opinion, that the subject ought to be postponed to Tuesday. The experience of the Senator from Alabama always, in his opinion, was entitled to respect; and no doubt he was correct in stating that questions involved in these resolutions had been heretofore fully discussed, and gentlemen had made up their minds on most of them. But it must be admitted, that the power and policy of assuming the debts of the States had not—at least, since he and others had had a seat in that body—been discussed. And it was not proper to be called upon to vote on such questions, without time being given to examine into the subject, and to come to a just conclusion. This is a novel question—one that has arisen in the public mind within the last eighteen months. He concurred with the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. CALHOUN,] in viewing it as a most important and momentous question; and the more he viewed it in that light, the more impressed he was with the conviction that time should be given for its deliberate consideration. Mr. C. proceeded at considerable length to show why it was necessary to make the postponement till Tuesday.

Mr. HENDERSON called to the attention of the Senate a fact, (which it seemed to him had been overlooked,) that the first time the question of the assumption of the debts of the States was publicly mooted, was in the Senate in the session of 1839 and 1840, when a lengthy and elaborate discussion arose on resolutions, which he read from the journal. These resolutions he considered as full and declaratory on the part of Congress as any that could be now adopted. They were on the journal, without a dissenting vote on their passage; and, not being rescinded, should stand as the opinion of Congress till they were. Nothing new could be effected by a restoration of the same declaration. He gave a sketch, from his recollection, of the proceedings on their adoption. Until then, the idea of the assumption of the State debts had not even been broached in the newspapers. But they had not the effect of extinguishing the idea. It was one which had since spread widely through the country. If, then, the declaration of Congress failed to have the effect anticipated, what effect could be expected from its restoration? He entirely agreed with the Senator from Pennsylvania, who had stated his experience, that mere abstract resolutions never effect anything. Yet, if these resolutions, useless as they would be, and impeding as they did, by their discussion, the business of the session, were pressed to a vote, he should vote as he did on the occasion to which he had alluded; for his opinions had undergone no change as to the want of power in this Government to assume the debts of the States.

Mr. WALKER said his colleague was greatly mistaken in supposing that this question of assumption originated in this Senate, or in this country. No, sir, it is of foreign birth; it is of British origin. It crossed the Atlantic in 1839, in the form of an authentic circular, from British bankers, calling for that "more comprehensive guaranty" of the assumption of the debts of the States by this Government. The assumption was a British, and not an American proposition; and, as such, it was encountered by the resolutions of the Senate in 1839. But this British proposition is now re-echoed on this continent—it has been solemnly introduced by a distinguished member of the other House at this session—it appears, in part, in the resolutions now before us of the Senator from Maine, [Mr. EVANS,] and of the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. MERRICK.] The proposition we must now meet, is that proposed in the other House—to distribute two hundred millions of a stock debt of this Government among the States, to enable them to pay their debts. This stock is to bear an annual interest of 3 per cent., and professes to be based, in whole or in part, upon the public lands. This Government is now in debt twenty-eight millions; and this is to add two hundred millions to that debt. We have now a national debt of twenty-eight millions; we will have this year a further deficit of at least six millions, even including the sales of the public lands; and now, when we cannot meet the existing debt and existing expenditures, we are asked to add six millions per annum to that debt. How is this to be paid? The public lands yield but a million of net revenue; and yet we are asked to derive from them a net revenue of six millions of dollars—that is, we must increase six-fold the revenue to be derived from the public lands. The lands are now sold at $1 25 per acre; and we are now asked, if this stock is, in fact, to be based on the public lands, to increase the price six-fold; or, in other words, to sell them at $7 50 per acre. If, then, the basing of this stock upon the public lands be not a mere delusion, you must raise their price from $1 25 to $7 50 per acre; or, in other words, that the old States are to pay their debts by increasing six-fold the burdens of the people of the West and of the new States. The West—the oppressed and neglected West—the West, where scarcely one dollar of the public moneys is expended—is to be burdened with the payment of the debts of those States which monopolize all, or nearly all, the expenditures of this Government, by augmenting six-fold the price of the public lands. This is the result, if this stock is, in fact, based upon the public lands. But is it so based? If, with hundreds of millions of acres of the public lands now subject to entry, you sell but eight hundred thousand acres per annum, at $1 25 per acre; how much of these same lands would you sell at $7 50 per acre? Why, not enough to pay the expenses of the land system; and, in place of deriving six millions per annum, you would not receive one dollar of net revenue. How, then, without looking at the great question of the payment of the principal, are you to pay the six millions of annual interest? Is it by direct taxation by this Government? How would this alleviate the burden, unless you made the tax unequal and unjust, by taxing all the States to pay the debts of but a part of the States? And if not derived from the public lands, or direct taxation, what is the only remaining resource? Why, to derive an additional revenue of six millions per annum, to meet the interest alone, by increasing the tariff; and, ultimately, many millions more to discharge the principal. Can you do it when you have an existing debt of twenty-eight millions, and cannot pay the interest of that debt, much less the principal, and your annual expenditures from the lands and tariff combined? This, then, is a proposition to bankrupt this Government. But, if you could grind out of the people an additional revenue of six millions per annum, by increasing the tariff, would it be constitutional, just, or proper? What! tax the people of all the States, and the commerce and exports of all, to pay the debts of some of the States! The proposition is one of spoliation and plunder. But this proposition of assumption professes to be based on a horror of repudiation by the States. And is not this proposition an open and wholesale repudiation of all their debts by the States that are indebted? If the indebted States, refusing to pay their own debts, force other States, through the instrumentality of this Government, to pay those debts for them, it is repudiation; it is neglecting to pay themselves, and forcing others to pay for them; it is repudiation combined with spoliation and plunder, by a forcible seizure of the property of others, to discharge obligations they never contracted, and for which they are not liable. But, independent of this, the proposed assumption commences by repudiating one-half the debt. The debts of the States bear an interest of five, six, and seven per cent. per annum; and for this it is proposed to substitute an interest of three per cent. per annum. What is this but repudiating at once one-half the debt? And yet this double repudiation, by forcing some States to pay the debts of others, and expunging at once one-half the interest, is advocated by those who profess to base their action upon a horror of repudiation. But let me assure the Senator from Maryland that his object can never be accomplished; and it is an ignis fatuus and a delusion—a dream that can never be realized. Will the new States ever consent that the domain within their limits shall be mortgaged to British bankers, to pay the debts of other States? Sir, if this is done, what will be the rights of the new States, in regard to the public lands within their limits? It is an incident of sovereignty appertaining to every sovereign State, to tax all property, and especially all real estate, within its limits. It matters not who may be the owner—whether this Government or an individual. Thus it is that the State of Pennsylvania, for instance, taxes the very lands held for public purposes, and owned by the General Government, within the limits of that State; and the tax is collected and paid. What, then, on the same principle, prevents the new States from taxing the public lands within their limits? Nothing but their compact, on their admission into the Union, not to tax these lands—a compact which admits the right of taxation, and obtains its relinquishment on certain conditions. What are those conditions? Clearly that the proceeds of the sales of these lands shall continue to be applied—as they always had been—to carry on the operations of this Government. This, in the very nature of things, is the fundamental condition precedent on the part of this Government—the very consideration of the compact not to tax these lands; and it is a settled principle of all law, applying to all compacts, of individuals or sovereignties, that when one party violates such a condition of the compact on his part, the other party is absolved, and the compact annulled. If, then, you proceed with this assumption based upon the sales of these lands, the new States will have a perfect right, in law and morals, to tax all the public lands within their limits—and they will do it. Besides, the assumption, in the form proposed, is, in fact, a transfer of these lands to these British bankers; they would be the real owners, and we but the trustees; and to tax these lands, would be to tax their lands, and not yours. If, then, you will persist in this scheme, so unequal and unjust, and so clearly unconstitutional, and can, with British aid, pass such a law, Mr. WALKER said he deemed it his duty to declare, in advance, his determination never to relax his exertions until the supremacy of the Constitution should be restored, by the total repeal of the obnoxious statute.

Mr. BAGBY addressed the Senate for some time, but was not distinctly heard in the gallery. He was understood as having complimented the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HENDERSON] for his vote among the twenty-nine who passed the resolutions, which he had read from the journal, in 1839–40. He did not, however, consider that a unanimous vote of the Senate; for, although there was only a record of the affirmative vote, it was very well known that many of the gentlemen on the opposite side then, as now, shrunk from committing themselves at all; and, with the exception of some two or three of their party (who, like the Senator from Mississippi, had the hardihood to record their names with the twenty-nine,) it was left to the Democracy to enter their protest, in the face of the world, against the monstrous supposition that the question even could be entertained, without laying the foundation for the dissolution of the Union. He combated as unfounded the assertion that this was a question not entertained by the opposite party until lately; and referred to his own inaugural message, as Governor of Alabama in 1837, in which he denounced the incipient proposition in such terms as had attracted the notice of a distinguished editor, who, in commenting on it, contrasted that message with the messages delivered to the Legislatures of thirteen other States, every one of which had passed over the subject.

He referred to the letter of a celebrated British banker to General Harrison, when President of the United States, and asked,—would any British banker have dared to make such a proposition to General Jackson or Mr. Van Buren? But that letter was addressed to a party in power, which the writer considered pledged to the views he urged; and it was followed up by more definite propositions to the new Secretary of State. British stock-jobbers and money-changers then undertook to teach the Government of the United States the law of political and national morality. Yet, instead of the rebuke and repulse their temerity deserved, their letters were kindly received, and they were courteously answered that they needed no reply. Could not the very same policy which then pervaded the Cabinet, be detected as now prevailing here in relation to these resolutions? It is the very same policy: to keep this question in suspension—as near the surface as possible—till it takes hold of the public mind. If no doubt exists as to the power of Government in this matter, why not come out at once and avow it? Why conceal any opinion entertained on the subject? Those who denied the power, said so fearlessly; and not only denounced the proposition on constitutional grounds, but as, in its policy, utterly subversive of the principles of the Union.

Mr. B. next proceeded to examine the tendency of the resolution of the Senator from Maine, touching the indebtedness of the States, and the language in which that Senator had expressed himself, that no proposition in relation to their condition was to be brought forward in this Congress. He commented, at considerable length, on the ultimate issue of the course pursued on the other side, and contended that any evasion of the direct vote now demanded would be appreciated as it deserved by the world.

Mr. ALLEN said he had moved this amendment because he believed that the resolutions proposed by the Senator from Virginia, having reference to the policy of the assumption of State debts by the General Government, by means of the issue of Government stock predicated upon the public lands, were not sufficiently specific; because they did not contain a sufficiently explicit negative to the proposed scheme. And he would here take occasion to say, that he regarded the question involved in these resolutions as something more than a mere abstract question, the decision of which would be of no import—as something more than the vague abstractions of human reasoning, which could produce no effect upon human affairs.

Sir, (said Mr. A.,) these resolutions, if voted on, will test the opinion of Senators, acting under the highest human responsibility, upon a question of the deepest moment to the whole United States; and by that expression of opinion they will be bound in future, or else they will subject themselves to censure by departing from it in their future action regarding this project of issuing two hundred millions of Government stock. If it were merely a question as to wasting that much of the public money, it would be one of less importance than it now is. But it is a quection involving the power of taxation—that power which is considered the supreme power under every form of government, and upon which all other powers are predicated. The question here involved is, whether you will stretch the powerful arm of this Government over the several States, and permit it to engulf in its voracious maw all the taxing power, both national and State; in other words, it is a question of expunging the State constitutions and Governments through the agency of taxation. It is the assumption of a power on the part of this Government which was never contemplated by those who participated in the formation of the Federal Constitution. An abstraction, indeed! Why, you might say, with equal propriety, that the declaration of American independence was a mere abstraction; inasmuch as that declaration did not accomplish the result which it contemplated, but imposed the necessity of resorting to arms in order to accomplish it. Was that a mere abstraction? No, sir, it was ranked with the highest of political acts; yet it was as much an abstraction as the resolutions before you. It was the Senator from Maine who introduced this all-exciting topic and at a moment when Congress is almost at its last gasp—when it is just about to expire. It was that gentleman who has thrown this firebrand amongst us—for a firebrand, I fear, it will be to the whole country. He spoke with some degree of censure of the resolutions of the gentleman from Missouri. Why, nobody dreamed two years ago of the assumption of State debts by the General Government; but now we find it is openly proclaimed in one branch of the Government, and advocated in the Legislatures of several of the States. It was intimated upon this floor, in the discussion this morning, as being a question on which the Senate would soon have to act efficiently and affirmatively. The idea seems to have travelled with locomotive rapidity. As to the origin of the idea, no Senator has declared that it is entirely of British origin. Perhaps it may not be altogether of British origin; perhaps it may have originated by the conjunction of the schemes of men of both nations. The idea of the insecurity of American stocks was first started by British capitalists. And an American citizen, robed with senatorial purple, was consulted by them as an attorney, to solve the question. They not only entertained some doubts as to the security of those stocks, but they were looking out earnestly for other security, in order to render it safe in the hands of the holders. This was anterior to the last presidential election. And when the idea was thrown out, it was met by the Democratic party in the Senate by a negative vote upon the resolution of the Senator from Kentucky, denying the doctrine of assumption. From that time, the Democratic party stood committed against assumption, and against British influence in favor of assumption. And from that moment we witnessed the most diabolical attempts to overthrow the Democratic power in this country. We found the country thenceforward agitated by an unseen, a subterranean element, for which no one could account. As soon as the die was cast, and that party was rendered for the ensuing four years powerless as to the affairs of the Government, it was then that the assumption of State debts began to be openly proposed by those through whose agency the English bankers and capitalists hoped to obtain the accomplishment of that object, to them so desirable. Then it was that the counsellor of those bankers, clothed in the ermine of a Senator, first brought forward the proposition of assumption. And let me tell gentleman on the other side, that I, for one, fully expect to find the same hidden elements, the same secret agency, entering into the approaching contest for the government of this country. I fully believe that English capitalists, who have more than one hundred millions of property depending, as they suppose, upon the ascendency of one of the political parties in this country over the other; that they, merchants as they are, and therefore vigilant when money is at stake, will not permit the same Democratic party, with the resolutions which they passed two years ago still standing upon the record, to come into power; for, in such a case, the assumption of State debts would be rendered entirely hopeless. And I now predict, contrary to the general opinion which prevails upon this subject, that the influence which is to be rewarded by the assumption of State debts will be at work upon the public mind, and that it will create the most severe and terrible struggle at the next presidential election, that ever endangered the harmony of the people of this country. The election will not pass off as did the last. And though gentlemen on the other side do not, I am sure, desire such a state of things, it will not be in the power of all the politicians of the whole country to avoid or resist this secret, all-pervading influence, which two hundred millions of perilled capital can exercise in a country such as ours.

Sir, I have expressed my opinions two or three times already upon this question of the assumption of State debts. I have spoken as one of the representatives of a State in debt; and I have not spoken in a whisper, nor have I spoken in jest. I have spoken earnestly and openly, both here and upon the rostrum, amid the assemblages of the sovereign people. My sentiments are known. They are not new; nor have I been disposed to save myself, by shrinking from responsibility, as I had every inducement to do, did I entertain a fear of being rebuked by the voice of the people of an indebted State. No, sir. I have fearlessly expressed my views; and if I have expressed them strongly, it is because my convictions are strong. And I am one, at least, who utters nothing but what he believes to be true; and who utters what he so believes, regardless of all consequences that may result to himself, individually.

Yes, these resolutions will do much—they will show to the country what are the sentiments of her public men. If the gentleman from Maine, with his standing in this body and before the country, as one of the leading lights of the Whig party, would declare it to be his opinion that the Government possesses no power to pay the debts of the States; and that, if we did possess the power, it would be highly impolitic to do so;—if he would thus cut off the hopes of the British capitalists, he would accomplish two important objects. Should his example be followed by the able men of his party, he will have accomplished the great object of turning the attention of the States to the means of their own relief; and he will have accomplished another important object, namely: warning the country against the exercise of British influence upon American politics in the struggle of 1844. Without this, that influence is as natural and certain as the succession of one day to another.

And I desire to proclaim it now, that, if the Government do not take a decided and unequivocal stand upon this question, and say to these scrip holders, You have nothing to hope for from either party, be the result of the election what it may;—if, instead of saying this, you continue to stand in an ambiguous position, this moneyed influence will be brought to bear—will unquestionably be brought to bear upon this country, and to contaminate the freedom of our elections. Does any man believe that the Democracy of this country—the pulsations of whose patriotic hearts are felt to the extremities of the Union—does any one suppose they will allow such a law to remain unrepealed? No, sir; we give you warning in advance. I do not believe that it will be in the power of the Senate to do an act which will tend more to establish the honor and credit of this country, and to ward off the insidious influences of foreign capitalists, than by the passage of these resolutions. Believing this, I shall continue to press upon the Senate the propriety of taking a specific vote.

The question then came up on Mr. CONRAD'S motion to postpone the further consideration of the subject to Tuesday next.

Mr. WALKER renewed his call for the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

The vote was then taken by yeas and nays, and resulted in the negative—yeas 19, nays 22, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Archer, Barrow, Bates, Bayard, Berrien, Choate, Conrad, Crafts, Crittenden, Evans, Graham, Huntington, Mangum, Merrick, Miller, Morehead, Smith of Indiana, Sprague, and Tallmadge—19.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Bagby, Benton, Buchanan, Calhoun, Fulton, Henderson, King, Linn, McDuffie, McRoberts, Phelps, Rives, Smith of Connecticut, Sturgeon, Tappan, Walker, Wilcox, Williams, Woodbury, Wright, and Young—22.

The question next came up on the motion to postpone till to-morrow; which was carried in the affirmative, without a count.

The PRESIDENT pro tem. laid before the Senate a communication from the Treasury Department, reporting, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of the 14th inst., a statement showing that the receipts from customs for the month of January was $913,700: ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

Also, laid before the Senate a communication from the Treasury Department, transmitting a report from the Commissioner of the General Land Office, on the subject of the surveys, &c. of the public lands in Louisiana; which, on motion by Mr. EVANS, was referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

The bill explanatory of the act in relation to the lands sold in the Greensburg (late St. Helena) land district, was read the third time, and passed.

Several bills from the House were read, and referred to appropriate committees; among them House bill 548, for the reduction of the pay to members of Congress, and civil, military, and naval officers. On the question of reference of the retrenching bill, some doubt seeming to arise as to the appropriate committee,

Mr. WRIGHT suggested that the Committee on Retrenchment would be the proper committee.

Mr. BARROW moved its reference to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. WOODBURY moved an amendment, to refer it to the Committee on Retrenchment.

The question was first taken on Mr. BARROW'S motion; and there appeared to be for it, 15; against it, 12. But a fresh count being demanded, the motion was negatived—ayes 17, noes 18.

So the bill was referred to the Committee on Retrenchment—ayes 24, noes not counted.

The bill to indemnify Maj. Gen. Andrew Jackson for damages sustained in the discharge of his official duty, came up in order as in committee of the whole, on the amendment of the Committee on the Judiciary.

The bill for the relief of the heirs of Madam De Lasser was read a third time and passed.

Mr. LINN called for the yeas and nays on the amendment; which were ordered.

Mr. BERRIEN remarked that it was too late an hour to commence the consideration of the bill. The Senate was thin, and he suggested the propriety of its postponement till to-morrow.

Mr. LINN was desirous to press action on the bill at once. It had been the unfinished business from day to day for some time, and he could not consent to give it the go-by any longer, or give other business the precedence over it. He thought he could occupy the remainder of the day in giving many reasons why the substitute for the bill, reported by the Committee on the Judiciary, should not be adopted.

Several suggestions were made as to the disposition of the bill for this day, to which Mr. L. refused to yield; but at last he yielded the floor to Mr. MOREHEAD, on whose motion

The Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, February 16, 1843.

The journal having been read,

The SPEAKER then stated to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. J. P. KENNEDY] that his bill on the subject of reciprocity treaties was the regular order of business, and would be called up then, unless he consented to waive it for an hour, to permit the reception of reports of committees.

Mr. KENNEDY assenting, and by general consent, the standing committees were called on for reports; and the following were made:

OREGON TERRITORY.

Mr. ADAMS, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to which had been referred the bill from the Senate for the adoption of measures for the occupation and settlement of the Oregon Territory, and for extending the laws of the United States over the same, together with the House bill on the same subject, reported them without amendment, with the recommendation that they do not pass.

Mr. TALIAFERRO, from the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions, reported the following bills; which were read twice, and committed:

A bill authorizing the survey and examination of sites for light-houses and light-boats.

Mr. AYCRIGG, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, made adverse reports upon the petitions of John Bull, jr., Simon Kenton, John Dixon, Christopher Lambert, John Owen, Empson Hamilton, and Sarah Pratt.

Mr. J. P. KENNEDY, from the Committee on Commerce, moved that the bill to establish a warehousing system be made the special order for to-morrow, with the understanding that it be disposed of during the day.

Mr. PICKENS said he hoped no such agreement would be made by the House.

Mr. J. P. KENNEDY expressed his intention to move a suspension of the rules; but, after a few words of conversation between him and the Speaker, the subject dropped.

Mr. A. RANDALL moved that the Committee on Commerce be discharged from the consideration of the petitions from inhabitants of the State of Maine relative to the effects of foreign treaties, and that the same be committed to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. The motion was agreed to.

On the motion of Mr. BURKE, it was ordered that Jesse Roberts have leave to withdraw his petition and accompanying papers from the files of the House.

On the motion of Mr. STOKELY, it was resolved that the Committee on the Militia be instructed to inquire and report what amendments are necessary and proper to the laws of the United States, to insure the preservation of the public arms of the United States distributed to the militia of the several States; and to report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. RENCHER, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to which was referred the bill from the Senate entitled "An act for the relief of Benjamin Murphy," reported the same, with an amendment; and it was committed to the Committee of the Whole House.

On the motion of Mr. ROOSEVELT, it was

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury inform this House at what time an answer may be expected to the resolution adopted on the 6th day of August last, calling upon him to furnish this House with copies of the quarterly accounts of the collectors, naval officers, and surveyor of the port of New York, required by the act of March 3, 1841, of moneys received by them respectively for forfeitures, rents, compromises, &c.

Mr. W. SMITH submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That, in all future publications of the Army and Navy Register of the United States, there shall be affixed, opposite the name of each person published therein, in separate columns, the annual pay of such officer or person, the amount paid him for rations, servants, and forage, and the gross amount paid or allowed him in all respects for and on his account, and for and during the year preceding such publication.

The resolution was adopted.

U. S. SQUADRONS ON FOREIGN SERVICE.

Mr. BURNELL submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he hereby is, directed to report to this House, at the next session of Congress, a statement of the several vessels composing the squadrons of the United States for the last six years, together with the names of the commanders of such squadrons, and the name of the officer commanding each vessel of every squadron. Also, the foreign ports which each vessel has entered during the time of her remaining on her station, or while proceeding to it, and the time which she remained in each of said ports; and where the public service has been a cause of unusual detention, that he state the same; and, also, whether, in his opinion, any such vessels have remained unnecessarily long in foreign ports; whether the attention of the commander of any squadron has, in all such cases, been called thereto; what such cases have been; and what proceedings have been instituted in relation to them; and that hereafter the Secretary of the Navy report to this House annually, at the commencement of each session of Congress, a statement, as above, applicable to the current year.

Mr. WISE objected to the reception of the resolution.

Mr. BURNELL said, if he could have the opportunity to explain, he thought the House would adopt the resolution. It called upon the Secretary of the Navy to report, at the next session of Congress, on a subject upon which the country had been held in almost total ignorance.

Mr. WISE called the gentleman to order—the resolution not being debatable, as it had been objected to.

Mr. BURNELL continued to explain. He said he was calling for information a year hence.

Mr. WISE called the gentleman to order.

Mr. BURNELL said he was only following the example of the gentleman from Virginia himself.

Mr. WISE demanded when he had set him the example?

The two gentlemen sat down, making mutual explanations, and the subject went over.

Mr. BURNELL, however, rose again in a short time, and moved a suspension of the rules for the reception of that resolution.

The question was taken, and the motion negatived.

THE SOMERS CASE.

Mr. SNYDER submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary inquire whether Samuel R. Betts, district judge of the United States for the southern district of New York, refused to entertain a complaint of murder, alleged to have been committed on the high seas, upon the ground that he had other business of a civil nature to occupy his time; and to report to this House the proper proceedings to be taken on the occasion.

Mr. SNYDER sent up to the Clerk's table the following communication of Judge Betts, to be read to the House:

"Application is renewed before me this evening, on the affidavit of Margaret E. Cromwell, for a warrant to arrest Commander Mackenzie and Lieutenant Gansevoort, for illegal homicide, committed by them on board the United States brig-of-war Somers, on the high seas, on the 1st day of December last, in putting to death Philip Spencer, Samuel Cromwell, and Elisha Small.

"Without scanning the allegations upon which process is demanded on this second application, or at all entering into the inquiry as to the forum properly having cognizance of the charges; and supposing that no question was involved as to the competency of the civil courts to take jurisdiction of the matter, or of the fitness of their so doing, I do not feel that the complaint is one that I ought to entertain and investigate under existing circumstances.

"By the act of September 24, 1789, section 33, Congress authorized a justice or judge of the courts of the United States, or any judge or justice of the peace of the State, to cause any person accused of an offence against the laws of the United States to be arrested, committed, or bailed, as the case might require.

"The act of Congress of 23d August, 1841, extended the like authority to commissioners appointed by the circuit court.

"There are a large number of officers resident in this city and Kings county, who have equal authority to institute and entertain these proceedings with the judges of the United States courts.

"The judicial business of the district courts of this district, including the administration of the bankrupt act, is, by various acts of Congress, assigned to the district judges exclusively. It is notorious that these ministerial duties absorb the entire time of the district judge of this district, and that he has not been able, since the 1st of February last, to devote any portion of his time out of court to cases of criminal complaints, every one of which has necessarily been first brought before and passed upon by some other of the above authorized officers. Nor has he been able to sit with the circuit judge in court during that period, except in a few cases requiring indispensably the presence of both judges.

"It is most manifest, from the details given in the affidavit of Mrs. Cromwell, that if the civil magistrate takes cognizance of this complaint, he must necessarily go into a particular examination of all the facts and circumstances attendant upon the homicide, to ascertain whether it be a case for commitment; and if so, whether bail can be allowed, and under what terms.

"The affidavit states that the naval court of inquiry has been employed from day to day in examining witnesses in relation to this matter, from the 30th day of December last to this day: and, although some greater despatch might probably be attained before a civil magistrate, in the mere examination of witnesses; yet, as the prosecutrix has employed private counsel, and prays to be heard by them; and as, doubtless, in case of any proceeding, counsel will be allowed the accused,—the disposition of questions of evidence, and other points incident to like examinations, may reasonably be expected to consume an amount of time equivalent to what can be saved by the greater expedition of a single magistrate in taking proofs.

"This would accordingly compel me to suspend the business now pressing upon the court for a period of two or three weeks, and devote that length of time to the hearing of these charges.

"It was, no doubt, a motive of weight with Congress, in conferring power on so many officers to take preliminary examinations on criminal charges, to leave the judges of the United States courts free to devote themselves to other duties exclusively allotted to them.

"Under these circumstances, I return the papers submitted me to the prosecutrix.

(Signed) "SAM'L R. BETTS."

"NEW YORK,
Thursday evening, Jan. 19, 1843."

Mr. SNYDER desired also to have read the letter of Mr. Benjamin F. Butler; but objection was made. He moved a suspension of the rules.

The motion to suspend the rules was rejected—ayes 30, noes not counted.

The following is the letter referred to:

TRIAL OF COMMANDER MACKENZIE.

FOURTH DAY—FEBRUARY 4.

Before the court-martial resumed its proceedings this morning, Benjamin F. Butler, esq., had a lengthy conversation with the judge advocate, and afterwards seated himself at one of the side-tables, prepared to take notes of the proceedings

All the members of the court were present at 11 o'clock, with the exception of Captain Smith, who is seriously indisposed.

The judge advocate informed the court that he had received a communication from a distinguished member of the New York bar; and, as it contained nothing improper, he would lay it before the court.

The court was then cleared for upwards of an hour. After our readmission, the judge advocate read the following document:

"The undersigned beg to state that they have been employed by the relatives of acting midshipman Philip Spencer, (one of the persons for the murder of whom Commander Mackenzie is on trial,) to attend this trial, and take part therein as counsel, if permitted by the court. The undersigned, therefore, most respectfully request that they may be permitted, as such counsel, to be present; to examine and cross-examine the witnesses produced, by propounding such questions as may be approved by the court; and to offer, from time to time, such suggestions in relation to the proceedings, and to present such comments on the testimony when concluded, (subject to the like approbation of the court,) as they may deem necessary.

"The undersigned respectfully offer their opinion, that the court possesses full power to do so; and that the nature of the investigation to be had, and the interest naturally and justly felt therein by those for whom they appear, render it proper that the same should be granted by the court.

"BENJAMIN F. BUTLER,
"CHARLES O'CONNOR.

"NEW YORK, February 4, 1843."

The Judge Advocate: I am ordered to read the following decision:

"The court is of opinion that the above communication be placed on the record, and decide that the application contained in it be not granted."

The President: The court stands adjourned till Monday at 11 o'clock.

The court accordingly adjourned.

MINT AT DAHLONEGA.

Mr. M. A. COOPER asked the favor of the House to take up and pass the bill which he had introduced, entitled "A bill explanatory of the act establishing a branch mint at Dahlonega, Georgia, and regulating and defining the duties of assayer and coiner of said mint."

Mr. J. R. INGERSOLL stated that the director of the Philadelphia mint wrote to him some time since, expressing great solicitude about this bill, and desiring to know its provisions. He (Mr. I.) enclosed the director a copy of the bill, but had not yet heard from him on the subject. He suggested that it would be better to wait for further information before the passage of the bill was urged.

Mr. M. A. COOPER said no one would have any objection to this bill. Its object was merely to define the duties of assayer and coiner, which are now assigned by the director of the mint.

The bill was then read a third time, and passed.

OCRACOKE MARINE HOSPITAL.

On motion of Mr. WASHINGTON, the bill in relation to the marine hospital at Ocracoke, N. C., (reappropriating $10,000 to that institution,) was taken up.

No objection having been made, the bill was ordered to be engrossed, and then read a third time and passed.

ELECTIONS TO THE NEXT CONGRESS.

Mr. J. CAMPBELL said he would make another attempt to have his bill (No. 649) taken up—to suspend the operation, for two years, of the second section of the act of 1842, apportioning the representatives to Congress among the several States. [The effect of this bill will be to repeal the clause by which the States are directed to elect members from single districts in every State.]

Mr. FILLMORE objected to having any special day set apart for any bill like this, when so many appropriation bills remained undisposed of. If, however, this bill was to be taken up, he wished another bill, (651,) "regulating the manner of taking testimony in contested elections," to be acted on at the same time.

Mr. J. CAMPBELL moved to discharge the Committee of the Whole from the further consideration of the bill which he had referred to.

Mr. FILLMORE moved to discharge the committee from the second named bill above mentioned.

The motions were severally put and carried.

PRECEDENCE OF BUSINESS.

Mr. J. P. KENNEDY having obtained the floor—

Mr. PICKENS rose to a question of order. He wished to know whether the subject (reciprocity treaties) assigned as a special order for yesterday, was entitled to come up and have precedence to-day.

The SPEAKER said it would; having been called up by the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. KENNEDY] just before the adjournment.

Mr. WISE said it was called up, but no action taken on it by the House.

Mr. PICKENS, regarding this as an important point, wished to have it decided. When so many important bills remained undecided—the army bill, the civil and diplomatic bill, the exchequer bill—he wished to see if it was the will of the House to put them aside, for measures of a partial interest. It often happened that days were set apart for the transaction of Territorial and District business, which was not taken up; yet no one claimed that it should go over from day to day, and have precedence.

The SPEAKER said, that to assign a day to Territorial or District business generally, was different from assigning a day to the consideration of a particular bill. Should the House specify the the bills which were to be acted on, whenever it assigned a day for Territorial or District business, such bills would, of course, have precedence from day to day, until disposed of; but such was not the practice of the House.

Mr. PICKENS said he did not understand the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. KENNEDY] as calling up his joint resolution.

The SPEAKER said the gentleman from Maryland did call it up, as the journal showed.

The vote was then taken upon the appeal of the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. PICKENS] from the decision of the Speaker, and the judgment was sustained.

On motion of Mr. W. O. BUTLER, the Committee of the Whole were discharged from the consideration of the bill to amend the act respecting the organization of the army, and for other purposes.

RECIPROCITY TREATIES.

On motion of Mr. KENNEDY of Maryland, the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. TILLINGHAST in the chair,) and took up the following joint resolution:

JOINT RESOLUTION concerning the termination of certain commercial treaties.

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, requested, whenever he shall deem it compatible with the public interest, to make known to the Governments of Denmark, Sweden, the Hanseatic republics, Prussia, Austria, and Russia, in conformity with the stipulations of the existing commercial treaties between said Governments and the United States, the desire and intention of this Government to terminate such commercial treaties now in force between said Governments and the United States as have contracted to allow the parties thereto to import on equal terms, as regards duties on merchandise and tonnage, each into the ports of the other, goods, wares, and merchandise other than those of the growth, produce, or manufacture of the nation in whose vessels the same are borne.

SEC. 2. And be it further resolved, That, in all future negotiations which may be opened with the aforesaid Governments, or with any other, it is the policy of the United States to confine the privilege of reciprocal importation, on equal terms as to goods and shipping, to goods, wares, and merchandise the product of the countries from whence, and in whose ships, they are imported, or the product of such contiguous countries thereto as usually carry on their foreign commerce through the ports of the same.

Mr. KENNEDY addressed the committee at length, explaining the object of the resolution, and reviewing our commercial treaties generally.

Mr. McKEON next addressed the committee on the subject of the bill; but he expressed his apprehension that there was scarcely time to effect much good legislation thereon at the present session. He then went at length into the broad question.

Mr. CUSHING followed in advocacy of the resolution.

Mr. TRIPLETT next took part in the discussion, and submitted an addition as an amendment, to protect the commerce of the United States, as the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. J. P. KENNEDY,] by his resolution, which was then under consideration, only proposed to protect the navigating interests; and he proceeded to explain and advocate his amendment. He admitted that he considered it too late to effect much at this advanced period of the session; and that he had mainly risen, therefore, to call attention to the subject; and he hoped his amendment would be printed, that it might be considered preparatory to future legislation.

Mr. FILLMORE asked the committee to report these resolutions to the House, that they might be brought under its control and disposed of to-day.

Mr. BREWSTER appealed to his colleague to to allow him to make some remarks in committee; and he appealed to him more particularly on the ground that he did not often trouble the House, and would not now, were it not that he considered this a subject of particular importance.

Mr. FILLMORE said he had simply risen to make an appeal to the House; and with that he considered he had discharged his duty. He begged to remind gentlemen that most of the appropriation bills remained to be acted upon—and appropriation bills of a most important character, including one reported from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, in relation to the boundary treaty, and other bills of great interest to the country; amongst which there was the bill in relation to the warehousing system, while there were but 13 working days of the session remaining. It was indispensable, therefore, that this subject should be disposed of to-day.

Mr. BREWSTER said it was very seldom that he troubled the House; but he must ask the privilege of doing so now. He then proceeded to discuss the general principles involved in the resolutions, illustrating his positions by numerous references, and treating the subject in an elaborate and argumentative manner.

After Mr. BREWSTER had concluded his remarks,

Mr. FILLMORE moved that the committee rise, in order that he might make a motion to discharge it from the further consideration of the subject. It was apparent to all, that this resolution could not be passed, or sufficiently discussed, at this late period of the session; and that it delayed the action of the House on objects of indispensable necessity. Mr. F., however, withdrew his motion at the request of Mr. WILLIAMS of Connecticut, who, after a few remarks, renewed the motion, and the committee rose and reported progress.

Mr. KENNEDY moved to discharge the Committee of the Whole from the further consideration of the resolution; which was agreed to.

Mr. UNDERWOOD offered a resolution directing the Secretary of the Treasury to make a report to Congress, at the next session, on the subject of the inspection laws of the State of Louisiana.

After the reading and reference of several communications from the Executive Departments, the following bills were twice read and referred:

The bill relating to the appointment of Assistant Postmasters General.

The joint resolution for the distribution of the Compendium of the Sixth Census; and

The joint resolution for the transfer of the stock held by the United States in the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal Company to the State of Maryland, and the cities of Washington, Georgetown, and Alexandria, on certain conditions.

The House then adjourned.

IN SENATE.

FRIDAY, February 17, 1843.

Mr. CUTHBERT, Senator from Georgia, appeared in his seat to-day.

Mr. WRIGHT presented the proceedings of a meeting of the Chamber of Commerce of New York, in reference to the bill which came to this body from the House of Representatives, proposing a reduction of the number of officers and others employed in the custom-house of New York city. Mr. W. remarked that this meeting of the Chamber of Commerce was held on the 14th instant. They unanimously adopted a report at that meeting, a copy of which he now presented. It embodied, in an extended form, the views of the merchants of that city as to the wants of commerce and business there, according to their experience. He was exceedingly desirous that the statements in this report should be read by Senators before the bill should be acted upon; and, with that view, he proposed to make the motion that it be printed; and he hoped the Senate would indulge him by giving their unanimous consent for that purpose, to do away with the necessity for the reference of the motion to the Committee on Printing; and, as another inducement for that course, he remarked that the Committee on Commerce, who had unanimously reported favorably to the passage of the bill, (at a meeting of the committee at which he was not present,) had since instructed their chairman to move the recommitment of the bill to that committee.

The memorial was then ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. W. also presented a statement of the business of the port of New York by a comparison of the years 1826, 1827, and 1828, with the years 1839, 1840, and 1841. The statement (said Mr. W.) contained information valuable to the Senate, while acting on this bill. He therefore moved that it be printed, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. HUNTINGTON said he had been directed by the Committee on Commerce to ask the Senate to recommit the bill to reduce the number and compensation of the officers and others employed in the port of New York; and, with that view, on his motion, the above bill was taken up and recommitted.

Mr. H., from the same committee, reported back, without amendment, and with a recommendation that it do pass, the bill to continue in force an act therein mentioned, relating to the port of Baltimore.

On motion by Mr. HUNTINGTON, the previous orders of the day were postponed, and the above bill was taken up as in committee of the whole; and no amendment being proposed, it was reported to the Senate, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. H. also reported back from the same committee, without amendment, and with a recommendation that it do pass, House bill entitled "An act to reduce the salary of the surveyor of the port of Camden, New Jersey."

Mr. ARCHER presented a memorial from Buckner Thruston, representative of Charles Wynn Thruston, deceased, an officer in the revolutionary army, praying to be allowed commutation pay: referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

Mr. BAYARD presented a memorial from sundry citizens of Delaware, urging upon Congress the passage of a law authorizing the issue of $200,000,000 of stock, based on the public domain, to be divided among the States and Territories in a representative ratio, for their relief; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Several adverse reports of standing committees on private claims were taken up, and concurred in.

Mr. SEVIER, from the Committee on Pensions, reported back, without amendment, and with a recommendation that they do pass, House bills for the relief of Lyman N. Cook, and for the relief of Solomon Emerson.

Mr. S. also, from the same committee, reported back, with an amendment, the bill for the relief of Jeremiah Kimball.

Mr. S. also, from the same committee, reported back, without amendment, and with a recommendation that they be indefinitely postponed, the following bills from the House, viz:

The bill for the relief of Jane McGuire, widow of Major Thomas McGuire;

The bill for the relief of Mary Elder; and

The bill for the relief of Patrick Masterton.

Mr. PHELPS, from the Committee on Pensions, reported back, without amendment, (accompanied by special reports, which were ordered to be printed) the following bills from the House, viz:

The bill for the relief of Elizabeth Harris.

The bill for the relief of Leah Tenure; and

The bill for the relief of Henry Freeman.

Mr. PHELPS, from the Committee on Pensions, reported a bill for the relief of Ashael Brainard; which was read, and ordered to a second reading, accompanied by a special report, which was ordered to be printed.

On motion by Mr. PHELPS, the Committee on Pensions was discharged from the memorial of the widow of Richard Zantzinger; and it was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. PHELPS, from the Committee on Pensions, reported back, without amendment, and with a recommendation that it do pass, the bill for the relief of Elizabeth Gresham, widow of George Gresham.

Mr. P., from the same committee, reported back, without amendment, and with a recommendation that they be indefinitely postponed, house bill for the relief of George Hommell, and the bill granting a pension to Joseph Watson.

Mr. BAGBY, from the Committee on Pensions, reported back, without amendment, and with a recommendation that it do pass, the bill for the relief of Elizabeth Powers.

Mr. DAYTON, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, reported back, with an amendment, the bill to fix the compensation of the Commissioner of Public Buildings.

Several bills from the House were read twice, and referred to appropriate committees.

On motion by Mr. BARROW, the previous orders of the day were postponed, and the Senate took up, as in committee of the whole, the bill from the House for the relief of Thomas King of Tennessee.

The bill was opposed by Mr. KING, on the ground that, if the individual was entitled to an invalid pension, he could, on application at the department, procure it under the general law.

Mr. SEVIER explained why it was he could not receive a pension under the general law, of which he contended that, in justice, he was entitled.

There being no amendment proposed to the bill, it was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, was read a third time and passed—ayes 15, noes 12.

On motion by Mr. BARROW, the previous orders were postponed, and the Senate took up and considered, as in committee of the whole, the bill for the relief of Nancy Hambright, widow of Captain John Hambright, deceased; and there being no amendment offered, it was reported to the Senate, read the third time, and passed.

On motion by Mr. PHELPS, the bill to allow a pension to Esther Augur, (which the Committee on Pensions thought there was no necessity for the passage of, believing the pension could be obtained by application at the department,) was taken up and laid on the table; and leave was granted to the petitioner to withdraw from the files of the Senate her petition and papers, with the view of presenting them at the department.

Mr. MILLER moved to postpone the previous orders, with a view of taking up the bill to incorporate the Georgetown College, in the District of Columbia.

Messrs. YOUNG and PHELPS opposed the taking of bills out of their proper place on the calender, and giving them precedence over private claims which had been so long pending.

Mr. MILLER pointed out the necessity of forwarding action on this bill, so as to secure the action of the other House on it.

The question was put; and the Senate refused to take the bill up.

On motion by Mr. MERRICK, the bill for the relief of Samuel D. Rose and others was taken up as in committee of the whole; and there being no proposition to amend, it was reported to the Senate, read the third time, according to order, and passed.

THE QUESTION OF ASSUMPTION.

Mr. RIVES called up his resolutions (inserted in yesterday's paper) on the subject of the assumption of State debts, and declaring the opinion of the Senate that Congress can never assume those debts, in any form, without a violation of the Constitution, and committing a gross act of inexpediency.

Mr. HUNTINGTON inquired whether those resolutions took precedence of the business on the calendar after the morning hour?

The CHAIR was understood to say that they did not.

Mr. RIVES remarked, that, in the discussion of yesterday, it was understood that the resolutions postponed till to day would be the business in order for this day. That was the understanding on yesterday.

Mr. KING was understood to say that, from the action of the Senate on yesterday, those resolutions were not to be considered the business of the morning hour, but the business of the day, from the hour of one o'clock.

Mr. RIVES, inasmuch as the Chair had made a decision against the understanding of yesterday, moved to postpone all the previous orders, for the purpose of proceeding to the consideration of those resolutions.

The Senate was then divided on the motion to take up the resolutions; and the Chair, on making a count, said the motion was not carried.

Mr. RIVES called for a division.

The Senate was again divided on a count; and the Chair announced that there were 20 in the affirmative, and ——

Mr. ALLEN here called for the yeas and nays.

Messrs. CRITTENDEN and HUNTINGTON simultaneously interposed, and asked the Chair if it was in order to make a call for the yeas and nays after the Chair had decided that the motion was lost.

The CHAIR said he had not so decided; he had not announced the vote, and it was in order to demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were then ordered, and, being taken, were—yeas 22, nays 22, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Archer, Bagby, Benton, Buchanan, Calhoun, Cuthbert, Fulton, King, Linn, McRoberts, Rives, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Sturgeon, Tappan, Walker, Wilcox, Williams, Woodbury, Wright, and Young—22.

NAYS—Messrs. Barrow, Bates, Bayard, Berrien, Clayton, Conrad, Crafts, Crittenden, Dayton, Evans, Graham, Henderson, Huntington, Mangum, Merrick, Miller, Morehead, Phelps, Smith of Indiana, Sprague, Tallmadge, and Woodbridge—22.

So the motion to proceed to the consideration of these resolutions was decided in the negative.

FINE ON GENERAL JACKSON.

The bill to indemnify Maj. Gen. Andrew Jackson for damages sustained in the discharge of his official duty, came up in order as in committee of the whole, on the amendment of the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. LINN said, the very best argument he could offer against the introduction of the proposed amendment, and in favor of the original bill, would be found in the report made by the committee of the House of Representatives to which this subject had been referred. It was recommended, in that report, that the money should be granted to General Jackson in consideration of his distinguished military services, and the gratitude due to him for his successful defence of New Orleans.

If it was to be put upon the ground of a reward for his military services, it was evidently inadequate. No one could question the patriotism, the valor, and the distinguished nature of the military services of Major General Andrew Jackson, as displayed throughout the whole course of the late war, and particularly at the closing scenes of that war. If, therefore, the act of restoration of the sum of $1,000 was to be taken to be in consideration of the distinguished military services of General Jackson in the defence of the country, it would be perceived at once that no friend of the General could vote for the bill, nor could General Jackson himself accept the money upon any such grounds.

The bill introduced by him (Mr. L.) at the last session, as well as at this, was plain and simple, requiring the proper accounting officer of the Treasury Department to ascertain the amount awarded against General Jackson at New Orleans, for an official act done by him, and to repay that amount, with interest accruing upon it; and in the remarks which he had made at the time of the introduction of the bill, he had placed the matter on the same ground upon which other cases of a similar nature had been placed, where penalties had been awarded by the civil courts against officers for acts committed in the discharge of their official duties. He had adduced various parallel cases, one of which occurred as late as the year 1823, when a military officer (Colonel Purdy) was induced to arrest persons suspected of disaffection, even in time of peace, without any such strong necessity to justify the act as existed in the case of General Jackson, and was amerced in damages. The matter was referred to Congress; and the committee to which it was referred, without hesitation, reported in favor of refunding the money; although the incarceration of the individuals (which was the offence complained of) was committed during a time of peace, and without the strong and urgent necessity under which General Jackson acted; and it was determined, by the committee and by Congress, that the money ought to be refunded, because they believed the officer had acted in the faithful discharge of his duty, and that it was his zeal in the service of his country which lay at the bottom of the act; that it proceeded from patriotism, and from that alone. He believed there was no case in which the Congress of the United States, being convinced that the act proceeded from patriotic motives, and was done in good faith, and under a sense of duty, had refused to restore a sum of money which had been taken from an officer in the shape of damages.

This bill was strikingly analogous to the one in favor of Matthew Lyon, which had passed this body. In that case, a fine which had been imposed upon him by a district judge of the United States, was, after the lapse of forty years, restored to his heirs, upon the ground that he acted with good intentions; and the question whether the judge who imposed the fine acted right or wrong, was not agitated. The money was refunded, because the Senate of the United States thought it had been taken from him improperly; but there was not, as in this case, (where the judge acted in his own case, and acted as both judge and jury,) a word said about injury to the character of the judge by refunding the money.

Why should the case of General Jackson be made an exception? Why should he not have the same justice rendered to him, as had been rendered to all other officers in the service of this Government? They would recollect the cases of General Brown and General Wilkinson, when the decisions of the courts rested upon the violation of the State laws, as well as the laws of the United States. These cases were analogous to the present. He referred also to a case which occurred during the late war, where six individuals had been arrested upon suspicion of treachery, and suit was afterwards brought against the officer who ordered the arrest, and he was amerced in the sum of $9,000. And the Congress of the United States, after a deliberate examination of all the circumstances of the case, required the money to be refunded.

But it seemed that General Jackson's case was to be made an exception to that rule which had been so universally acted upon in all other cases; that it was to be made an exception upon political grounds; or perhaps gentlemen might indulge in an act of revenge upon the aged and the absent—like the absent statue of Brutus from the ancient noble group; and he would say, that the absence of action in this case, would render the case more remarkable.

He had hoped that the vote would have been taken upon the bill without discussion, as had been done in the case of Matthew Lyon. It seemed to be otherwise ordained, however; and he would proceed to make a few remarks upon the subject. In all such cases as the one they were now considering, the law was necessarily silent. Necessity had no law. The question was, whether this was a case of that description; and upon this point there seemed to be no difference of opinion in the minds of those who were not biassed by strong party feelings. They all agreed that his conduct was justified by stern necessity; that he acted, at all events, upon motives of the purest patriotism. The President of the United States, as well as Congress, at that time, was aware of every step taken by General Jackson. The President had it in charge to see the laws of the country faithfully executed. Did the conduct of General Jackson, on that occasion, meet with any rebuke from President Madison? If his conduct had been an outrage or a violation of the laws, why did not the authorities take the necessary steps to arrest his course? No, sir, there was scarcely a dissenting voice throughout this broad land, from the opinion that he had acted correctly; and the only question that could come up now, was, whether he carried his measures beyond the point which necessity absolutely required. In no point of view in which you can examine the subject, could his conduct be regarded in a more exalted light than that which exhibited him continuing his vigilance until there was not even the appearance of danger remaining. But this was a point about which gentlemen would differ. In one of his official reports, made in January, 1815, Gen. Jackson told the Administration that, notwithstanding the enemy had disappeared from the coast, yet he would continue the same measures for the security of the country which he had heretofore had in operation. There had not been quoted by gentlemen who had entered into this contest, either in Congress, or through the newspapers, anything to controvert the truth of the declaration, wherein General Jackson announced to the world that he would continue, until every shadow of danger had disappeared, to use the most vigilant measures for the protection of the country. Was not this determination right? Was it not prudent? Was it not commendable?

The rumor of peace, which arrived through the British fleet, was near disorganizing his army. This was the reason, and the sole reason, why General Jackson thought it necessary to relax no effort, no exertion, for the safety of the place. But to revert to the position that necessity has no law, (Mr. L. said,) he would point out to Senators the instance where, under the old articles of Confederation, the States violated the Constitution by raising an army in time of peace. It was justified alone on the ground of necessity. And for fear that his mere assertion would not be sufficient, (Mr. L. said,) he would, with permission of the Senate, read from the 25th number of the Federalist. [He here read the passage referred to.] The charter of the Bank of the United States had, on various occasions, been justified exclusively on the ground of necessity. It was inferred that the power to create such a charter, if it did not exist in the Constitution, at all events ought to exist; and it was, therefore, argued to be lawful, on the ground of necessity. The invasion of our territory, the burning of the Caroline, and the murder of Durfee, were defended, on the ground of the necessity of the case on the part of Great Britain. Well, sir, (continued Mr. L.,) the present President of the United States, in refusing to sign the bills for a United States bank, which Congress presented to him, was condemned by many persons for not yielding up his constitutional scruples; and with the permission of the Senate, I will read a few remarks in this connexion, from a speech delivered in this chamber, on that occasion, by a very distinguished Senator from Kentucky, long celebrated for his unsurpassed eloquence. [Mr. L. here read extracts from the speech of Mr. Clay, to which he referred.]

Sir, you must well recollect the thrilling effect produced by the Senator I have quoted when he said, in his own emphatic manner, "I am not brave enough to throw myself down in the way of the prosperity of my country." All recollect, sir, that that Senator clearly intimated that if the President had constitutional objections to signing the bank bill, he should have permitted the bill to become a law, notwithstanding those objections. Mr. L. referred to many other instances in point, showing that the party which now opposed this bill on constitutional grounds, had uniformly waived such scruples when other officers in the public service were to be relieved from the consequences of assuming arbitrary power over civil rights, in the conscientious discharge of their official duty.

Why, he asked, was General Jackson to be made a solitary exception to this general rule? Why was he alone less worthy of a fair, just, and impartial consideration, than others whose services were less momentous to the country? Why was this bill alone to be denominated "a bill for the relief of Major General Andrew Jackson?" Who asked for "relief" for General Jackson? Not himself—not one of his friends. It was an indemnity for damages which he sustained in the performance of a military duty, which saved the country from an invading enemy. The original bill, as he (Mr. L.) had introduced it last year, and this session, studiously kept clear of any reference to Judge Hall. It might have been passed without a word of debate. It was not by its friends that any allusion or unnecessary introduction of Judge Hall's conduct had been brought up. They had been forced into the question of its propriety; but they were, and still are, satisfied to have the bill in a form so simple as to make no mention whatever of the Judge. All they want is to do an act of even-handed justice towards General Jackson such as had always been extended to other officers in the public service, under similar circumstances.

Mr. MILLER addressed the Senate for about an hour in opposition to the bill, whether amended or not. He contended that there was no necessity for it, growing out of the case itself intrinsically, because, on the ground taken by the friends of the original bill, no proof had been produced, or could be produced, that the fine was either illegally or unconstitutionally imposed; and, on the ground taken by the amendment, it would be entirely an inadequate remuneration for Gen. Jackson's military services at New Orleans.

Mr. M. then proceeded to state the circumstances under which the fine had been imposed, with a view of showing that it was for a contempt of court, in resisting the authority of the writ of habeas corpus, and suspending the civil functions of the law, by an unconstitutional and arbitrary exercise of military power. He contended that General Jackson himself claimed the restoration of this fine, on the bold and open grounds that the judgment of the court was iniquitous and unlawful. He referred to his letter of the 1st of August, 1842, addressed to Jacob Gibson, in proof of this; and contended that, if the friends of General Jackson could not now show that the course taken by Judge Hall was iniquitous and unlawful, the claim must fall to the ground. That they could also do this, was the position he assumed; and in support of the assumption, he referred to the history of the constitution, of martial law, (which he considered undefinable, unless by negation,) and to the history of the writ of habeas corpus, from the act defining its powers in the reign of Charles II. down to the present day.

He maintained that it was not either justice or generosity; for, as to the one, the law had been the offended party; and as to the other, the sum was too insignificant, that stirred up this question after a repose of eight-and-twenty years. It was, he contended, a mere movement at a critical time, to make political capital out of the sympathies of a grateful people, for a meritorious military officer whose glory was even yet thought capable of lighting his successor to the Presidency once more to the seat from which he had descended. This he thought could account for the excitement got up at State Legislatures, inducing them to instruct their Senators and Representatives in Congress to advocate this bill. It could account for the petitions poured into Congress day after day on the subject, and for the noise made about it abroad among the people. He denied that it was any stain on General Jackson's fair fame, that the record of this fine should be preserved. On the contrary, he contended that it was one of the brightest ornaments in the page of his history, that he had bowed to the supremacy of the law and the Constitution, and paid this fine in atonement for the wound he had inflicted on both.

If it had been either a pecuniary grievance, or a blot upon the escutcheon of his name, why did his friends, while so long in power—why did the Congresses fresh in the recollection of the transaction—why did the Van Buren administration, keen to catch at anything to do justice to, or gratify, the military chieftain who appointed the succession—neglect the duty which now has sprung up so suddenly, and appears so urgent? Why let this act of duty sleep for a quarter of a century? It was because they had no conviction that it was necessary, either in support of General Jackson's character, or of their own continuation in power. But now there was a necessity to catch at everything calculated to have a bearing on the presidential election of 1844. It was for this that it was now proposed to take back the hero of New Orleans to the scene of his military glory, with all Congress at his heels, and sanction, by an official act of national legislation, an outrage on the Constitution and the laws of the country—and that, too, over the grave of Dominic Hall, who had faithfully discharged his duties, and left the only monument the country had to appeal to of an independent judge braving an arbitrary power such as he had to contend with. He should vote against the bill in any form.

Mr. McROBERTS said he was somewhat surprised that this question should be considered in any way connected with politics; and that the State Legislatures were pouring in instructions, with a view to control the votes of Senators in relation to this subject, for political purposes.

They had been asked, Why the necessity for acting upon it now? What new motive had prompted the measure? He would tell the Senate. It was because it must be acted upon at an early period, if it was to be done in the lifetime of the distinguished man who was the subject of it. It was for the purpose of letting him see and read upon the statute-book of this country that the fine had been restored to him, that its passage was asked for now.

But why was it that so much excitement had sprung up in the country within the last six months upon this subject? Why was it the Legislatures of the States had interfered? It was because of your refusal at the last session of Congress to render this act of justice; to restore the fine which had been unjustly imposed, and which this nation, he would venture to assert, would, at no distant day, restore. And he would say further, that, if Senators would but do that which it was obligatory upon them to do, the act would be passed this very day. He rejoiced to find that they had now a new view of the subject. They had not only an avowal that the act of General Jackson was an outrage, but they had the avowal from the gentleman on the other side, that the money should never be returned, either with or without the declaration that it was considered an outrage by the Senate; for he was always glad to see a man come out boldly and declare his opinions: and the gentleman from New Jersey had done so on this occasion. He declared himself against the restoration of the fine on any terms; and that he was against it because of his great reverence for the Constitution, and his anxiety that it should be preserved unimpaired. This might be very good reasoning to satisfy the honorable gentleman; but what were they to infer from all this? That General Jackson was to be regarded as being adverse to the preservation of the Constitution? Had he no patriotism? Had he no love for the institutions of his country? What other man living had shown himself so staunch a friend to both? Had he not periled everything in defence of those institutions and of that country? No other patriot living had ever performed such signal acts of patriotism, and exhibited himself so true a friend to the Constitution under which we live.

They were told that, if they restored this money, it would amount to a damning reflection upon the character of Judge Hall. How, he would ask, could the character of the Judge be involved in the decision of the Senate upon this question? He had called General Jackson before him, and imposed the fine: the fine was paid; and, by its payment, the offence was atoned for. Was it not? The mandate of the court had been obeyed. Where, then, was there cause of complaint? No; it was not this. The reputation of Judge Hall was not implicated; there was some other reason by which gentlemen were actuated. As for the alleged contempt of court, he would say a few words upon that point. What was meant by a contempt of court? It would be recollected that a judge of a district court had been impeached before this body some years ago, for acting in his own case, (and, by-the-way, though he was not cashiered, he narrowly escaped—there being more than twenty votes in favor of his condemnation,) and the subject having been in this way brought to the attention of the Senate, a law was passed declaring what the law should be in reference to contempt; and the principles of the common law upon that subject were embodied in the act. What was considered a contempt of court? It was some act done in the presence of the court—some act which reflected directly upon the court as a court. Was it pretended that such was the case here? Judge Hall himself admitted that no court was held from the time martial law was declared until the army was disbanded. It could have been, therefore, no contempt of court; and if it were held that Judge Hall could punish for a mere contempt of his person, he must be permitted to say it was a new doctrine. No such case had ever occurred. He would challenge any man to produce an adjudicated case of the kind. General Jackson might, he would admit, have been prosecuted in a civil action; but he could not be punished for a contempt of court.

Mr. McR. then referred to the record of the court, to show that no contempt of court had ever been alleged by Judge Hall himself. He was at a loss to know how it could be contended that a military commandant was not the absolute master of his camp. True, there was nothing expressed in the Constitution or the laws in regard to this matter. But the very power to declare war, it seemed to him, carried with it necessarily the power of the General to command his own camp; and the General must be himself the judge as to the limits of his camp.

Suppose Judge Hall had gone into the camp, and commenced arresting his soldiers: why, a proposition involving consequences like these would make the matter too ridiculous for argument. Mr. McR. then alluded to the case of Matthew Lyon, who had done some act for which he was fined $1,000, and imprisoned for six months; and Congress afterwards restored the money to his heirs, without any allegation or reflection on the character of the judge who imposed the fine. Nor was that the only parallel case; there were the cases of Hampton, Purdy, Wilkinson, and Brown; in all of which the juries had given heavy damages. And the money had been restored, without any reflection upon the character of the judges or the juries. These men acted as much in violation of law as General Jackson did; and some of them acted far more severely, for they put the men whom they arrested in irons; whereas General Jackson had merely ordered the Judge out of his encampment—and very properly; and for this he was fined $1,000; and, in point of principle, there could be no difference whether the money was paid into the treasury of the United States, or whether it went into the pocket of the prosecutor. And was it possible that, while the Government had, in all other cases, restored the money unconditionally, when they came to the case of Andrew Jackson he could obtain the restoration of his money only by taking an insult? Thank God, (said Mr. McR.) he will not accept it upon such terms.

One word more. Judge Hall was present when martial law was declared; and what did he do upon that occasion? He exclaimed, "Now the country will be saved; without this, it would be lost." He approved the act—nay, even counselled it. He desired that the bill should pass the Senate, and the money be restored unconditionally; but, unless it could be passed as offered, and without amendment, he would be compelled again to vote against it, because he would not consent to convey an insult to the venerated hero, which the amendment contemplated. And he would venture to predict that, if it were refused at this session, it would not be at the Ides of March in another session that it would be passed, but at the earliest moment of the assembling of Congress.

Mr. LINN, after a short explanation between him and the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MILLER] as to his allusion to "political objects" in bringing forward this bill, (which Mr. L. utterly repelled,) referred to the following extract from Mr. Jefferson's letter to John B. Colvin, esq., as a justification of the principles on which General Jackson acted at New Orleans; it was in relation to General Wilkinson's case:

Extract of a letter from Mr. Jefferson to John B. Colvin, Esquire.

"To proceed to the conspiracy of Burr, and particularly to General Wilkinson's situation in New Orleans. In judging this case, we are bound to consider the state of the information, correct and incorrect, which he then possessed. He expected Burr and his band from above, a British fleet from below, and he knew there was a formidable conspiracy within the city. Under these circumstances, was he justifiable, 1st. In seizing notorious conspirators. On this there can be but two opinions: one, of the guilty and their accomplices; the other, that of all honest men. 2d. Sending them to the seat of government, when the written law gave them a right to trial in the Territory? The danger of their rescue; of continuing the machinations; the tardiness and weakness of the law; apathy of the judges; active patronage of the whole tribe of lawyers; unknown dispositions of the juries; an hourly expectation of the enemy; salvation of the city, and of the Union itself, which would have been convulsed to its centre, had that conspiracy succeeded—all these constituted a law of necessity and self-preservation, and rendered the salus populi supreme over the written law. The officer who is called to act on this superior ground, does indeed risk himself on the justice of the controlling powers of the Constitution, and his station makes it his duty to incur that risk. But those controlling powers, and his fellow-citizens generally, are bound to judge according to the circumstances under which he acted. They are not to transfer the information of this place, or moment, to the time and place of this action; but to put themselves into his situation. We know here that there never was danger of a British fleet from below, and that Burr's band was crushed before it reached the Mississippi. But General Wilkinson's information was very different, and he could act on no other.

"From these examples and principles you may see what I think on the question proposed. They do not go to the case of persons charged with petty duties, where consequences are trifling, and time allowed for a legal course, nor to authorize them to take such cases out of the written law. In these the example of overleaping the law is of greater evil than a strict adherence to its imperfect provisions. It is incumbent on those only who accept of great charges, to risk themselves on great occasions, when the safety of the nation or some of its very high interests are at stake. An officer is bound to obey orders; yet he would be a bad one who should do it in cases for which they were not intended, and which involved the most important consequences. The line of discrimination between cases may be difficult, but the good officer is bound to draw it at his own peril, and throw himself on the justice of his country and the rectitude of his motives."

Having thus shown that the law of necessity justified the declaration of martial law, he would now ask the Senator from New Jersey, if he had been placed in the same circumstances in which General Jackson was placed, would he have acted as General Jackson did?

Mr. MILLER said that, without a perfect knowledge of every circumstance, he could not—

Mr. LINN did not want a conditional answer. He merely required a definite reply, one way or other; for particular circumstances did not alter the actual fact of declaring martial law.

Mr. MILLER said he would not have acted as General Jackson did.

Mr. LINN said that was a definite answer. It could only be accounted for by the lawyer-like way in which professional gentlemen view questions of mere abstract principles. It amounted to this: that the Senator from New Jersey, with his civilian notions, sooner than yield them would suffer a foreign enemy to overrun the country, and destroy the very Constitution itself, than suspend that Constitution for a moment, that the enemy might be expelled, and both country and constitution be preserved.

He did not, in saying this, impute anything personally disrespectful to the Senator from New Jersey; he only meant to illustrate that this was not a subject which could be adjudged by mere technical rules of law. It should be taken on the broad principles of patriotism and national honor. The Senator says that if he had been in General Jackson's place, he would not have declared martial law. But if, in consequence of that resolution, New Orleans became the prey of a foreign enemy with a formidable force, fresh with the flush of victory from another continent, how would he stand justified before his conscience and his country? What excuse would it be for him that the dread of the Constitution rendered his hands powerless, and prostrated those energies which had been conferred on him for the protection of his country?

Mr. L. then reviewed the conduct of Judge Hall in flying from the city, instead of remaining to fulfil his duties at the most critical period of the invasion, and returning to it only when in his power to do mischief. He further reviewed the circumstances which justified General Jackson, and concluded by invoking Senators to suffer the bill to pass in its original form, as they must know that in no other shape could it be accepted by either General Jackson's friends orhimself.

Mr. BAGBY remarked, it would be recollected that, when this question was up last session, he had refrained from entering into the discussion. He had two reasons for thus acting; one was, because he was satisfied then, as now, that there were gentlemen in that body more competent to do justice to the question than he was; and the other, that the position he then occupied was different from his present position. He had made it a rule in life never, in any case, or on any occasion, or under any circumstances, to avail himself of the popularity of others—no matter how dearly earned or deserved that popularity—to advance his own interests. This time he occupied a different position in regard to this question—the circumstances in which he was then placed no longer exist. He could now express his heartfelt and lively satisfaction that an opportunity was afforded him of supporting this measure of justice without a possibility of having his motives misunderstood, or misconstrued into consideration of popularity. According to a deep and solemn sense of duty, he thought the bill ought to pass—and pass in the simple form in which it was presented to the Senate by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. LINN.] Whatever might be the course of other gentlemen on this question, as a matter of party or policy, no such considerations would enter into his motives, or govern the vote he should give. If his voice could be heard, he would ask gentlemen on the other side [Whig side] not to make this a party question. The time was almost at that point when the character and services of that great man would not be looked upon as party property; but when they would be looked upon and esteemed as the property of the whole people and whole country. He appealed to the Senators on the other side to discard the idea of party management and party tactics, in disposing of a question of this character; and to act as if they were called upon to render justice—simple and exact justice—to a distinguished benefactor of his country; to look upon it as became every American Senator, and every American citizen with a patriot heart in his breast. He could tell Senators on the other side, that, whatever might be the fate of that measure then, there was a time hastening when there would be an answer to the principles involved in that bill—the time when the people would be standing round the grave of the hero, mourning his departure—the time when the differences on this question, unfortunately engendered by differences of political opinion and party rancor, will be entirely erased, and when his acts will be judged with impartiality. He did not consider, that the passage of this bill would add anything to the fame of General Jackson;—no, nothing; for, in the language of another great man, (Jefferson,) he has long since "filled the measure of his country's glory." Its passage was not urged for the purpose of adding another wreath to adorn the brow of the patriot and hero; but that justice should be done him. Party should not pollute his motives in voting for this bill; for if the justice asked was for the veriest Whig that ever adorned or injured the country, he would view this case as he now viewed it—he would pursue the same course as he was about to pursue on the present occasion. He could not find it in his heart to withhold from this aged, venerable, and revered man, whether Whig or Democrat, any act of his which would be at all instrumental in smoothing the declining path of him whose sun soon must set.

He again called upon the Whigs to discard those narrow and unworthy views of this question. He again repeated, that General Jackson did not stand in need of this measure to add to his fame, for the measure of his fame was full to overflowing.

Mr. B. after making many beautiful allusions to the character and services of Gen. Jackson, asked Senators on the other side to discard party considerations in voting on this question, or to come up and say whether they would leave to rankle and fester in the heart of this aged and venerable hero, to disturb his last moments, the memory of the injustice done him.

Mr. B. having concluded,

Mr. SMITH of Connecticut obtained the floor, and wished to speak before the question was taken; but yielded the floor to

Mr. MOREHEAD, on whose motion

The Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, February 17, 1843.

Mr. HASTINGS presented the memorial of 91 farmers of Columbiana county, Ohio, asking Congress to equalize the tariff, and in just reference to their staples of wool and hides.

Also, the memorial of 69 farmers, of the same county and State, upon the same subject.

Also, the memorial of 32 farmers, of the same county and State, upon the same subject.

Also, the memorial of 61 farmers, of the same county and State, upon the same subject.

Also, the memorial of 60 farmers, of the same county and State, upon the same subject.

Also, the memorial of 37 farmers, of the same county and State, upon the same subject.

Mr. KEIM presented the petition of George R. McFarlane and thirty-seven others, of Hollidaysburg, Pennsylvania, praying Congress to relieve Amos Kendall, late Postmaster General: referred.

Mr. WARD presented the petition of Gilbert Lyon and others, praying Congress to adopt measures for removing obstructions from Byrum river.

Mr. GRAHAM asked leave to offer a resolution of inquiry. It was read and adopted, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Indian Affairs inquire into the expediency of appropriating a sum of money sufficient to pay the Cherokee Indians in North Carolina for spoliations committed on their property by Government agents, and others, between the 23d day of May, 1838, (the time fixed for removal by the treaty of 1835,) and the time when the said Indians actually removed west of the Mississippi river.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD of Maine presented resolutions of the Legislature of that State, in relation to the military academy at West Point, against any further appropriation for the support of that institution; and, also, in relation to an alteration in the laws regulating the Post Office Department; which, on his motion, were laid on the table and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BARNARD rose, and inquired whether it would be in order to go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER replied that it would.

Mr. BARNARD expressed his intention to move that the House go into committee after the morning hour.

Mr. FILLMORE asked leave to report the civil and diplomatic appropriation bill, with a view to have it printed.

Objection was made by Mr. L. W. ANDREWS.

THE STATE DEBTS.

Mr. W. COST JOHNSON claimed the floor upon the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. J. R. INGERSOLL] to print 10,000 extra copies of the majority and minority reports from the Committee of Ways and Means on the proposition to issue $200,000,000 Government stock to the States.

Various points of order were raised, all questioning the right of this subject to take precedence of all others during the morning hour, and discussed by Messrs. FILLMORE, SMITH of Virginia, BRIGGS, WELLER, and J. R. INGERSOLL.

The SPEAKER overruled all objections, and gave the floor to the gentleman from Maryland.

Mr. WM. COST JOHNSON then addressed the House up to the conclusion of his hour, in commenting on the report of the committee, and advocating his project for the issue of two hundred millions of Government stock.

Mr. FILLMORE called for the orders of the day.

Several gentlemen endeavored to get the floor on the subject which had been discussed by the gentleman from Maryland; but the Speaker decided that the morning hour had expired.

THE ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. FILLMORE submitted a resolution to terminate debate at half-past 2 o'clock in Committee of the Whole, on the amendments of the Senate to the army appropriation bill; and on this he moved the previous question.

Mr. WISE inquired if there was any special order for to-day.

The SPEAKER'S reply was not heard.

Mr. WISE said he would move to go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union—

The SPEAKER interrupted him, and reminded the gentleman from Virginia that the previous question was pending.

Some conversation ensued, in which Mr. UNDERWOOD, the SPEAKER, Mr. GIDDINGS, and others took part; the previous question was then seconded, and the resolution was adopted.

Mr. FILLMORE moved that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. J. YOUNG hoped the gentleman from New York would allow the question to be taken on a private bill (whose title was not stated) which was on the Speaker's table, and on which the previous question had been moved.

Mr. FILLMORE could not consent, now that the time was limited on the army appropriation bill.

Mr. WISE said he should renew his motion to take up the exchequer bill.

Mr. FILLMORE begged the gentleman from Virginia to allow the army bill to be first disposed of, as only two hours remained for its discussion.

After some other conversation, the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. A. H. H. STUART in the chair,) and took up the army appropriation bill.

The pending question was on the amendment of the Senate, appropriating $50,000 for the improvement of the Mississippi, Arkansas, Missouri, and Ohio rivers, during the half calendar year ending June 30th, 1843, and $100,000 for the improvement of the said rivers during the fiscal year ending June 30th, 1844.

After an ineffectual attempt by Mr. WISE to have the bill set aside, for the purpose of taking up the exchequer,

Mr. WELLER addressed the House at considerable length in favor of the appropriation.

Mr. R. W. THOMPSON moved the following amendment to the amendment of the Senate:

For continuing the improvements of the harbor of Chicago, Illinois, for the said half calendar year, twenty thousand dollars; and for the said fiscal year, sixty thousand dollars.

For continuing the improvements of the harbor of Cleveland, Ohio, for the said half calendar year, twenty thousand dollars; and for the said fiscal year, forty thousand dollars.

For continuing the improvements of the harbor of Buffalo, New York, for the said fiscal year, twenty thousand dollars.

For continuing the improvements of the harbor at the mouth of Genesee river, for the said half calendar year, twenty thousand dollars; and for the said fiscal year, twenty-seven thousand two hundred and forty-five dollars and forty-two cents.

For continuing the improvements at Oswego, New York, for the said fiscal year, twenty-seven thousand one hundred and seventy-six dollars and sixty-seven cents.

For completing the breakwater at Burlington, Vermont, for the said half calendar year, twenty thousand dollars; and for the said fiscal year, thirty thousand dollars.

For preservation, repairs, and gradual completion of the harbors on the lakes, other than those enumerated, for the said fiscal year, sixty thousand dollars.

CUMBERLAND ROAD.

For continuing the Cumberland road in Ohio, for the said half calendar year, fifty thousand dollars; and for the said fiscal year, fifty thousand dollars.

For continuing the Cumberland road in Indiana, for the said half calendar year, seventy-five thousand dollars; and for the said fiscal year, seventy-five thousand dollars.

For continuing the Cumberland road in Illinois for the said half calendar year, seventy-five thousand dollars; and for the said fiscal year, seventy-five thousand dollars.

For arrearages due for expenses incurred in making a survey and estimate for the location of the Cumberland road from Vandalia, Illinois, to Jefferson City, Missouri, as required by resolution of the Senate of January thirty, one thousand eight hundred and thirty-nine, for the said fiscal year, one thousand three hundred and fifty-nine dollars and eighty-one cents.

Mr. MALLORY raised a question of order; and contended that the amendment (which is a transcript of the "harbor bill") could not be entertained in connexion with this bill.

Mr. SPRIGG requested the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. THOMPSON] to withdraw the amendment.

The CHAIR decided the amendment to be in order.

Mr. RICHARD W. THOMPSON then addressed the committee up to the expiration of his hour, in favor of the amendment.

Mr. SPRIGG took the floor at 2 o'clock, and addressed the committee for half an hour against the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. THOMPSON,] and against large appropriations generally; but in favor of the adoption of some measures for the improvement of the Western waters.

Mr. RICHARD W. THOMPSON then modified his amendment, by adding a proviso that $25,000 of the appropriation for the States of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, be applied to the construction of a bridge across the Ohio river, at Wheeling.

Mr. BROCKWAY then moved to amend the amendment of Mr. R. W. THOMPSON, by substituting for it the harbor bill reported by the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. R. W. THOMPSON contended that the amendment of Mr. BROCKWAY was not in order. The amendment of the Senate could be amended, but no two amendments could be offered at the same time.

The CHAIR decided that the amendment of the Senate was in the nature of an original proposition; and, therefore, a motion to amend it could be amended.

The question was then taken on Mr. BROCKWAY's amendment, and it was rejected—ayes 45, noes 97.

Mr. HOWARD offered an amendment to the amendment, making appropriations for the improvement of the river Raisin, Lake St. Clair, and other rivers in Michigan: rejected.

Mr. BOTTS offered an amendment to the amendment, appropriating $50,000 for improving the navigation of the James river, below Richmond: rejected.

Mr. TILLINGHAST offered an amendment to the amendment, appropriating $10,000 for the improvement of the navigation of Providence river: rejected.

Mr. SALTONSTALL offered an amendment to the amendment appropriating, $10,000 for the breakwater at Sandy Bay, Massachusetts: rejected.

Mr. MALLORY offered an amendment to the amendment, appropriating $30,000 for the completion of the locks at the northern termination of the Dismal Swamp Canal: rejected.

Mr. W. W. IRWIN offered an amendment to the amendment, appropriating $80,000 for the marine hospitals on the Western waters: rejected.

Mr. GOODE of Ohio offered an amendment to the amendment, appropriating $70,000 for removing the bar and other obstructions in the Maumee river: rejected.

Mr. FESSENDEN offered an amendment to the amendment, appropriating $30,000 for the continuation of the breakwater at Portland, Maine: rejected.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Connecticut offered an amendment to the amendment, appropriating $30,000 for the improvement of the Thames river: rejected.

Mr. TOLAND offered an amendment to the amendment, appropriating $10,000 for the repair of the piers at Reedy Island, on the Delaware: rejected.

Mr. CROSS offered the following amendment to the amendment:

For completing the military road from Memphis, in the State of Tennessee, westwardly, passing through the State of Arkansas, to the frontier of said State. [Amount not stated.]

This was also rejected.

Mr. BLAIR offered an amendment to the amendment, appropriating $5,000 for the improvement of the harbor of Whitehall, New York: rejected.

Mr. YORKE offered an amendment to the amendment appropriating $5,000 for the improvement of ——— river: rejected.

Mr. CALHOUN offered an amendment to the amendment, appropriating $5,000 for the improvement of the entrance into the harbor of Beverly, Massachusetts: rejected.

The question was then taken on Mr. R. W. THOMPSON's amendment to the amendment of the Senate, and it was rejected—ayes 61, noes, 96.

The question then recurred on the question of concurrence with the amendment of the Senate; on which tellers were demanded, and Messrs. MILLER and MORRIS were appointed; and they reported 93 in the affirmative, and 98 in the negative.

So the amendment was not concurred in.

The committee concurred in the amendment, inserting the words "the District of Columbia" after the word "Territories," in the section which required that cadets should be residents of the districts, Territories, or District of Columbia, from which they professed to be appointed.

The committee did not concur in the amendment which gave power to appoint ten cadets "at large;" the vote in the affirmative, as taken by Messrs. W. O. BUTLER and CAVE JOHNSON, tellers, being but 40.

The committee then rose, and reported the bill to the House.

Mr. R. W. THOMPSON in the House renewed the motion to amend, which he had submitted in the Committee of the Whole; and on that he moved the previous question, and called for the yeas and nays.

Mr. W. O. BUTLER moved that the House adjourn.

The motion was negatived.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON raised a question of order in relation to the relevancy of the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. R. W. THOMPSON]

The SPEAKER overruled the point of order.

After a few words from Messrs. MOORE, FILLMORE, WARREN, and others,

Mr. PICKENS renewed the motion to adjourn; which was negatived.

The question was then taken on seconding the previous question, which was agreed to; and the main question was ordered to be put.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON called for the yeas and nays on the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. R. W. THOMPSON,] and they were ordered; but, as a division was called for, they were taken on the first branch of the amendment, making appropriations for various harbors and internal improvements. This division comprehends all of the amendment, as above printed, except that which makes an appropriation for continuing the Cumberland road.

The House refused to adopt it—yeas 74, nays 132, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Landaff W. Andrews, Sherlock J. Andrews, Babcock, Baker, Barnard, Birdseye, Blair, Boardman, Brewster, Briggs, Jeremiah Brown, Casey, Childs, Chittenden, John C. Clark, Staley N. Williams, Wise, and Wood—132.

The question recurred upon the second division of the amendment, which related to the continuation of the Cumberland road in the States of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois—Mr. THOMPSON having so modified it as to exclude any appropriation for a bridge at Wheeling, Virginia.

The yeas and nays were demanded, and taken, and this portion of the amendment rejected by a vote of—yeas 65, nays 127, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Landaff W. Andrews, Sherlock J. Andrews, Baker, Barnard, Beeson, Blair, Boardman, Brockway, Bronson, Jeremiah Brown, Burnell, Calhoun, Casey, Childs, John C. Clark, Staley N. The second amendment of the Senate, appropriating $9,000 for certain barracks, was concurred in; also the amendment directing the survey of a ship channel from Albemarle sound to the Atlantic ocean.

The next amendment, appropriating $2,000 for carrying on meteorological observations at the military posts, under the superintendence of the Surgeon General, came up on the question of concurring with the Committee of the Whole in their recommendation that it be rejected. [This is for Professor Espy's scheme.]

The yeas and nays were asked for, but refused.

Tellers were ordered [Messrs CAVE JOHNSON and L. W. ANDREWS,] who reported, (after much confusion, and a second count,) ayes 91, noes 103.

So the House rejected the recommendation of the Committee of the Whole; and, therefore, the amendment of the Senate is agreed to.

The next question that came up was on concurring in the report of the committee rejecting the amendment of the Senate, which went to authorize the appointment of 10 cadets at large, and one from the District of Columbia, in addition to one from each congressional district, as provided for in the original bill.

On taking the question on this amendment, the report of the committee was concurred in, and consequently the amendment of the Senate was negatived.

The next question was on the amendment of the Senate appropriating $100,000 for the improvement of the Ohio, Missouri, Mississippi, and Arkansas rivers; and the question was put in the form of concurring in the amendment of the Senate, and decided in the affirmative—yeas 105, nays 89, as follows:

GENERAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. FILLMORE, from the Committee of Ways and Means, here reported, on leave, the civil and diplomatic appropriation bill for the half calendar year ending the 30th June, 1843, and the fiscal year beginning on the 1st July, 1843, and ending on the 30th June, 1844; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

The House then adjourned.

IN SENATE.

SATURDAY, February 18, 1843.

The PRESIDENT pro tem. laid before the Senate a communication from the Treasury Department, transmitting copies of accounts rendered by the agents for disbursements to Indians; which,

On motion by Mr. EVANS, was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

Also, laid before the Senate a communication from the Treasury Department, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate, calling upon that department for information of what was done by it with the appropriation for the erection of a marine hospital at or near Ocracoke inlet, transmitting correspondence upon the subject; which was,

On motion of Mr. EVANS, referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. STURGEON presented a memorial and proceedings of a meeeting of citizens of Uniontown, Pennsylvania, in favor of the issue of $200,000,000 of stock by the Federal Government, based on the public lands, to be distributed to the States in a representative ratio, for their relief; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Also, presented a memorial from citizens of Erie county, Pennsylvania, urging upon Congress the propriety of passing a law to restore Mr. Kendall to his personal liberty; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. BAGBY presented joint resolutions, adopted by the Legislature of Alabama, in favor of a reduction of the price of the public lands in that State, which have been frequently in the market, and could not be sold at the present Government price: ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. McROBERTS presented a memorial from Wm. H. Briggs and others, of Macoupin county, Illinois, maintaining that all international difficulties can be settled by a reference to some friendly power, and asking the Senate to exercise its constitutional power, and insert an article in all future treaties by which, in a last resort, such difficulties may be decided by an umpire mutually agreed upon by the parties: ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. EVANS, from the Committee on Finance, reported back, without amendment, and with a recommendation that they do pass, House bills for the relief of George P. Pollen and Robert Colegate, and for the relief of S. Morris Waln.

Mr. E., from the same committee, reported a bill for the relief of Benjamin Adams & Co., and others; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. E., from the same committee, reported back, without amendment, House bill for the relief of Thomas Weaver and Jacob Heyberger, sureties of the Norristown and Valley Railroad Company.

Mr. E., from the same committee, to which had been referred a memorial from importers of German goods in the city of Philadelphia, praying the regulation by Congress of the value of German coin, reported a bill to fix the value of certain foreign moneys of account, in computations at the custom-house; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. McROBERTS, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, to which had been referred the joint resolution of the Senate authorizing the Postmaster General to contract with Messrs. E. B. & S. Ward for carrying the mail from Chicago to St. Joseph, made a report, accompanied by a resolution, in favor of the rejection of the joint resolution.

Also, reported back from the same committee, with a recommendation that it do pass, the bill for the relief of John W. Skidmore. The reports, in both these cases, were ordered to be printed.

Mr. WILLIAMS, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported a bill granting a pension to William McPherson; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

On motion by Mr. WILLIAMS, the previous orders of the day were postponed, and the above bill was taken up as in committee of the whole; and there being no motion to amend, it was reported to the Senate, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

DEAF, DUMB, BLIND, AND INSANE.

Mr. SMITH of Indiana rose to ask leave to introduce a bill granting land to the several States for the education of the deaf, dumb, and blind, and for the relief of insane persons.

Mr. S. said, a word of explanation from him, under the circumstances, might be proper. The bill was precisely similar to the one he had introduced at the last session. At that time he had made a few remarks, and had presented some statistics on the subject. At that time he knew that it was expected that he would bring up for consideration the subject at this session. Such was then his intention; but he had not been able to do so at an earlier period, and he confessed that he had little or no prospect of seeing a final vote taken on the proposition at this session. Still, he desired to keep the matter in the eye of the Senate and the country until action could be had. He wished to say, before retiring from the Senate, that the subject was near his heart; and he believed it to be one of the measures that would finally enlist in its favor the philanthropy and best wishes of the Senate and the country. He would not detain the Senate; he rose merely to exclude, by a single remark, the conclusion that he had in any degree abandoned the measure, or despaired of its success.

The bill was received, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Several bills from the House were read twice, and referred to appropriate committees.

The bill for the relief of Thomas King, of Tennessee, was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WALKER submitted the following resolution; which was read and adopted, viz:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to communicate to the Senate the total amount of the two per cent. of the net proceeds of the sales of the public lands in the State of Ohio, together with the entire cost of the Cumberland road from Cumberland to the Pennsylvania line; and also from Cumberland to the Ohio river.

Mr. YOUNG of Illinois presented the petition of Rose Howe (late Rose Bailly) of Illinois, praying the relinquishment of the reversionary interest of the United States to two sections of land, reserved to the daughters of Mo-nee, by her last husband, Joseph Bailly, by the treaty with the Pottawatomies of the Prairie and Kankakee Bands, made at Camp Tippecanoe on the 20th of October, 1832; which, on his motion, was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. BAYARD, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported back, without amendment, and with a recommendation that it do pass, the bill from the House for the relief of John Wolfenden.

THE QUESTION OF ASSUMPTION.

The CHAIR announced that the resolutions moved by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. RIVES,] concerning the assumption of the debts of the States, and the pending amendments, were in order.

Mr. BARROW moved to lay the resolutions on the table.

Mr. WALKER demanded the yeas and nays on the motion; which were ordered.

Mr. RIVES hoped the Senator would consider the vote on the motion a test question on the resolutions.

Mr. WALKER remarked that he would not take it as any test of the opinion of the Senate; for if the resolutions were now laid upon the table, he should, on every morning during the session, move to take them up; and if he should fail in that effort to get a vote on the resolutions, he would himself introduce resolutions upon the subject, to test the sense of the Senate.

Mr. BARROW said, in voting, he should not consider it a test vote. He deemed this remark called for, in consequence of the remarks of the Senator from Virginia [Mr. RIVES] and the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WALKER]

The question was then put on the motion to lay on the table, and decided in the negative—yeas 20, nays 22, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Barrow, Bates, Bayard, Berrien, Clayton, Crafts, Crittenden, Dayton, Evans, Graham, Huntington, Merrick, Miller, Morehead, Phelps, Smith of Indiana, Sprague, Tallmadge, White, and Woodbridge—20.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Archer, Bagby, Benton, Buchanan, Calhoun, Cuthbert, Fulton, King, Linn, McDuffie, McRoberts, Rives, Smith of Connecticut, Sturgeon, Tappan, Walker, Wilcox, Williams, Woodbury, Wright, and Young—22.

The CHAIR then announced that the resolutions of the Senator from Virginia [Mr. RIVES] were before the Senate, as follows:

Resolved, That another of the prominent causes which tend to prolong and increase the financial embarrassments of the country, and to retard the ultimate restoration of public and private credit, is the uncertainty and suspense thrown over the policy of this Government, in regard to the debts of the States, by the agitation of projects for the virtual assumption of those debts by the authorities of the Union; that while this uncertainty is permitted to exist, its mischievous effect is to foster delusive hopes of relief from a quarter whence it can never legitimately proceed, and to divert the attention of the indebted States from that timely and energetic application of their own resources to the fulfilment of their engagements, which they would otherwise make, and which is the sole natural and proper reliance for the liquidation of their respective liabilities; and it is, therefore, urgently demanded by the interests of the parties immediately concerned, as well as by those of the country at large, that Congress should now explicitly and unequivocally declare the views it entertains of the appropriate and constitutional sphere of its powers and duties in relation to this subject.

Resolved, That, in the fundamental division and allotment of political power established by the Constitution between the Government of the Union and those of the several States, there is no power or authority given to the former to provide for the payment of the debts incurred by the latter, in virtue of their undoubted competence, and within their separate and exclusive jurisdiction; that any attempt by the General Government thus to assume, and impose upon the people of the Union, the debts of individual States, would be not merely a gross perversion of the trusts confided to it, but an utter annihilation of that wholesome and necessary relation between power and responsibility, which is the vital principle of all representative government; that such an arbitrary and unauthorized transfer of burdens, from those who created, and should alone be responsible for them, to others who are alien alike to their origin and their benefits, involves so flagrant a violation of the principles of justice, that it could not but most seriously impair the harmony, and ultimately jeopard the union of the States; and that any expectation, therefore, that this Government will at any time, now or hereafter, assume or provide for the payment of the debts of the individual States, directly or indirectly, is wholly unwarranted and illusory.

CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

Resolved, That a just sentiment of respect for the character of sovereign States, incurring pecuniary obligations by a deliberate act of the public will, and a solemn pledge of the public faith through their constitutional and appointed organs, forbids the apprehension that any of the States of this Union will fail to call forth their utmost resources for the final redemption of their engagements; preferring every sacrifice to dishonor, and proud to illustrate that jealous spirit of independence which belongs to free republican States, by a stern and strenuous reliance on their own faculties for deliverance from their present temporary embarrassment.

Which Mr. ALLEN had proposed to amend, by inserting after the word "States," in the 9th line of the second resolution, the following words:

By the appropriation or pledge of any part of its revenue or other income; or by the issue, transfer, or pledge of any stock or other securities; or by the pledge of any part of the public domain; or by the pledge, appropriation, or diversion, or deposite of any part of the proceeds arising from the sales of the public domain, to such States, or to the holders of the obligations of such States, or by any other means, direct or indirect.

For the whole of which Mr. MERRICK offered the following as a substitute:

Resolved, That governments are rightfully instituted solely for the happiness of the governed; and, consequently, that government is derelict in its duty, which shall refuse or neglect the full exertion of its legitimate powers for the relief of its citizens, whenever evils destructive of their happiness exist, which such legitimate exertion of the powers of government are competent to remove or alleviate.

Resolved, That evils of the most grave and distressing character do now affect a very large portion of the people of these United States, which it is fully within the competency of this Government greatly to alleviate, if not entirely to remove; and from which there is no relief to be expected, unless from the timely interposition of Government, till after long and protracted suffering.

Resolved, That the most prominent among these evils, are the great disorders of the currency; the unexampled appreciation of money, as compared with the products of industry, and all kinds of property; the consequent destruction of credit, and paralysis of trade and commerce; the large indebtedness of many of the States of the Union; and the pressure of direct taxation upon their people.

Resolved, That a fair and equal distribution among all the States of that vast amount of their common property, the public lands, held by this Union, is called for by the present necessities of many of the States, would be eminently beneficial to all, and would greatly promote the happiness and welfare of the whole people.

Resolved, therefore, That it is the duty of the Government of the United States, without further delay, to exercise its unquestionably constitutional power over this subject, and to make such provisions for a distribution of the public lands, or a portion of the value thereof, among all the States, as will best tend to the relief of both States and the people from the distresses and embarrassments under which they are suffering.

Mr. BARROW remarked that he had, in every instance when a vote was taken to lay this question on the table, voted in the affirmative. He had thus voted, not because of a desire to avoid, individually, the responsibility of voting on the question; or to save, so far as his vote would save, the party to which he was attached from the responsibility of a direct vote. He proposed from the first, and he now proposed, that, if such was the sense of the Senate, a vote should be taken to declare his opinion on the resolutions and various amendments before the Senate. He wished the matter arrested; because, in the first place, he knew well, and older Senators knew better than he did, that it was utterly impossible to get a vote of the Senate on these resolutions—covering so much ground, and involving so many high considerations and so important a principle—without a full and free discussion. As familiar as the question involved might be to older members of that body, yet it was not quite so familiar to younger members, among whom he numbered himself. Senators knew that there were only twelve days left before the time fixed by the Constitution for the adjournment will have arrived. They all knew that their calendar was loaded with business of a public and private character; that the public interests, and the private interests of many of our citizens, required definite action before the adjournment. But he would not dwell upon the reasons which had prompted him to give the votes he had given; yet he wished the country to understand that this question of the utmost magnitude had been pressed upon the consideration of the Senate, and a vote and decision upon it could not be rationally and reasonably expected without discussion. And the inevitable consequence of discussion must result in the postponement of all action, on the part of that body, on all other matters, whatsoever their importance. But if he had no such potent and powerful reasons for giving his vote on laying the subject on the table, he had another one, which, to his mind, was conclusive. These resolutions do not, or could not, give legislative sanction to anything or any principle; and however willing Senators were to express their opinions on abstract principles, it would lead to no definitive result; and however earnestly Senators may now entertain those opinions, and however positively they may declare that they will abide and stand by those opinions, yet he would suggest that it was very possible that some of the Senators (especially Democratic Senators, who profess to hold to the doctrine of instruction, and obey the will and wishes of the people) would have to change their opinions in relation to the principles of the resolutions. He asked the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BUCHANAN]—who has, to his credit and honor, professing the principle (which Mr. BARROW did not subscribe to) that Senators were bound to obey the will and instructions of the Legislatures of their States,—he asked that Senator—who, on one occasion, cast a vote in opposition to the convictions of his own mind, in obedience to the will of his constituency—whether, if he voted against those resolutions, a case might not arise where he would feel it to be his imperious duty to give a vote adverse to the principles of those resolutions. If he should receive instructions from his Legislature to vote in a particular manner upon the question of assuming the State debts, whether, as a Democratic Senator, he would not feel it to be his duty to vote for the issuing of scrip by the Federal Government, for the relief of the States? And other Senators on that side (Whig side) may have occasion to change their opinions. He presented that view of the question, to show how unwise it was for Senators to pledge themselves to the support of any particular abstract proposition. But he would dwell no longer on that branch of the subject. He had no inclination to consume one moment of the time of the Senate in the discussion of the resolutions. He had too much respect for that body, and for himself, to enter into a discussion of the great principles involved in the resolutions and amendments, without proper investigation; but, being called upon to vote, it devolved on him, unprepared as he was, to say a few words in relation to the principles involved in the resolutions. A false issue was presented to the American people, through the press; and by a few remarks which had been made in the Senate since the introduction of the resolutions, a false issue was also presented as to the action which had been proposed in the other House. The question discussed there, and through the public journals, was, whether there should be an issue by the Federal Government of stock based upon the public lands, for the relief of the States; and not, as was represented by the remarks of the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. RIVES,] as a proposition for the Federal Government to assume the debts of the States. Now, he would not stop to discuss at large the abstract proposition of the power of the Federal Government to assume the debts of the States, without reference to the nature of those debts and the condition of the country, when the question shall be presented. He asserted that, if the action of this Government was sufficient to settle any constitutional question, the power of this Government even to assume the debts of the States has been, by the action of this Government, settled affirmatively. Whether the decision was correct or not—whether the action of Congress was a usurpation of power—was a question he would not then undertake to discuss; but he would call the Senate to the case and the occasion.

In 1790, during the administration of General Washington, Congress did assume the debts of the States—amounting to more than $31,000,000; and $4,000,000 of that amount was paid to the State which the honorable Senator [Mr. RIVES] who introduced these resolutions in part represents. He (Mr. B.) knew that Senators on the other side would say, in reply to this, that that was an assumption of debts contracted by the States during our revolutionary war, in a struggle which was the common cause of all. This did not affect at all the question of the constitutional power of the Government. And this case, as well as that, was to be settled on grounds of expediency alone; and it was the expediency of the measure then, and nothing else, that settled the question. South Carolina was indebted $3,500,000, and the Government assumed the debt, to that extent, for her. Whether the exigencies of these States were such now as to make it expedient to interfere in any manner, was a question of expediency, and not of constitutional power, as he viewed; and as he thought the Senate would view it, when he presented it in connexion with another subject. He did not wish to be understood as expressing an opinion that the Government had the power to assume, when the majority of Congress pleased, whether the debts were contracted for any and every purpose. He would only refer to one other instance of the assumption of debts—not of the States, but of individuals—on the part of the Government. The Government assumed the debt of individuals to the amount of £600,000, when the great leader of the State-rights party was at the head of the Government. In the treaty of 1802, between Lord Hawkesbury and Mr. King, the United States Government agreed to pay £600,000. For what purpose, and when? To British merchants, for debts due to them by American merchants; not for debts in aiding in struggles for independence, but debts due by American citizens to English citizens when the war broke out. It was a subject of correspondence between these two Governments for a long time, when this Government finally obligated itself to pay the debts of those individuals. But, to pass by that, and come to the grounds in this matter. He held, in reference to this question, which was presented to the American people—the power and duty of the Federal Government to assume, in some form or shape, and to assume them speedily, to relieve the States, the heavy debts which were weighing them down—that it was the duty of the Government to interfere in some way. The public domain belonged to the States of this Confederacy. This was the platform on which he stood. The question was not whether this Government had the power to assume the debts of the States, but whether they ought to be assumed. He thought it was the duty of Congress, in this time of pressing need, to come forward and relieve the States, by appropriating to their use the proceeds of the public lands; and if it became necessary to anticipate those proceeds by the issue of stock, he could see no good reason why it should not be done; but he was inclined to think this would not be necessary.

Mr. RIVES would merely say, that, whether other gentlemen might feel themselves called on to express their views or not, he did not himself intend to consume a single moment of the time of the Senate in the discussion of the subject. He had offered the resolutions with no purpose of interfering with the important business which was already before the Senate. He thought the propositions contained in the resolutions were so plain, that gentlemen would have no difficulty in voting upon them at once. If, however, gentlemen on the other side were disposed to debate the question, he did not wish to be held responsible for the consumption of time. The Senator from Ohio, the other day, had made an appeal to him to accept the proposition which he had submitted as an amendment of his resolutions. This he could not do, in the manner and form in which it was offered; but he had prepared a modification of that amendment, so as to make it applicable to the issue of the two hundred millions of Government stock. He had no objection so to modify his resolutions as to make them applicable to the mode of assumption. If this met the views of the gentleman from Ohio, he would adopt the modification.

Mr. ALLEN said his object in presenting the amendment, was to embrace the proposition of the issue of Government stock, called the two hundred million scheme, and all other schemes which authorized the issue of scrip predicated upon the proceeds of the public domain. He had not drawn up that amendment with anything like ostentation; and, as the phraseology employed by the Senator from Virginia embraced very nearly the true object which he had in view, he was perfectly content that the gentleman's modification should be substituted for the amendment which he had proposed.

The modification proposed by Mr. RIVES was then accepted as a substitute for Mr. ALLEN's amendment.

Mr. GRAHAM apprehended the question should first be taken on the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. MERRICK was of opinion that, now, the next question in order would be on his amendment.

Mr. BUCHANAN apologised for not addressing the Senate on this occasion. It was evident that this discussion interfered with the bill of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. LINN] for refunding the fine imposed on General Jackson by Judge Hall, and also would be likely to interfere with the bill of the Senator from Georgia on the subject of the bankrupt law. As soon as these subjects should be disposed of, he would feel himself pledged to bring forward the question involved in these resolutions, in a few direct petitions which he would present; and, on that occasion, he would claim the indulgence of the Senate to grant him one-half hour for the expression of his sentiments.

The question then coming up on Mr. MERRICK's amendment,

Mr. BERRIEN observed, that this being a proposition to strike out one or more of the original resolutions, could not, as he conceived, take precedence of a proposition to perfect the original proposition by amendment. Before a motion to strike out is in order, it is competent to entertain a motion to amend. The modification of the second resolution not having been put to the vote, but being accepted by the framer of the original proposition, did not affect the right to amend. He would therefore submit an amendment, to be decided before the motion to strike out could be entertained. As he understood, the object of the Senator from Virginia was to obtain a direct vote on the question of the constitutional power and expediency of entertaining any proposition for the assumption of the debts of the States by the General Government. If confined to that object solely, he could see no objection to the expression of opinion required; but these resolutions go beyond that object, and bear an inference which may create an objection with several Senators to vote on them. They leave the inference that the Senate denies the constitutional power of the Government over the question of the distribution of the proceeds of the public lands, or the public domain itself. His desire, in the amendment he should submit, was to exclude any inference beyond the naked question on which the Senator from Virginia proposed to obtain the vote. The Senator would see, that if the proceeds of the sales of the public lands were distributed among the States, they could apply the amount to the payment of their debts, or any other purpose; yet this would not be the assumption at which the Senator's resolutions are aimed. His amendment to the second resolution was a proviso that nothing therein contained shall be deemed to affirm or deny the power of the General Government to distribute to the States the proceeds of the public lands, or to surrender the public lands to the several States to which they belong.

Mr. BAYARD understood the state of the case to be, now, that these resolutions of the Senator from Virginia, having come up as a substantive proposition, and a modification of one of them having been accepted, the next amendment in succession was on the proposition of the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. MERRICK,] to strike out, and substitute certain resolutions offered by him. The amendment of the Senator from Maryland then stood as an amendment to the original proposition; and it was, therefore, competent to any one to go a stage farther, and move to amend the amendment. He would, therefore, move to amend the amendment, by striking out the second resolution, and inserting the substitute he should send to the Chair.

The CHAIR explained that the motion of the Senator from Georgia to perfect the resolution, would be in order before either motions to strike out.

Mr. BAYARD believed the Chair was right. His amendment could therefore lie over till the proposition of the Senator from Georgia was disposed of.

Mr. CRITTENDEN thought it was now perfectly manifest that, if this discussion was to proceed, and amendments on amendments were to be considered, it would be utterly impracticable to advance any further this session with the ordinary business of legislation. The proper despatch of the real business yet to be accomplished, and the due deliberation of the vast and momentous questions which must necessarily be called up in this discussion, were incompatible. It was but a few days ago, when there was a full session, (or one very nearly full,) that this whole subject in another form had been deliberately laid on the table. These resolutions of the Senator from Virginia escaped the fate of the resolutions of the Senator from South Carolina, with the various amendments pending to them, by the mere accidental circumstance of being out of reach, though substantially before the Senate. They were merely outside of the rules by which, technically, they could be considered as pending amendments; but now they come up with all the vitality of the original resolutions of the Senator from South Carolina; and as many, if not more, amendments are to be discussed, one after another, till every remaining hour of the session is to be consumed upon them. Virtually, they should be considered as having gone on the table with the original resolutions to which they were intended to be appended; and the gentleman might just as well make a motion to take up the resolutions of the Senator from South Carolina again, as to proceed with these resolutions. Now, he would ask, had not the rights of legislating in this way some assignable limits? Is the ordinary business of Congress to give way to this reiteration of abstract discussions, leading to nothing, and not even having any professed object of direct action in view? Are the gentlemen who stand pledged to certain views, or who have brooded over this subject till they think they are enlightened enough to come to a decision, the only persons whose wishes are to be consulted? The Senator from Virginia, who introduced these resolutions, had doubtless investigated the subject thoroughly; and, being satisfied himself, now called on every one else to vote without discussion—not even deigning to bestow upon the Senate the information in his power to bestow. He seems, on the contrary, to imagine that they are such invaluable propositions, that, once they are proposed, it is the duty of the Senate to vote upon them in silence and in reverence. And what subjects do they involve? Subjects of the gravest and most momentous character—touching the very foundations of the whole fabric of our Government and institutions. These were not questions to be hastily and hurriedly voted upon, and without discussion. Yet it was obvious no time remained of this session for discussing any one branch of these subjects.

These resolutions are put forward as of vital and pressing necessity, to arrest the doctrines spreading abroad in relation to the assumption of the debts of the States. What effect of that kind can they possibly have? Will they arrest public opinion? Is the Senate of the United States constituted for the manufacture of public opinion? Is it to be the Propaganda of public sentiment? If gentlemen expected this, they would be disappointed. They could neither make nor crush public opinion. Their resolutions, even if they were passed, would amount to nothing. They would have no legislative effect, and could not manufacture the public opinion expected from them. The more they are discussed, the more discussion they will create among the people; so that, instead of crushing the sentiments they are intended to extinguish, they will excite their development and extension. He, for one, had no opinion to conceal, or shrink from avowing in the face of the world. If gentlemen wanted an expression of his sentiments on this subject, they should have it, vote or no vote. He told them now that, in his opinion, this Government was under no obligation whatever, moral or legal, to assume the debts of the States, incurred for their own individual purposes. It was his opinion that the faith of the General Government was not committed in the slightest degree by the obligations of the States to their creditors. He trusted the day was far distant when any state of things could exist in which it would be expedient even for the General Government to entertain the subject, in any shape or form, of interfering for the adjustment of State obligations. But much and decidedly as he was opposed to such interference, he was not prepared to say that, in the long hereafter which may be viewed in perspective, a case may not possibly arise in which the embarrassments of one or more States may be such that, if not relieved, they may endanger the General Government itself and the whole Union. And viewing that possibility—and he only looked upon it, as at present informed, as a bare possibility—he was not prepared to pledge himself, by any obligatory vote, against such line of conduct as the best policy and best interests of the country might demand at his hands.

After reviewing the whole subject in a great variety of lights, Mr. C. concluded by remarking that he could not vote for the amendment of the Senator from Georgia, nor did he see how any friend to the great principle of distribution could vote for it. The question of the distribution of the proceeds of the sales of the public lands to the several States was one which he and his friends had maintained with all the zeal and energy of which they were capable; they had never doubted the constitutional power to make that distribution. They considered it a question placed beyond the possibility of doubt. But the amendment of the Senator from Georgia at once sanctions a doubt upon that point in the outset, by stating that this resolution is to be understood as neither affirming nor denying the power of the General Government as to the distribution or surrender to the States of the public lands. He could not vote for it, and he trusted the friends of distribution would not.

Mr. BAGBY explained; and, in the course of his explanation, he denied that he had attempted to manufacture public opinion by anything which he had said; and he asserted that he was as little of a political propagandist as the Senator from Kentucky himself. Since he had had the honor of a seat in the Senate, he had never played the part, nor attempted to play the part, of a political propagandist. He had never introduced into this body what the gentleman was pleased to denominate abstract propositions; and, if he adhered to his present impressions, in all human probability he never should. Indeed, he had gone further; for he had not only not introduced abstract propositions there, but he had not even entered into their discussion until he was driven to it by the remarks of other Senators on this floor. Great, and vital, and important as these and kindred propositions were, he had not entered into this discussion to manufacture public opinion; for he was not vain enough to believe that he could manufacture public opinion, even for those who generally think with him; much less, for others who differed from him. But, little as he expected anything which he said to have any effect on the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CRITTENDEN,] he must say he was a little astonished at the small importance that Senator seemed now to attach to the introduction and discussion of propositions like this; for, though he did not recollect any occasion on which the Senator had troubled the Senate with resolutions of this character, he did recollect a notable instance when, whatever the effect might be before the country, or in other quarters, he did not expect the effect would have been entirely lost on the Senator from Kentucky himself. What was the course of that gentleman's illustrious predecessor?—and when he said illustrious, he meant what he said. At the last session, that individual (Mr. Clay) introduced eleven abstract propositions; and they occupied the time of this body for five calendar months; and not only so, but when he (Mr. Clay) retired from this body, in his valedictory address, he bequeathed those resolutions as a legacy to the Senate.

Mr. CRITTENDEN made some remark, which was not distinctly heard; but he was understood to say that he did not vote for those resolutions.

Mr. BAGBY continued. Perhaps he was mistaken; but he could not be mistaken in this: that when such doctors disagreed, as some Senators to whom he had alluded, on subjects like this, it might be exceedingly difficult for him to decide correctly. The course of the last session was to consume five months—even that time was not deemed too much then—on abstract propositions. But now, a short time—even one short day—was considered as an unreasonable appropriation of time on a subject like this. And what gave rise to the discussion of this question on a former day? Why, they had been told, day after day, session after session, and from sources without number, that the credit of a number of these States had become bad; and without some interference of the General Government—if not to pay the debts of those States, at least to assist them—the taint of the credit of the States would extend to the Federal credit. Now, he did not wish to say—it would not be becoming his position there, and his position forbade it—that he should renew the proposition of the Senator from Virginia; but he asked what those propositions were? How much did those resolutions contain that was right, and how much was contained in them that was wrong? If gentlemen could show him anything in them that was wrong, he would pledge himself to go against them. But they merely contained great and fundamental principles. What were they? Some of them were, that this Government had no constitutional power to provide for the payment of State debts; and that if that power existed, it would be a dangerous power, and its exercise would be inexpedient in the extreme. That, he believed, was their substance; and he asked the Senate if these propositions did not connect themselves intimately, deeply—nay, vitally with the condition of the country, and the position of the public credit? And if such was the condition of the credit of the country, what, he asked, was it the duty of Senators to do? The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CRITTENDEN] told them that he was prepared to record his vote on an enactment, but he would not act on abstract propositions. Now, he asked that honorable Senator where was the difference between expressing an opinion on a resolution involving great and important principles, and expressing an opinion on a law involving the same great and important principles? It might be said these resolutions came not within the sphere of their action. Well, if on the resolutions which he advocated, and which he believed contained the true theory of the Constitution on that subject, and on the vote on the adoption or the rejection of which he did believe the perpetuity of our institutions depended—if, he said, on questions like this, gentlemen come up and toe the mark, there must be some reason for it. And what was the reason? He spoke from the evidence before him; he took into view all the discussions on this subject; and he must be permitted to say, with all possible respect for honorable Senators, that there was a disposition manifested, beyond all doubt, not to express an opinion on these resolutions—not because it was improper to do so, but because gentlemen considered it impolitic to do so. Why? Look at the amendment notified by the gentleman from Delaware; and what was that? It came within one inch of the mark. The gentleman proposed, in the resolution which affirmed that the General Government had no constitutional power to interfere and pay the debts of the States, to substitute the word "obligation" for "power;" and he talked about legal "obligations" and moral "obligations," and on that point they had had many homilies read to them. Now, with all possible respect for the gentleman who introduced that amendment, he must be permitted to say that it looked more like political propagandism than anything else.

He then proceeded to notice the remarks of the Senator from Louisiana, [M. BARROW,] who had misunderstood his observations on a previous day. That honorable Senator had said that those who were opposed to the assumption of State debts were so on the ground that they were held by British bankers and British brokers; and he further said that there was no difference between their obligation to American citizens, and British bankers and brokers. Why, he (Mr. BAGBY) said so too; but that was not the point. He (Mr. BAGBY) said they were under no obligation at all. He would ask the Senator from Louisiana, then, the question—whether there was a doubt operating on the public mind, both at home and abroad, in regard to the power of this Government to assume and pay the State debts? And he asked if, according to testimony before them, it was not operating injuriously on the public credit? He asked further, if it was too much to ask Senators to remove the doubt which was operating so injuriously—not to manufacture opinion, but to remove erroneous impression. Look at the correspondence of those British brokers and British bankers with the President of the United States and his Secretary of State; and what was the language, and what was the tenor, of the whole of them? American stocks must inevitably go down, unless one thing was done; and what was that? Why, it was said an assurance must be extended to the foreign holders of State stocks, or the national credit would partake of that blight which had cut off all hope in reference to State liabilities. That was a question which, in his (Mr. BAGBY's) opinion, called on them for a decisive and direct opinion respecting State debts; and not for the purpose of manufacturing public opinion. He (Mr. B.) should manufacture opinion for no one; he was there to express his own. He wished to manufacture opinion for no one: he wished to fabricate political capital for no one; but he wished to remove impressions that their treasury was bankrupt, and their credit dishonored; and he believed, as he had a soul to be saved, that if the American Secretary had done what he ought to have done—if he had said to these bankers and brokers that this Government had no power over this subject, this Government would never have stood in the position in which it was represented to stand at this hour. After a few other observations, the honorable gentleman took his seat.

Mr. CONRAD observed that it was not his intention to have taken any further part in this discussion; and he would not now have risen, had not the Senator from Alabama made allusion to his remarks, made the other day. Not that he considered there was anything discourteous in the Senator's allusions, but to set himself and the Senator right upon some points on which he might be misunderstood. It was true he had said—but not to the extent supposed by the Senator—that he saw nothing in the resolutions of the Senator from Virginia, with some few exceptions as to phraseology, to which he would not, on general principles assent. This, it would be recollected, was said under a protest that he had not either heard these subjects discussed in the Senate, or had time to examine into them himself; and therefore was not prepared to expressany decided opinion—not having, in fact, had an opportunity of making up his mind on the constitutional principles. But he was now prepared to say, that, having examined into the subject since these resolutions were last up, he had satisfied himself that he could not subscribe to the resolutions of the Senator from Virginia, without radical modifications, which would essentially change their character. The first resolution, which he considered merely prefatory, asserts a proposition as a fact, which he (Mr. CONRAD) denied to be a fact—that "another of the prominent causes which tend to prolong and increase the financial embarrassments of the country, and to retard the ultimate restoration of public and private credit, is the uncertainty and suspense thrown over the policy of this Government, in regard to the debts of the States, by the agitation of projects for the virtual assumption of those debts by the authorities of the Union."

Now, this was what he denied to be the fact. He knew it was not among the causes of the embarrassments of any of the States with which he was acquainted; for in such States there was no agitation whatever on the subject. Indeed, he doubted if it was a subject of agitation in any of the States at all—except, perhaps, Maryland, and one or two more. Mr. C. in like manner discussed the bearings of the several resolutions, and showed, from the context of the whole, why he could not subscribe to them. He then replied to such observations as the Senator from Alabama had made in reference to his (Mr. C.'s) former remarks.

Mr. CRITTENDEN next replied to the remarks of the Senator from Alabama, reiterating his former declarations as to his sentiments on the subject of the assumption of the debts of the States.

Mr. McDUFFIE said, in order that the opinions of every Senator might be distinctly obtained upon the propositions contained in the resolutions, he would propose an amendment, which he thought would naturally supersede that of the gentleman from Georgia; as by it was presented the separate and distinct questions of the constitutionality and the expediency of the assumption of State debts by the General Government.

Mr. CONRAD observed that this was the tenth or twelfth amendment that had been offered.

Mr. McDUFFIE. But this comes to the point.

Mr. CONRAD. It is about as far from the point, I apprehend, as any of the others. He moved to postpone the subject to the 1st day of December next.

Mr. WALKER said he did not know why they should not be permitted to have the vote as well upon the resolutions as they stood, as though each question was presented separately and distinctly. If the resolutions were considered of no consequence in themselves—if they were a mere brutum fulmen, and would have no influence upon popular opinion—upon the action of the States in relation to this matter—why had gentlemen consumed so much time? Why were they desirous of avoiding a vote, the consequences of which would amount to nothing? Why were they endeavoring to avoid a vote, by motions to lay the resolutions on the table, and by a motion for postponement? Why avoid a direct vote, denying or affirming the question of the constitutionality or expediency, as long as it would produce no effect? Produce no effect, sir! The Senate was one of the parties appealed to, to assume the debts of the States. They could not be assumed without the co-operation of the Senate; and would it, then, have no effect, that one of the parties should declare, in advance, their belief that this Government had no constitutional power to assume those debts? Who ever thought that the Legislatures of the several States possessed the power to instruct Congress to violate the Constitution? If they pass the resolution proclaiming that the Government possessed no constitutional power to do so, instruction would fall impotent. How had this question been brought there? Were the Democratic members of that body to be charged with consuming the time of the Senate upon this subject? Certainly not. The resolutions were brought forward by the friends of assumption—by numerous petitions from the people in various States, calling upon the Government to assume the debts of the States by the issue of stock. It had been brought to their attention by the friends—not by the opponents—of assumption; and the Senate had been asked for an expression of its opinion upon the subject. Was not this parliamentary? What had been the course adopted heretofore upon such subjects as this, where petitions had been presented, and the action of Congress upon it requested? Was it not usually—nay, almost universally—the practice of that body to make a respectful reply? He wished an expression of the judgment of the Senate to be made in this case, that there might be no misconception in the public mind in reference to the subject. And he would say to the Senate, that, by refusing such expression, they would assuredly occasion repudiation on the part of the Legislatures of the States. He hoped that a direct vote would be taken, believing it, as he did, of far greater importance than any other subject which could possibly engage the attention of Congress.

Mr. CALHOUN said he believed there was no member of that body who had a greater regard for the public faith, either of the States individually or united, in this Government; there was no man more anxious that they should fulfil with fidelity the engagements they had made, than he was; and yet he was as strongly—or, perhaps, more strongly—opposed to this measure than any member of that body. And if he had no other reason (for he would not go into the constitutional argument) but a regard for the interests of the stockholders themselves, he would raise his voice against it. He believed it would be doing them infinite injustice. If, by any possibility, this plan should be adopted, it could not stand; it would overwhelm the revenue of the country. Instead of being a charge upon the public lands alone, it would become a charge upon the customs, which, every one must be aware, were insufficient to sustain the ordinary expenses of the Government. To add a burden of six millions more was preposterous. It involved the alternative—which he trusted no one would desire—of internal taxation, or of repudiation on the part of the General Government.

He was decidedly of opinion that a response ought to be given to the numerous petitions which had been presented to them, and to the resolutions offered by the Senator from Maine. They ought to put upon record a vote declaring that it would be contrary to every consideration of expediency to adopt such a measure, in order to let the public creditors understand the true state of the question.

Mr. ARCHER said he was, as decidedly as any gentleman within that body could be, adverse to the proposition of assuming, on the part of this Government, the debts of the States, in whatever form that proposition might be presented. He had been desirous that an expression of the opinion of that body should be had upon the question; but it was now perfectly evident that every endeavor to obtain that expression must fail of success, from the policy which he perceived gentlemen were determined to pursue, in order to prevent a direct vote upon the proposition. He did not rise for the purpose of going into the discussion of the question; for it was a question, it seemed to him, altogether too large to admit of being properly and fully discussed during this session, even if the whole remaining time should be devoted to it.

When this subject was first brought before Congress, he (Mr. A.) confessed he was among the number of those who strongly reprehended (though he was then in the retirement of private life) even the introduction of the question into the Congress of the United States. It did not, at that time, even enter into his conception that it would ever be matter (as he now found it was likely to become) of grave deliberation whether it would be politic or just, on the part of this Government, to assume the debts of the States.

He was desirous of having a distinct vote upon the question now, though he was as adverse as the Senator from Kentucky had declared himself to be to the adoption of such a measure; for the matter was growing far beyond the bounds of an abstraction, though it might, perhaps, be considered a demi-abstraction still. He feared that a very alarming change in public sentiment, in reference to this subject, was about taking place; and, perhaps, by the time that Congress should again convene, if it were undetermined now, they would have it forced upon them the more urgently by reason of the delay. He was very apprehensive that all resistance to it, even now, would prove vain; but he desired to include himself among those who, on the very threshold of this matter, had waged an undying hostility towards this absurd and unwarrantable scheme.

Gentlemen talked of limitations upon the powers of this Government, and at the same moment were proposing legislative action by which the assumption of debts to the amount of $200,000,000 was contemplated; and those debts, too, never having been subject to the action of this Government When such a proposition as this could find a resting place in this, the highest national court of judicature, it was enough to awaken them to resistance; it was not a time for idle delay. They were invoked, by the highest considerations of public policy, to offer at once a determined resistance to this atrocious measure—for so he regarded it. But he had risen simply for the purpose of saying that, inasmuch as it would be altogether in vain, he thought, to attempt to get through this labyrinth of resolution piled upon resolution, he felt constrained to give way. He would be obliged to forego the attainment of the object which he greatly desired, namely: to obtain an expression of the opinion of the Senate upon this question, or else consent to consume the whole of the remaining time of the session. He would be constrained to vote, therefore—anxious as he was to give a vote directly upon the question, as well as to express his opinions upon it—for the postponement.

Mr. CUTHBERT observed that he always regarded what was said by the Senator from Kentucky as being entitled to much weight. But when that gentleman declared that he hoped it would be impossible that they should be called upon at any time to give an expression of the opinion of that body upon a question which would produce such an effect upon the country as this question must necessarily produce, he confessed he was not a little disappointed. On this side of the Chamber (the Democratic) they understood each other, and the country understood them. Their opinions in reference to this question were well known; but it belonged to the gentlemen on the other side to solve the doubts which were resting upon the public mind in regard to what the action of Congress would be in reference to it.

Was the Senator from Kentucky (versed, as he must be, in the Constitution and the laws of this country) not prepared to decide that this Government cannot assume the debts contracted by the States—that this Government cannot lay taxes to be applied to the purposes of the States? Surely he was prepared for this declaration; if not, what was the inference? That the party of which that gentleman was the powerful champion, was unwilling to lay its principles before the country. Was he willing to incur a suspicion of this nature? Did the gentleman hold that we had no right to hold consultation with the people upon subjects of this nature? Senators on this side thought differently. They were ever ready to enter into consultation; to reason; to argue; to remonstrate; to discuss, and endeavor to impress those opinions which they believed to be just.

Mr. CRITTENDEN responded to the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. CUTHBERT,] by again reiterating his sentiments on the subject of assumption, as stated in his first remarks.

The question then coming up on Mr. CONRAD'S motion to postpone the subject to the first Monday in December next,

Mr. EVANS called for the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. ARCHER asked were the resolutions offered by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. McDUFFIE] now included?

The CHAIR replied in the negative.

The motion to postpone was then decided in the affirmative—yeas 25, nays 22, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Archer, Barrow, Bates, Bayard, Berrien, Choate, Clayton, Conrad, Crafts, Crittenden, Dayton, Evans, Graham, Henderson, Huntington, Mangum, Merrick, Miller, Morehead, Phelps, Smith of Indiana, Sprague, Tallmadge, White, and Woodbridge—25.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Bagby, Benton, Buchanan, Calhoun, Cuthbert, Fulton, King, Lian, McDuffie, McRoberts, Rives, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Sturgeon, Tappan, Walker, Wilcox, Williams, Woodbury, Wright, and Young—22.

Mr. McDUFFIE now submitted his resolutions, as a substantive proposition, as follows:

Resolved, That the Government of the United States has no constitutional power to assume the debts contracted by the States for their own proper purposes, by the issue of stock, whatever fund may be pledged for the payment of the interest or principal.

Resolved, That it is inexpedient for this Government thus to assume the aforesaid debts.

He hoped they would be considered now, and allowed to go at once to the vote.

Mr. EVANS and others objected.

The resolutions, therefore, lie over one day, under the rule.

On motion of Mr. WHITE, the Senate then went into executive session; and, after some time spent therein, adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, February 18, 1843.

Mr. BARTON presented the petition of numerous citizens of Frederick county, Virginia, praying for relief to the country, by the issue of stock based upon the proceeds of the sales of the public lands.

Mr. W. W. IRWIN presented the memorial of William Bell and 642 other citizens of Western Pennsylvania, (who consider the public domain as the property of the individual States,) praying Congress to pass an act for the issue of Government stock, on the basis of the public domain.

THE OPERATION OF THE TARIFF ON FOREIGN TREATIES.

Mr. McKEON offered the following resolution; and it was adopted:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to this House (if not incompatible with the public interest) any correspondence between the representatives of foreign Governments and the Government of the United States in relation to the operation of the present tariff laws on treaties existing with those foreign Governments.

THE BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. FILLMORE said it had been his intention to move, this morning, that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; but he had been appealed to on all sides of the House to permit some bills on the Speaker's table to be this day disposed of; and he would, therefore, waive the motion which he had intended to make, so that the bills alluded to could be taken up and disposed of, and that then the committees could be called for reports; but, on Monday morning, he should move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. COWEN suggested that, after the disposal of the business alluded to, the House should take up a bill on the table for the relief of Amos Kendall; and he gave notice that he should move that the House go into Committee of the Whole on that bill.

Mr. J. THOMPSON rose, and called for the orders of the day.

Mr. A. H. H. STUART obtained permission to bring before the House the state of the Committee on Naval Affairs; which, being without a quorum, in consequence of the sickness of several of its members, it was unable to transact any business. He, therefore, moved that other gentlemen be appointed, to give the committee a working quorum, in the place of those who were unable to attend. The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MOORE presented resolutions of the Legislature of the State of Louisiana, directing the Senators from that State, and requesting its Representatives, to endeavor to get the Government to assist that State in removing obstructions in Red river; and another like resolution, directing and requesting their Senators and Representatives to use their exertions to have the second regiment of dragoons, now in the service of the United States, to be equipped, mounted, and occupied as at present, at Fort Jesup.

Mr. W. B. CAMPBELL presented additional documents, relating to the case of John McIntosh of Florida.

Mr. TURNEY presented like papers in the same case.

Mr. J. P. KENNEDY, from the Committee on Commerce, submitted a bill, as an amendment to a bill transmitted by the Secretary of the Treasury at the last session of Congress, in relation to custom-house organization.

THE REMOVAL OF JONATHAN ROBERTS.

The SPEAKER presented to the House an Executive communication from the Treasury Department, in answer to a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 13th February last, respecting the removal of Jonathan Roberts, collector of Philadelphia, which was as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
February 16, 1843.

SIR: I have the honor to state, in reply to the resolution of the House of Representatives, adopted on the 13th instant, that no charges have been preferred to this department against Jonathan Roberts, late collector of the port of Philadelphia, relative to his discharge of the duties of said office; that no order, instruction, or request, addressed to the said Jonathan Roberts, to remove or appoint any subordinate officers of the customs at the port of Philadelphia, is contained on the records of this department. The only letter on that subject, within my knowledge, being a private note written by me, endorsing one from the President; copies of neither of which were retained.

I herewith inclose, agreeably to the call contained in the resolution, a copy of the order, or letter, dismissing Mr. Roberts from the office of collector of said port, (marked A,) and a copy of a letter from the First Comptroller, (marked B,) which constitute all letters and papers in possession of the department, relating to the subject embraced in said resolution.

I am, sir, very respectfully,
Your obedient servant,
W. FORWARD,
Secretary of the Treasury.

To the Hon. JOHN WHITE, Speaker, &c.

A.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
September 10, 1842.

SIR: I am directed by the President to inform you that he has appointed Thomas S. Smith to be collector of the customs for the district of Philadelphia, in your place.

I am, very respectfully,
Your obedient servant,
W. FORWARD,
Secretary of the Treasury.

JONATHAN ROBERTS, Esq.,
Late Collector of the Customs, Philadelphia.

B.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Comptroller's Office, September 10, 1842.

SIR: Thomas S. Smith having been appointed collector of Philadelphia, you will deliver to him, on application, all the public property in your possession, together with the forms, books of entry, and instructions relating to the duties of the office, with which you have been furnished by this department; for all which you will take duplicate receipts, (specifying every article,) and forward one of them to this office.

Very respectfully,
Your obedient servant,
J. W. McCULLOCH,
Comptroller.

JONATHAN ROBERTS, Esq.,
Late Collector of Philadelphia.

Mr. TOLAND moved the reference of these papers to a select committee, with power to send for persons and papers; and on this he moved the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, the main question was ordered to be put, and a motion to lay the motion to refer on the table was negatived.

Mr. WISE called for a division of the motion; and the question was first taken on the motion to refer, which was carried by a majority of 74 to 61.

Mr. WISE called for the yeas and nays on the next branch of the motion; and, being ordered, they resulted thus—yeas 77, nays 65. The whole motion was, therefore, agreed to.

REMOVALS FROM OFFICE.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following communication, which was read:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
February 16, 1843.

SIR: I have the honor to state, in answer to the resolution of the House of Representatives adopted on the 13th instant, requiring copies of all or any charges that may be on file in my office against Calvin Blythe, as collector of the port of Philadelphia, and the names of those who petitioned for his removal, that no such charges or petitions are contained in the records of this department.

There are recommendations for the office of collector; but as they contain neither charges against Mr. Blythe, nor ask for his removal, they are not deemed to be within the call of the resolution.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
W. FORWARD,
Secretary of the Treasury.

Hon. JOHN WHITE,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

Mr. WISE observed, that as the response of the Secretary of the Treasury in relation to the removal of Jonathan Roberts, the successor of Mr. Blythe, had been referred to a select committee, with power to send for persons and papers, he should move the same reference in relation to the response respecting the removal of Mr. Blythe, but for the reason that he conceived that the House had in no capacity whatever, under the Constitution of the United States, the power to call the Executive to account for the removal of a public officer.

Mr. BARNARD called the gentleman to order, and demanded what was the question before the House.

Mr. WISE said that he should move to print the communication from the Treasury Department, and on that motion he intended to speak. We have (said he) an authority in the report of the Committee of Ways and Means on the exchequer bill; and, in that report, the extraordinary doctrine was laid down, that the entire Congress of the United States could not limit the executive power of removal.

Mr. BARNARD again called Mr. W. to order, on the ground of irrelevancy.

Mr. WISE said he had a right to show why he did not move to refer this communication to a select committee, and for pursuing a different course from that taken in the case of Jonathan Roberts. His remarks were, therefore, unquestionably pertinent to the motion before the House. The two cases were directly parallel. Blythe was in office as collector of Philadelphia, and was removed from it at the time that Roberts was appointed, without any imputation on his conduct, except that he differed in politics from the party in power. He was removed at the time when, notwithstanding the party that had just got into power had denounced the party that had gone out, for political proscription, there were 20,000 hungry wolves in this city, of the glorious Whig party, seeking whom they might devour. At that time, Calvin Blythe was turned out of office, without any charge whatever being made against him, and Roberts was put in his place. He did not intend to go into the case of Roberts, as it was not the subject of investigation; but he would remark, that the only blame he attached to the President in relation to this matter, was, for not removing him sooner than he did. Whether the case of Blythe was to be referred to a select committee, with power to send for persons or papers, or not, would depend on the motion of some other gentleman. He could not make that motion, for the reason he had before given; but would leave it to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. C. BROWN.]

He could not call on the President of the United States for his reasons for removing men from office, when, according to the report of the Committee of Ways and Means, they could not even delegate that power to the Senate, which co-operated in the appointing power. This Committee of Ways and Means had voted for the reference of the case of Roberts to a select committee, with power to send for persons and papers; which was, in effect, to make the President accountable to them for this removal, when, according to their report, he was not accountable even to the Senate. If there was one principle held by the Whigs more sacred than another, prior to the last elections, it was that the President of the United States should not have the power of removal without the concurrence of the Senate. No one before had ever held the monstrous doctrine that the House of Representatives should have the concurrent power of removal, and the power to send for persons and papers, to control the President of the United States in the exercise of this power. The doctrine he had always maintained was, that the Senate, having a voice in appointments to office, should also have a voice in removals from office; but that the House, having no voice in the appointments, should have none in the removals. He gave gentlemen warning that if they would go into the question of the removal of Jonathan Roberts, he should go into the case of the removals of 1,700 postmasters by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. GRANGER,] when he was Postmaster General. He had ever been opposed to the blind and indiscriminate removal of political opponents from office. He believed that one of the evils that was gnawing into the vitals of our institutions was the want of permanence in appointments to office; and if parties were to be permitted to put in their friends, and put out their enemies, every four years, the Government must go to wreck for the want of competent persons to carry it on.

Mr. EVERETT here called Mr. WISE to order for irrelevancy; and, after a short discussion on the point of order,

The SPEAKER decided that the gentleman from Virginia was in order.

Mr. EVERETT appealed, and called for the previous question; which was seconded by the House; and, under its operation, the appeal was overruled.

Mr. WISE then concluded his remarks by saying, that if gentlemen would go into this matter, they must also take up the reign of the "one month," as well as any succeeding period since the political death of Mr. Van Buren. The very time when they were protesting to the people of this nation that they were against proscription, the Whig party made the greatest number of removals—thus showing to the world that they were hypocrites and knaves.

Mr. CHARLES BROWN rose and moved that the communication be referred to the select committee, with instructions to inquire whether Jonathan Roberts took any part in the removal of Calvin Blythe, and what that part was. He made this motion, for the purpose of enabling him to say a few words to the House.

Mr. TOLAND said he had no objection to any inquiries being instituted.

Mr. JACOB THOMPSON wished to know whether the morning hour was now going on.

The SPEAKER said it was.

Mr. C. BROWN said the communication was such as every one expected to see. There were no charges against Calvin Blythe. Indeed, none could have been made against a man who preserved such an unblemished reputation, after a life of forty-five years, twenty of which had been spent in the service of his State, and on the battle-fields of his country. In the post of Secretary of State, judge of one of the State courts, and a public officer in various situations, he always bore and sustained a character of unimpeachable integrity. Appointed collector of the port of Philadelphia but a short time before the close of the late Administration, he had not been in office more than one year before he was removed, without a taint, or a suspicion, or a charge of any sort. Such was the history, in a few words, of Calvin Blythe. How different that of his successor! Jonathan Roberts was put in office to serve the basest purposes—to be the instrument of carrying out the political and personal schemes of bad men. It is upon the record given to the world by Mr. Roberts himself, that he took the office upon the conditions that he should turn out faithful officers, and put in their places the profligate and corrupt. No sooner was he installed in office, than every inspector and watchman in the custom-house was removed, without a man at sunrise the next day to tell the tale that he was still in office. In the letter of the President announcing the appointment, he tells Mr. Roberts that he is expected to appoint such men as Bela Badger and J. Washington Tyson should name to him;—nay, worse than that—such men as they had promised office to before they were appointed, and, no doubt, as the price of personal services to them in aiding them to get office from the President, or for corrupt services for pipe-laying for the Whig party to achieve its victory of 1840. And who were Bela Badger and J. Washington Tyson, that they should dictate to the Treasury Department, or the collector of Philadelphia, who should be the officers of its customs? The gentleman from Philadelphia [Mr. TOLAND] would not deny that Mr. Roberts had carried out to the letter the instructions of the President, and had appointed to office the friends and associates of Badger and Tyson. And such appointments! Of all the vile and the worthless in Philadelphia, some of them were the very worst. Instead of the custom-house, they were more fit for the penitentiary—loafers, pipe-layers, and pardoned convicts were among them. Whig meetings were held to denounce and repudiate them. Whig newspapers utterly condemned them. The whole city felt a shock at the desecration of one of its public institutions by the vile character of those placed in it by Mr. Roberts. Such were the facts of the case. Was it any wonder, then, that the President of the United States, as soon as he found out the character of Bela Badger, and those he had been the means of putting in office, should request Mr. Roberts to turn them out again? It was his duty to request them to be removed. And why could not Mr. Roberts have removed them? Had he not put them in at the request of the President? He had suffered dictation in the first instance—why not in the second? The reason was obvious. A change had come over the spirit of his dream. When he took the office, he was a friend of Mr. Tyler; when he was requested to make the removals, he was a friend to the chief of another division of the party. The officers to be removed were the open and avowed friends to that chieftain; and Mr. Roberts was willing they should continue in office, to abuse and vilify Mr. Tyler, to promote the election of Mr. Clay. These very crimes were qualifications in his eyes that fitted them for that service.

Those were the immediate causes of the removal. It was on record. Mr. Roberts had published his own guilt to the world, and it needed no committee of this House to give it a broader circulation.

There might have been other causes operating in the President's mind when he was removed. It might have been that Mr. Tyler did not know him so well when he appointed him; he might have heard afterwards that Mr. Roberts had been a decided opponent of General Harrison during the war; he might have seen on the records of the Senate, what he had not noticed before he appointed him—that Mr. Roberts had been one of those who had attempted to tarnish the fame of General Harrison, by refusing in the Senate of the United States to honor him. He might also have subsequently seen that Mr. Roberts was the author of the foulest slander ever propagated in this country, having attempted to tarnish the reputation of the wife of a hero and statesman—that which no honorable man would ever attempt to bring into politics. Mr. Tyler might not have known all this; and when he had become informed of it, Mr. B. appealed to this House and the country if he was not right in removing him; and Mr. B. only wished that he had placed his removal on higher grounds—on the grounds which he had last stated; but one and all of them were sufficient, and there was not a man in Pennsylvania, whose feeling was not callous, whose heart had not been deeply dyed in political partisanship, that had not rejoiced at the removal.

Mr. B., in conclusion, withdrew his motion, saying that his purpose was answered by the communication just received from the department, and that he did not wish to couple the name of Calvin Blythe any longer with that of Jonathan Roberts.

Mr. BARNARD now obtained the floor, and moved that the House go into Committee of the Whole on the subject of the exchequer.

The motion was voted down.

Mr. TOLAND then addressed the House in reply to the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. WISE,] and the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. CHARLES BROWN.] He said it was not his custom to take part in debates of this kind; and he would not do so on the present occasion, but that he felt it due to his constituents to say something. He read from the exposé of Mr. Roberts, referred to by his colleague, and contended that Mr. Roberts never consented to become the tool of any man.

Mr. C. BROWN rose, and read a part of the exposé, containing a letter from the President to Mr. Roberts, in which the President stated that "Mr. Badger and Mr. Tyson have been the warmest contestants. They may have made promises in anticipation of success to particular persons, whom you may quiet by carrying them out. I merely make you suggestions as from one friend to another, to be adopted by you as your judgment may dictate. I have one wish, I confess; and it is that Governor Shultz should have the place of principal—an office, the duties of which are light, and the income of some moment to him."

This, Mr. B. said, it was known was all carried out, except that Governor Shultz's son was appointed instead of Governor Shultz.

Mr. Roberts himself says, in his own exposé, that his "appointments throughout were governed by the EXPRESSED wishes of the President."

Mr. TOLAND resumed, and contended that the fact stated by his colleague came from the letter of the President, and not from Mr. Roberts. He rose not to attack the President, but to vindicate Mr. Roberts, who was removed because he would not become the tool of any man. He did not rise to speak against Calvin Blythe. He believed Mr. Blythe was a man of high character, and he had never asked for his removal. But the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WISE] had attacked his resolution as if he had intended, in offering it, to interfere with the functions of the President. So far from having any such design, he had studiously avoided affording even a shadow for such a charge. He had not called on the President, but merely for documents on file in the Treasury Department. Were the departments to be sealed to members desiring information?

Mr. WISE said that a mere call for papers on file would give a partial view only of the question. A call on the President would give the entire view of it. He objected to giving the committee power to send for persons and papers, because it looked like an attempt to hold the President responsible to the House for his appointments.

Mr. TOLAND continued, and was understood to say that the charges against the President, in the matter of the removal of Mr. Roberts, were of a very grave character, and should be investigated.

Mr. WISE said he was glad to see what was the gentleman's object. It was impeachment.

Mr. TOLAND did not desire to have words put in his mouth which he did not say. He wished inquiries to be instituted, not knowing where those inquiries would lead him. If they led to an impeachment, he (Mr. T.) would not shrink from it. Were he a friend of the President, so far from resisting inquiry, he would encourage and demand it.

Mr. STANLY next obtained the floor, and observed that he thought it was too late in the session to occupy the time of the House in discussing the villany of Captain Tyler. The Captain had not been able to get but one Democrat to support him; and now there remained no one on that floor to defend him, except the guard; two of whom, he understood, at least, were to receive fat offices after the 4th of March. If the subject came up at another time, he might say something upon it; but, at present, the game was too contemptible for him to waste his ammunition upon it. He therefore moved the previous question.

The previous question was sustained, and the House proceeded to vote on the motion to print; which was decided in the affirmative.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Treasury Department, transmitting the names of the clerks and other persons employed in that department during the past year: laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Also, a communication from the Second Auditor, transmitting a copy of the accounts rendered by disbursing officers of the Government: referred to the Committee on Public Expenditures.

Also, a communication from the Navy Department, stating that, in accordance with the resolution of August 20th, 1842, a contract had been entered into for the use of Babbit's anti-attrition metal, and asking that an appropriation be made to fulfil the consideration: referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Also, a communication from the Post Office Department, transmitting a list of the clerks employed in that department during the past year: laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

The following bills from the Senate were severally read twice, and referred:

The bill explanatory of the act entitled "An act in relation to lands sold at the Greensburg or St. Helena district, Louisiana," approved 2d August 1842; and

The bill for the relief of the heirs of Madame de Lusser, and their legal representatives.

The bill from the House for the relief of George Mayfield, with the amendments of the Senate thereto, was taken up, and the amendments concurred in.

Mr. EVERETT called up the motion for reconsideration of the vote on laying on the table the resolution reported by the Committee of Claims, allowing them to employ a clerk; and, under the operation of the previous question, the reconsideration was agreed to.

The question was then taken on laying the resolution on the table, and decided in the negative; after which,

The resolution was adopted—yeas 99, nays 72.

Mr. EVERETT then moved the reconsideration of the vote just taken, and called for the previous question; which was seconded by the House, and under its operation, the reconsideration was refused.

Mr. SAUNDERS, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported a bill for the relief of Joseph William Wilcox; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole, and ordered to be printed.

On motion by Mr. TILLINGHAST, the joint resolution providing for the distribution of the printed returns of the Compendium of the Sixth Census, was taken up; and the amendments being agreed to, it was passed.

EXCHEQUER.

Mr. BARNARD moved that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole, for the purpose of considering the exchequer bill; and after some remarks in opposition to the motion by Messrs. UNDERWOOD and McKENNAN, the motion was rejected.

Mr. BRIGGS asked if private bills were not first in order; and, if so, the bill for the relief of Philip Renault was the first on the calendar.

The SPEAKER said that the first business would be the motion to print the reports of the Committee of Ways and Means on the subject of issuing $200,000,000 of Government stock, on which the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. JACOB THOMPSON] had the floor.

Mr. JACOB THOMPSON said that several gentlemen having solicited him to waive his right to the floor for to day, in order that the House might proceed at once to the consideration of private and Territorial bills that were on their passage, he would do so, with the understanding that he might again have the floor on Tuesday. This being agreed to, by general consent,

The bill for the relief of Philip Renault was taken up and read a third time; and, on the question of its passage,

Mr. BIRDSEYE called for the yeas and nays; which being ordered, resulted in yeas 70, nays 98. So the bill was rejected.

Mr. UNDERWOOD proposed to the House to proceed with the Territorial bills, and the bills relating to the District of Columbia. These had all been discussed, with the exception of the District bank bills, which he proposed to give the go-by, in order to avoid discussion on them.

Mr. ADAMS insisted on taking up first the bill for the relief of the heirs of Robert Fulton; which was the next in order.

After a short discussion as to priority of business, in which Messrs. ADAMS, UNDERWOOD, and McCLELLAN, took part—

The bill for the relief of the heirs of Robert Fulton was taken up.

Mr. W. W. IRWIN called for the previous question on its passage.

Mr. BURKE moved to lay it on the table. The report made by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HUBARD] was very argumentative and conclusive, and showed that the claim was utterly without any foundation.

After seconding the previous question, and ordering the main question,

The yeas and nays were taken, resulting in yeas 89, nays 59.

So the bill was passed.

Mr. R. McCLELLAN moved the reconsideration of the vote just taken, and called for the previous question; under the operation of which the motion was negatived.

SURETIES OF SAMUEL SWARTWOUT.

The bill to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to make a compromise with the sureties on the official bond of Samuel Swartwout, late collector of the port of New York, came up on its third reading.

Mr. J. C. CLARK moved the previous question; which was sustained by the House.

Mr. GRAHAM moved that the bill be laid on the table: rejected—ayes 59, noes 75.

Mr. STANLY asked for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill; which were ordered.

The bill was rejected—yeas 72, nays 75.

SAM WELLER.

Mr. TOMLINSON appealed to the House to take up the bill for the relief of Sam Weller.

After objections made in several quarters, but subsequently withdrawn, the House agreed to take up the bill.

It was then read a third time, and passed.

Attempts were then made by Mr. COWEN to take up the private calendar; by Mr. McKENNAN, to take up Territorial business; and by Mr. UNDERWOOD, to take up District business.

After some debate, a motion by Mr. McKENNAN, that the Territorial and District of Columbia bills on the Speaker's table be taken up, with a view to their passage, prevailed.

THE TERRITORIES AND THE DISTRICT.

A bill making an appropriation for the improvement of the public buildings in Florida, was read a third time, and passed.

A bill to provide for the erection of a marine hospital at Key West, Florida, came up with an amendment from the Committee of the Whole. The amendment declares that the sum of $10,000 shall be applied to the erection and finishing of the hospital.

It was agreed to, and the bill read a third time, and passed.

The bill making appropriations for the repair and improvement of certain roads and other highways in the Territory of Florida, was, after being ordered to be engrossed, read the third time; and, on the question "Shall the bill pass?" it was decided in the negative.

So the bill was rejected.

The bill for the protection of the commerce of the western shores of Lake Michigan was taken up.

Mr. HALSTED moved to amend it, by striking out all the appropriations, except for the harbor of Milwaukie and for the light-house.

Mr. H. DODGE earnestly appealed to the House not to strike out the appropriations for Racine and Lockport, which he said were in the bill of the last session. He hoped they would now be retained.

The question being taken on the amendment, it was rejected; and, the bill having been ordered to be engrossed, was read the third time, and passed—yeas 84, nays 55.

The bill to authorize the election of officers in the Territory of Wisconsin, was also read the third time, and passed.

The bill making appropriations for certain roads, and for the survey of a canal route in the Territory of Iowa, was taken up; and, after some remarks from Mr. SPRIGG in opposition to the bill, and from Mr. A. C. DODGE in its favor,

Under the operation of the previous question, the amendment pending was concurred in, and the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

On the question of the passage of the bill,

Mr. SPRIGG called for the yeas and nays, which were ordered; and then,

On motion of Mr. ARNOLD,

The House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

MONDAY, February 20, 1843.

The PRESIDENT pro tem. laid before the Senate a communication from the War Department, reporting, in compliance with the 5th section of the act of 3d March, 1809, a statement from the Second Auditor of the Treasury, showing the expenditures made in the year 1842 out of the appropriations made for the contingent expenses for the military establishment; which, on motion of Mr. EVANS, was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. EVANS presented a memorial from citizens of the State of Maine, praying protection, by a specific duty, on imported lumber; which was referred to the Committee on Manufactures.

Mr. STURGEON presented a joint resolution adopted by the Legislature of Pennsylvania, instructing their Senators and requesting their Representatives to urge the passage of a law revising the act of 1838, granting a pension for five years to the widows of officers and soldiers of the revolutionary war; which was ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. BATES presented a petition from the Western Railroad Company, praying an extension of the time for laying down railroad iron which may be imported free of duty before the 2d of March; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. CHOATE presented a petition from Hall Jackson Kelly, asking the United States to grant him the privilege to purchase a tract of land in the Oregon Territory, for the purpose of colonization, on reasonable terms; which was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. BUCHANAN presented a memorial from merchants and traders of the city of Philadelphia, asking Congress to modify the provisions of the tariff, so as to allow a drawback on exports of domestic spirits, equal to the duty on the foreign produce from which it is distilled; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. YOUNG presented the petition of Gilbert Buckingham, and 225 others, citizens of Henry and Whiteside counties, in the State of Illinois, praying for the establishment of a tri-weekly mail-route from Peoria, by way of Mount Hawley, in Peoria county, Wyoming and Toulon, in Stark county, Wethersfield and Genesee, in Henry county, Sharon, and Crandall's ferry, to Albany, in Whiteside county, so as to intersect the Galena and Rock Island mail-route at Albany, and the Dixon and Rock Island mail-route at Crandall's ferry; which, on his motion, was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. SMITH of Indiana, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported back, with an amendment, House bill entitled "An act in relation to the exemplification of land patents and other evidences of title under the act entitled An act to re-organize the General Land Office:" the amendment was ordered to be printed.

Mr. PHELPS, from the Committee on Pensions, reported back, without amendment, the bill for the relief of Anne Jones

Mr. P. remarked, in relation to the bill, that the applicant claims a pension, by reason of the services of her husband during the revolutionary war. She was not a widow when the act under which she claimed a pension was passed, which disentitled her to a pension by the previous action of Pension Department; but the department had, in relation to the act of August last, given such construction of the pension laws as to extend the rights of pension to those who had become widows since the passage of the law. The resolution of the committee was, therefore, that no action of Congress was necessary in the case. He made that remark, with a view that the bill be now acted upon, by indefinitely postponing it, for the purpose of submitting the matter to the department.

On motion of Mr. PHELPS, the previous orders of the day were postponed, and the bill was taken up, as in committee of the whole, and indefinitely postponed.

Mr. PHELPS, for the same reason and purpose, made a similar motion in relation to the House bills for the relief of Catherine Wilson and Maria M. Brooks; and, on his motion, the previous orders of the day were postponed, and those bills were considered, and laid on the table.

Mr. WALKER submitted the following resolution, and asked for its consideration then:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to communicate to the Senate, at the next session of Congress, a plan and estimates for the improvement of the navigation of the Ohio, by the construction of an enlarged steamboat canal on the Indiana side of the falls, near Louisville; also, to report what effect would be produced on the navigation of that river above the falls, by the removal of the ledge of rocks at that point; also, what would be the expense of enlarging the present canal, so as to admit the largest class of boats; and what arrangements, if any, can be made for rendering the said canal toll free, or subject to such toll only as may be necessary to keep the same in repair.

Mr. EVANS objected to the consideration of the resolution then, on the ground that he did not see that any funds were at the disposal of the department for that purpose.

Mr. WALKER was understood to say that no appropriation of money was necessary. The resolution was, however, laid on the table till to-morrow.

Mr. CRITTENDEN, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which had been referred House bill entitled "An act to provide for the payment of Iowa militia called into service in December, 1839, to prevent the invasion of that Territory by the State of Missouri," reported that the committee did not find sufficient grounds to sanction the claim, and had instructed him to ask that it be discharged from the further consideration of the subject; and,

After a few remarks by Mr. LINN, the question of discharging the committee was postponed.

On motion by Mr. PHELPS, the previous orders of the day were postponed, and the Senate bill for the relief of Asahel Brainard was taken up as in committee of the whole; and, there being no amendment proposed, it was reported to the Senate, and ordered to be engrossed; which having been done, it was subsequently read the third time and passed.

On motion by Mr. WALKER, the previous orders of the day were postponed, and the Senate proceeded to consider, as in committee of the whole, the bill for the relief of John Hutchins. Mr. WALKER having explained the bill, and there being no amendment proposed, it was reported to the Senate, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading. It was subsequently read the third time and passed.

Mr. CRITTENDEN submitted a motion to postpone the previous orders of the day, for the purpose of taking up the bill for the relief of Mrs. Thompson, widow of the late Col. Thompson; but, after a few remarks from Messrs. ALLEN and WOODBURY, suggesting that if this bill was taken up, it would interfere with the resolutions of the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. McDUFFIE,] which were in order during the morning hour, he withdrew the motion.

The CHAIR then announced that the following resolutions submitted by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. McDUFFIE] were in order, viz:

Resolved, That the Government of the United States has no constitutional power to assume the debts contracted by the States for their own proper purposes, by the issue of stock, whatever fund may be pledged for the payment of the interest or principal.

Resolved, That it is inexpedient for this Government thus to assume the aforesaid debts.

Mr. McDUFFIE said it was not his intention, when he submitted these resolutions, to utter a single sentence to enforce favorable action upon them; but, as he had a very few ideas to express on the subject, and the Senate being very thin, he would avail himself of a few moments of its time to express his views on the spirit of those resolutions. Had the Congress of the United States the power to execute the object to which the resolutions relate? That was the first and most important question; and, in regard to that question, he confessed he was surprised at the remarks which fell from the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CRITTENDEN,] on the other side of the Senate, on Saturday, when the practical interrogatory was as to the constitutional power of Congress to execute this measure. That Senator, after having disclaimed that there was any obligation on this Government to discharge the debts of the States, went on to say that there was no provision in the Constitution which prohibited an exercise, by Congress, of power over the matter, in some form or other. He (Mr. McD.) confessed that he was surprised to hear that remark, particularly as coming from the honorable Senator from Kentucky, who, he was sure, was brought up at the time when those admirable constitutional doctrines emanated from the State of Kentucky in 1800. He (Mr. McD.) was sure that the Congress of the United States was prohibited from exercising the power; and were they to be called upon to assume the exercise of that power, because it was not prohibited by the Constitution?

Mr. CRITTENDEN interrupted the Senator from South Carolina, and explained his former remarks to which he (Mr. McD.) had alluded. What he then meant was—as the whole tenor of his remarks would show—that he was unwilling to express an opinion at that time, as to the power of Congress to interfere in this matter. He did not intend to say that Congress could exercise any power, except such powers as were expressly granted, or which were implied as necessary to carry express grants of power into effect.

Mr. McDUFFIE resumed. He was glad to hear the explanation of the Senator. He entirely concurred with him in that view—as he presumed every Senator would—that they had all the powers expressly granted, and which were implied as necessary to carry out those in such grants.

He would now proceed to demonstrate (as he believed it would not be difficult to do) that there was not only no such power granted by the Constitution to the Congress of the United States, but that the exercise of such a power was as positively prohibited as human language could convey a prohibition. What was it that was proposed to be done? He besought gentlemen to realize a practical view of the matter. The stock which it was proposed to issue, it was true, was to be sustained in part by the income derived from the public lands. But he wished to remove from the minds of Senators all illusion upon this point. The whole resources of the Government would be necessarily charged with the enormous burden contemplated by the scheme of the issue of Government stock. What were the powers to be exercised? The whole money power of the Government—the power of borrowing, and the power of appropriating; the whole money power—a power involving all the other powers of the Government. This was the power to be brought into exercise. And he asked if there was not, in reference to the exercise of this power, a limitation as express as human language could make it? It was declared in the Constitution that Congress should have the power of raising money—for what purpose? To provide "for the common defence and general welfare" of the Union. The only purpose for which Congress could raise and appropriate money in any form, was to provide for the common defence and general welfare of the United States. Now, if the payment of State debts—the interference with, or assumption of State authority—could be considered as embraced within the terms "common defence and general welfare," he confessed that to him language had lost its power, and they might as well throw aside the Constitution at once. It seemed to him particularly clear that the powers which would be involved in the operation of this scheme were positively and expressly prohibited by the terms of the Constitution. Language could not make it plainer; and he would not, therefore, consume any more of the time of the Senate upon the question of constitutional power.

They were thus arrested at the very threshold; and all those who, with him, entertained the opinion which he had just expressed—that the exercise of such a power as this would be plainly unconstitutional—must maintain the ground that any attempt to impose upon the Government of the United States the exercise of such a power must be, now and hereafter, destitute of any effect. They could not pledge the faith of this Government for any such purpose.

But suppose that, by a strained construction, they could assume to themselves such a power as this: when they came to consider its practical result, it would seem so totally to reverse all the principles of the Government, and so far to derange the operations, the control, and the responsibility of the whole system, as to render it evidently unconstitutional, even independently of the express prohibition.

It was proposed to throw upon this Government the responsibility of collecting taxes for the States, and to relieve the State Governments from all responsibility in the matter. He begged Senators to consider this proposition; and, with that view, he would repeat, that it was proposed that this Government should perform the part of tax-gatherer for the several States—giving the State Governments the control over the fund, without any responsibility as to its collection. And, if they looked at the manner in which the debts of the States had been contracted, and at the means by which they had been carried on, under the most extraordinary delusion, in the prosecution of their works of internal improvement, he thought they would be admonished—and that, in strong language—of the impropriety of the proposed scheme of assumption. During the last few years, about two hundred millions of dollars of foreign capital had been brought into the country. Was there anything that could so totally derange all the monetary affairs of the Government as the introduction of this enormous amount of foreign capital? It was like a shower of gold poured out upon the States; the natural operation of which was to enhance the price of everything. And it might not be inappropriate to say here, that the importation of this immense amount of foreign capital had contributed as much as the extraordinary expansion of bank circulation, or any other cause whatever, to occasion those distresses under which the country was now laboring. During the period to which he had referred, a perfect delirium had been produced. Men acted precisely as if they had been under the influence of some stimulating draught. All responsibility in the disposal of the public money was destroyed. And it would be seen, by looking at the manner in which the public works of internal improvement were carried on, that all the agents connected with those works acted precisely as if they imagined the funds devoted to that purpose had rained down from heaven. There was universal excitement—universal delirium; and the consequence was, the works cost three, four, or five times as much as they could now be constructed for. What did this go to show? It showed that those to whom the appropriation of the money was confided, felt no sort of responsibility. And he would venture to assert, that, at this very moment, there was no prudent man in the United States, who had capital, who would take, as a gift, nine-tenths of the internal improvements made by foreign capital, if he were to be bound by the terms of the gift to keep up those works. They would not pay the expense. And he must be permitted to say that the practice of borrowing money by the State Governments (the most unfortunate of all schemes ever adopted by any Government) had been their utter and absolute ruin. And now, after the people had awakened from their delirium, looked about them, and surveyed the ruin which had been produced, was it desired that a new stimulus should be administered—that they should be encouraged to engage again in the same course of extravagance? Was it proper again to administer the same dose, and to produce again the same disasters? It was perfectly clear that the practical operation of the scheme would be to destroy the responsibility of those to whom would belong the appropriation of the public money. The State Governments were to expend the money, whilst they were to be freed from the responsibility of imposing taxes. Was it not plain that, if they were required to impose taxes upon the people, in order to raise the money, the people would hold a salutary check over them? There was no other way to hold them in check, but by making them directly responsible. But the effect of this system would be to destroy all responsibility.

Upon the question of expediency, he would ask what favor was it they were about to confer upon the States of this Union? The worthy Senator from Maryland had been pleased to speak of the paternal character of this Government, and the obligations incident to that character. The paternal character of the Government! This was not the first time, by many hundreds, that he had heard this language used. Whenever the Government were about to do any wrong—whenever they were about to violate the rights of any portion of the people—they always assumed this paternal character. It was a remark of Junius, (which was capable of specific application here,) that "whenever he saw a Scotchman smile, he involuntarily put his hand upon his pocket." When he (Mr. McD.) heard the paternal character of this Government spoken of, he was disposed to regard the proposition by which such a declaration was accompanied, with more than ordinary suspicion. He asked what was the practical character of the proposition? Did gentlemen mean to inculcate upon the people of the United States that this Government was endowed (as a sort of godlike power) with wealth?—a sort of inherent wealth, which it did not derive from the people—that this paternal Government was about to relieve the States by giving them money? Were they, like children, to be deluded with such an absurd picture as this? Give money to the people!

Why, all that this Government possessed, they derived from the people. They had not a single dollar that was not drawn from the pockets of the people; and yet this Government proposed to relieve the people by giving them money! Were the people of these United States supposed to worship this Government, as the Persians worship the sun? God forbid! Let them meet the question plainly and fairly. Every dollar that was given to the States, must first be taken from the people of the States; and for every dollar that they received in one form, they must pay at least a dollar and twenty-five cents in another form. This was the inevitable consequence—and it could not be avoided. He asked Senators if they were willing to give this money to the States, to be squandered by them, and thereby place themselves under the necessity of calling upon the people for supplies? The idea, therefore, of relieving the States by granting them money, was drawing a distinction between the Governments of the States and the people of those States; which was totally destitute of all practical foundation. To be sure, the idea of many, he knew, was, that the money to be appropriated to the States was to be collected in an indirect form—by a system of indirect taxation—relieving them from the burden of direct taxation; but the distinction was totally destitute of foundation. Did gentlemen suppose that, with a bankrupt treasury—while this Government was living, from day to day, upon the miserable shift of borrowing money, and after our commerce had been cut down so that it would not even sustain the ordinary expenses of the Government—it could, nevertheless, sustain the enormous expense of granting $200,000,000 to the States? In less than a single year, if this system were adopted, they would have to resort to direct taxation.

But there was another view of the subject which claimed their attention. The measure was proposed for the purpose of relieving the States of this Union; but, in order to do this, it would be necessary to do something more. Suppose stock to the amount of $200,000,000 be issued. What would be the portion to which the State of Pennsylvania would be entitled? It would not be sufficient to pay anything like one half the amount of the debt of that State. How would it be with Missouri? Missouri, he believed, owed no debt at all. She would be entitled, nevertheless, to her distributive share of $3,000,000, and South Carolina to $4,000,000. With a bankrupt treasury, and a heavy debt hanging over us, without the means of paying that debt, it was proposed to throw upon the world stock to the amount of $200,000,000, bearing an interest of but three per cent. What would the stock be worth? The State of Missouri had no debt at all. What would it be worth in the truly economical and exemplary State of North Carolina? What would Government stock, at three per cent., be worth in the markets of the world? You could not adopt a more effectual mode to degrade this Government, already bankrupt, than by issuing stock to the extent of $200,000,000—double the whole amount of the debt contracted during the last war with Great Britain! Why, it would be extravagant to suppose that, when the Government of the United States could not sell its six per cent. stock at par, although its credit was then much better than it now is,—it would be extravagant to suppose that this three per cent. stock would sell for more than fifty dollars in the hundred. It would not be worth more. So that, in order to accommodate the indebted States, all those not indebted would be forced to receive at par Government stock, not worth fifty dollars in the hundred; and yet they would have to pay their full proportion of the taxation consequent upon the issue of this stock. He believed it would be a common calamity to all the States. He had no idea—particularly after the recent expression of opinion on the part of the Senate—that foreigners would take this stock upon any condition whatever. The debts of the States, he solemnly believed, would, eventually, be strictly redeemed. An idea, no doubt, prevailed throughout the country that these debts were never to be paid—that the interest only was to be provided for; but it was a mistaken idea. These bonds—for which some of the States would not receive more than fifty dollars in the hundred—would have to be redeemed by our immediate posterity. Upon them would fall the whole burden of paying the $200,000,000, independently of the current expense of $6,000,000 per annum, by way of interest. Was there any sound policy in this? that our immediate descendants should be thus burdened with an enormous and overwhelming amount of taxation—transcending, as he said before, nearly two to one, the debt incurred by this Government during the late war with Great Britain? Nothing, in his opinion, could be more unwise, if they had even an unquestionable right to exercise the power. Nothing could be more unjust to many parts of the Union. Nothing could be more monstrously unjust to the unindebted States.

But, as he believed the Senate was now full, and prepared to vote, he had no disposition to press the argument further. He, however, felt it to be his solemn duty, before he sat down, to make a declaration, by which he was prepared to stand or fall; and he hoped that every Senator who entertained, with him, a desire that the creditors of the States—the holders of State stocks in Europe—might not be deceived, would be prepared to make a similar declaration. It was his solemn opinion that this Government had no power to issue stock for any such purpose as that indicated in the resolution. He solemnly believed that the paper which contained a promise to pay $200,000,000, on the faith of this Government, on behalf of the States, would not be worth the paper on which the resolution was written—constitutionally. He should not hold himself any more bound by it than he would to pay a forged note. And, if the stock should ever be issued—if there should ever be, accidentally, a party in power, in this country, by whom such stock would be issued,—he pledged himself to make war against it to the last extremity, whether in Congress or out of it. And, whether it might be called nullification, or repudiation, or by whatsoever name of odium his opponents might choose to designate his conduct, he would persevere in his resistance to what he conceived to be an unconstitutional exercise of power. And, in every form in which his vote could have effect or influence, he would resist the enforcement of any and all such claims upon the Government of the United States. He made this declaration to the world—holding, as he did, the faith of the Government constitutionally pledged to be sacred and inviolable; and if, in the face of this declaration, State stockholders in Europe should imagine that their debts would be better secured by obtaining the pledge of the faith of the General Government, they were at liberty to make the experiment.

Mr. WALKER wished to submit an amendment, for the purpose of embodying and placing on record upon the journal of the Senate the opinions which he had expressed on this subject when the former resolutions were under discussion. He not only wished them to be preserved in a more desirable form, but that the vote of Senators on them should be recorded—that it may be perfectly understood by all who now countenance, or shall hereafter countenance, the destructive and pernicious doctrine that such a monstrous proposition as that of the assumption of the debts of the States by the General Government could be permitted to stand unrepealed, should a temporary majority succeed in enacting it. He wished, not only to announce in time to the holders of State stocks, and all interested in them, those opinions on behalf of the Democracy; but to place them on record, together with the votes pledged to that repeal, that if such holders of stocks are deluded into any belief that this Government can have any power to assume their debts, and become responsible for them, they may be undeceived; and if they will not be undeceived, they may not have the opportunity of saying that they did not act with their eyes open to the consequences. He here pledged himself—and he was sure all of his friends who would vote for these resolutions would willingly pledge themselves—that whenever a temporary majority shall dare to violate the Constitution by enacting such a destructive law, he and his friends would untiringly and unceasingly wage war against such obnoxious law, until they should succeed in expunging it from the statute-book. He submitted his amendment.

[It was the same as, at a subsequent stage of the proceedings, became a substantive proposition, independent of Mr. McDUFFIE's resolutions, as stated in their proper place.]

Mr. McDUFFIE accepted the amendment as a modification of his resolutions.

On the resolutions, as modified, the yeas and nays were demanded.

Mr. MERRICK expressed his surprise at the tenacity with which the Senators on the other side held on to their purpose of extorting a vote on a subject not at all before the Senate. There was no proposition entertained by any one to assume the debts of the States.

Mr. WALKER asked if there were not numerous petitions and memorials on the subject submitted from time to time during the session.

Mr. MERRICK believed there were not any.

Mr. WALKER would beg leave to ask the chairman of the Committee on Finance if a large number of memorials on the subject had not been referred to that committee, and if these memorials were not now awaiting his report?

Mr. EVANS replied that he was not aware of one calling for the assumption of the debts of the States. There were many memorials before the committee asking for some improvement of the currency, and for an issue of Government stock to form a currency; but he did not know of any that called for the assumption of the State debts.

Mr. WALKER said they certainly called for the issue of Government stock to relieve the States from their indebtedness.

Mr. MERRICK continued: If the committee had made its report, there might be some apology for introducing the subject in a discussion of that report. But there was no proposition to justify the course now taken, after the Senate—by its solemn and deliberate determination, manifested on two occasions last week—decided that it would not entertain the subject this session; that it would not suffer the question to consume, in discussion, the time necessary to be devoted to the completion of the practical business of legislation.

Mr. M. then proceeded to state his sentiments in relation to the subject which the vote was demanded upon. He did not understand that any of the States required the General Government to assume their debts. He understood them as merely asking for a restoration of the trust which they had given to the Government for a specific purpose, long since accomplished. They now ask for the restoration of their property, that they may make use of it in whatever way they think best for the purpose of extricating them from their difficulties. Mr. M., at great length, proceeded to argue the whole question of the distribution of the proceeds of the public lands and restoration of the public domain to the use of the States, as the only form of assumption which, he conceived, was entertained by those who opposed these resolutions. He contended that the proceeds of the public lands, if the lands were properly in market, would bring five or six millions of dollars annually; which would enable the States to pay the interest of their debts.

Mr. WALKER interposed to say that the President of the United States had made every possible effort to bring such lands as were ready into market this very year; yet they would not yield one million of dollars.

Mr. MERRICK contended that, on the contrary, by the operation of the pre-emption laws, the lands were kept out of market.

Mr. LINN asked if there had not always been pre-emption laws, and was not the proportion of pre-emption rights as large formerly as now?

Mr. MERRICK still contended that the operation of these laws was to keep the lands out of market, and that they differed from old pre-emption rights, when lands were sold on a credit. Now, he maintained, where specie is required for lands, those holding under pre-emption rights have as legal a claim as if they had their patents, provided they paid their dollar and a quarter per acre when the lands came into market; but they managed, by petitions and applications to the Executive, to keep the lands out of market, whereby they obtained an unlimited credit. These pre-emptioners are, in most instances, voters; and he contended that it was a most dangerous influence, which might (he would not say that it did) be of most pernicious consequences.

After a very elaborate expression of his views on the various topics involved in the discussion, he concluded by offering the following amendments:

Resolved, That most wisely did the fathers of the Republic in establishing the Constitution of the United States, so frame that sacred instrument that it should be plain, easily understood, and intelligible to all upon whom it was to operate as a rule of action; and that it is not competent for any department of the Government established by it to enlarge or contract its true meaning, of which the citizens are, and of necessity must be, in the last resort, the exclusive judges.

Resolved, That it is no part of the assigned duty of the Senate of the United States to expound the Constitution to the people; and every such attempt is a departure from its appropriate sphere of action, and argues a distrust in the capacity of the people for self-government, unwarranted alike by our past history and the present enlightened state of the public mind.

Resolved, That whilst it is no part of the duty of the Senate of the United States to expound the Constitution for the people, it is its most solemn duty to exercise the power intrusted to it by that instrument, in the true spirit, and according to the nature of the trust, for the promotion of the happiness and welfare of the people.

Resolved, therefore, That the happiness of the people now requiring it, and full power over the subject being given to Congress, provision should be made, without further delay, for the fair and equal distribution, among all the States, of the proceeds of the public lands, in such manner as will best tend to remove or alleviate the evils of direct taxation under which the people of some of the States are now suffering, and which threaten soon inevitably to be visited upon other States.

Mr. ALLEN begged leave to ask the Senator from Maryland one question: it was, whether the sort of distribution of the proceeds of the public lands which he meant, did not involve the proposition to issue the stock of the General Government for those proceeds?

Mr. MERRICK said his proposition was to distribute to the States the proceeds of the public lands. He did not want gentlemen to make any other issue for him.

Mr. ALLEN asked if the Senator's proposition comprehended the issue of Government stock.

Mr. MERRICK said, no; he had nothing to do with the issue of stock.

Mr. McDUFFIE asked the Senator from Maryland to suspend his motion to amend, till he (Mr. McD.) made a correction as to the modification he had accepted.

Mr. MERRICK suspended his motion to amend.

Mr. McDUFFIE then withdrew his acceptance of the modification offered by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WALKER.]

Mr. WALKER withdrew his resolutions as an amendment.

Mr. MERRICK's motion to strike out and amend being then renewed,

Mr. ALLEN next addressed the Senate. He commenced by observing that nothing was more obvious than that there was a disposition to make the Federal Government responsible for the debts of the States. The word assumption was a definite mode of expression. It was a clear mode of avowing the object; and, therefore, the suspicion of the thing was to be avoided, by avoiding the term. The public lands—the measure of distributing their proceeds—was held up as a blind, behind which the principle of assumption was concealed. The income of the public lands was spread before the people as a fund which could be used to relieve them from difficulty; when it was taxation alone—the use of the taxing power of the Federal Government—which could be resorted to, in order to afford relief. The first step in the system of relief, he maintained, was oppression. The grievance under which the country now labored, was taxation to excess upon the people, in order to meet the outstanding debts now due by the States. In order to relieve the people, a system was proposed, the first act of which is to increase the very burdens of taxation under which the people now groan!

Let us (said Mr. A.) analyze this thing which bows down the heads, and hangs so heavily and so grievously upon the hearts of the people. What is it? Debt—debt. What are the items composing that debt? These are six in number, and I shall name them in their order:

First. The indebtedness of individuals to individuals.

Second. The indebtedness of private corporations.

Third. The indebtedness of chartered cities and towns.

Fourth. The indebtedness of counties.

Fifth. The indebtedness of the States.

Sixth. The indebtedness of the Federal Government itself.

These, sir, are the six elements which enter into and make up the sum of indebtedness under which the people now suffer. Congress has taken the matter in its own hands, as regards the first class of debts, by means of the bankrupt law. Not daring to put its hands into the pockets of the people, and absolutely take away their money, it passed the bankrupt law, which, by one great stroke, repudiated the great body of the first description of debts—those between man and man. It is now proposed that Congress shall take charge of the remaining five items. The same reason which is urged in favor of assuming the State debts, is still better for the assumption of city and county debts. These city and county debts were all contracted under express authority given by express acts of the States—all of them authorized by special acts of the State Legislatures. They were nearly all contracted for public benefit—to build public edifices, construct roads, and pave the streets of towns. How would assumption work? The State debts would be assumed first, and the States would then become free from debt. But what would become of the county debts? Would the assumption of State debts relieve them?

He knew how it was in Ohio, and he presumed it was so in other States: nearly every town and county had its debt. Let us see how the system would work. Would an assumption of State debts relieve the cities? Certainly not. What, then, would be the next proposition? The counties would be applied to, to assume the debts of the cities. What would the people of a county say, if application was made to their commissioners to assume the debts of the city within the borders of the county? He would put it to the people of his own county of Ross, in the State of Ohio, to say whether they would be willing to assume the debt of the city of Chillicothe? That county, like many others, was in debt. He spoke of his own State, in illustrating the positions he had maintained, because he was more familiar with its localities, and the facts connected with them. He would ask the people of that great State what they would think if they were called on to pay the debts of the counties?

But to proceed with his argument. What would be the first proposition after the assumption of the State debts? The position of the States would be that of freedom from debt, whilst the cities and counties still remained involved. The States would, of course, be called on to assume the city and county debts. And why? Because, the States having assumed these debts, it would be easy to roll them all off on the yielding back of the General Government. The sponging and repudiation of debts would become common, and obligations between man and man no longer be held sacred. The other five items of debt to which he referred would be concentrated in one vast pile, and packed on the treasury of the Union.

But, he continued, what would the people gain by these operations? Their situation would be the same as that of two Yankees who shut themselves up in a room to trade coats: after trading all day with each other, they both contended that they had made $25 apiece. What would the people gain? Simply a change of the form of taxation. They would merely be giving the General Government the power to put its hands into their pockets. Would the scheme diminish their debts? What was the Federal Government?—anything else than the mere breath of the States and the people which created it? What, he repeated, was this Government, but the visible existence of the people in the States? Now, at this very moment, it is begging alms at the doors of the people, and crying aloud, "Feed me, or I'll die!" What next? This same Federal Government, the moment afterwards, tells the people of the States, "I will relieve you of your debts." How? By going to their corn cribs, and taking a part of their crops and their labors, to pay their debts with it!

The Senator from Maryland [Mr. MERRICK] had alluded to what he said on a former occasion in relation to the ownership of the State stocks. What he had maintained was, that debt was burdensome to a country, according as its interest had to be paid at home or transmitted abroad. The foreign debts of the States fell little short of $200,000,000; and, including the corporation debts, the whole foreign debt of this country amounted to 220 or $230,000,000. The heavy pressure in this country was caused by the fact that the interest on this immense debt had to be sent abroad—paid as a tribute to foreign nations, without anything in return; and, therefore, equivalent to a destruction of so much property, and a subtraction of so much from the resources of the country. The State stocks were now valued at an average rate of about 50 cents in the dollar. Should the General Government, therefore, assume the State debts, and thereby advance their stock to par, the British capitalists would clear $100,000,000 by the operation. It was in reference to this that he alluded to the fact that the stock was held by British bankers, and its assumption would result in their benefit. He invoked Senators not to hold out to those bankers the delusion that this Government would ever assume and become responsible for the debts of the States. He did so for the reason that he did not wish to see $200,000,000 brought in to tamper with our elections. Not that he supposed gentlemen here, in the Senate, desired any such thing; but because he knew that, in case any inducement was held out to avarice, and especially to English avarice, we should be prompting the holders of the State stocks to meddle with our elections—thus setting an example which would be dangerous, and which would bring about the same result here, as it ever had done in past republics. Other free States had been broken down by the in-coming of foreign influence; and he wanted no Macedonian Philip to pollute our soil. There was not an instance of a past republic—except Rome, which fell by its own weight, when its centre became too weak—that had not been destroyed by one of the parties existing within it, calling on foreigners to aid them. He defied any man to point out another instance of a republic which was not overthrown by the introduction of foreign influence. He thought it was the duty of Senators to stand up and resist the idea that we were ever to become responsible to foreign capitalists for the debts of the States. If there should be any hope left for these foreigners to lean upon, he doubted not but that they would interfere, where such a profit was to be made. What would be the expenditure of $25,000,000 to them, in influencing our elections, if they could thereby make $100,000,000. The British made war upon the oldest Government in existence about the destruction of a ship-load of opium. Did any one suppose they would stand back when $200,000,000 were at stake? All the negotiations of England were nothing more than counting-house speculations. As had been remarked, her traffic was in empires. Money was the life of her system; for she could not do without it. The introduction of English money would be followed by the introduction of English power. That power she would always introduce wherever her intrigue or her powder could accomplish it.

He might go on and show that the English Government had a direct interest in exciting this question of assumption. He could show the connexion of that question with other questions which had been settled, and some which ought to have been settled, between this country and England. But he knew that it was late in the session, and he only threw out these suggestions in relation to the extent of the city and county debts, in order that, in considering the proposition of assumption, the people might look upon the darkness of the chasm which was before them.

Mr. WALKER said he desired to put the country right upon one question, and that was—who brought this matter to the consideration of the Senate? Mr. W. then read one of the petitions presented to the Senate, requesting Congress to issue a federal stock of two hundred millions of dollars, and distribute it among the States, to bear an interest of three per cent.; the petitioners stating that the indebted States could exchange this three per cent. for their own stocks, bearing six per cent. interest. No one, then, (said Mr. W.,) could now deny that the question of assumption was before us, brought here by petitioners requesting that assumption, and to which we were bound to make a response in the affirmative or negative; and to refuse to do so, is to shrink from the responsibility of the great occasion, and encourage, by our silence, the advocates of assumption to persevere until their objects were accomplished. Under these circumstances, (Mr. W. said,) it was our duty to announce our opinions upon these petitions; and if we had no power to make the assumption, we were bound to make the declaration, and dispel all delusive hopes on this subject.

Mr. W. said he thought it our duty to go farther, and announce to the British and other holders of these bonds, that Congress had no power to assume their payment; that any such law—this being a Government of powers limited by the Constitution—would be a palpable violation of that instrument, and, therefore, utterly null and void; and that it would be the solemn duty of every friend of the Constitution to restore its supremacy by the total repeal of the obnoxious statute. Let us act fairly, announce these opinions in advance; and inform these foreign bondholders that assumption would be a blow most fatal to their interests; that no such power exists under the Constitution, and Congress can interpolate no such authority.

And, sir, what would be the effect, if this Government could and would assume this debt?—a debt of two hundred millions, an annual interest of six millions, and at least four millions more as a sinking fund, if we ever intend to pay the principal. A burden of ten millions per annum was to be imposed on this Government, that already has a debt of twenty-eight millions, now threatening a rapid augmentation. This, then, is a proposition to bankrupt, and, by bankrupting, to destroy this Government; it is a proposition to despoil it of the means of defence—to deprive it of the sinews of war—by taking away its revenues as a pledge to foreign stockholders. How can we defend the country if, with a heavy debt now, and a revenue already inadequate, we are to apply six or ten millions per annum in payment of State debts? It is a proposition to abandon the Constitution, and subvert the Government; it is a proposition to dismantle our forts, to spike our cannon, to disband our army, and to sink our navy, to recall our fleets, and strike down that flag which they now bear in triumph upon every sea. Yes, sir; this is a proposition to overthrow the Constitution, and strike down from its ramparts the flag of the Union; and, whilst that flag was still floating in our view, let us announce to assumptionists at home and abroad, that this flag shall be defended to the last extremity; and that, if the friends of assumption should strike down that flag, we will never abandon the contest until it shall be recaptured, and placed again in triumph upon the ramparts of the Constitution.

Mr. TALLMADGE moved to lay the whole subject on the table.

Mr. WALKER demanded the yeas and nays on that motion, which were ordered.

Mr. BERRIEN said he was about to rise to make the same motion, with the view to enable him to submit the motion which he gave notice on Friday last of his intention to submit this day—to proceed to the consideration of the bankrupt bill.

Mr. WOODBURY suggested whether it would not be agreeable to the Senator from Georgia to postpone his purpose till to-morrow.

Mr. BERRIEN desired to say that either course would be perfectly acceptable to him. All that he desired was to submit the motion of which he had given notice.

Mr. ARCHER suggested the propriety of postponing the consideration of the bankrupt bill till to-morrow, with a view of disposing of the question now before the Senate.

Mr. HUNTINGTON hoped the Senator from New York would persist in his motion. Upon the course of proceeding on this subject, they had a practical commentary on the suggestion the other day to permit this question to be taken without debate. They had already consumed the best part of three days in this discussion. He then avowed his astonishment at the remarks of the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. McDUFFIE]—expressing the opinion that there was no legal obligation, on the part of this Government, to carry out an act of Congress plighting its faith to any object, passed by a temporary majority, which a succeeding Congress, in its opinion, might think unconstitutional.

Mr. TALLMADGE said he would not make any remarks in reply to the suggestion thrown out as to a postponement, because he submitted the motion to lay on the table, for the purpose of concluding the debate, and putting an end to the whole question for the session.

The question was then taken on the motion to lay on the table, and decided in the affirmative—yeas 24, nays 23, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Barrow, Bates, Bayard, Berrien, Choate, Clayton, Conrad, Crafts, Crittenden, Dayton, Evans, Graham, Henderson, Huntington, Mangum, Merrick, Miller, Morehead, Phelps, Smith of Indiana, Sprague, Tallmadge, White, and Woodbridge—24.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Archer, Bagby, Benton, Buchanan, Calhoun, Cuthbert, Fulton, King, Linn, McDuffie, McRoberts, Rives, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Sturgeon, Tappan, Walker, Wilcox, Williams, Woodbury, Wright, and Young—23.

Mr. WALKER then submitted the following resolutions, with the view that they be printed, and laid on the table till to-morrow, viz:

Resolved, That the assumption of the debts of the States, contracted by them separately, and for local purposes, would be a palpable violation of the Constitution of the United States, a consolidation of all power in the Federal Government, and a final and total overthrow of the safety of the States.

Resolved, That Congress having no power to assume such debts, any act attempting such assumption would be utterly null and void; that it would not be obligatory upon the States, nor could the people of the States be lawfully required by Congress to pay the debt so assumed; nor could any taxes imposed by them for such purposes be collected; and it would be the duty of a succeeding Congress to restore the supremacy of the Constitution, by the entire repeal of the act of assumption.

Mr. CRITTENDEN was understood to make a question of order whether the resolutions could be then received.

The CHAIR remarked that it was in order to receive them, but they would have to lay on the table till to-morrow.

Mr. TALLMADGE inquired whether it was then competent to submit a resolution to lay the resolutions on the table at that time.

The CHAIR replied that the resolutions were already on the table till to-morrow.

Mr. LINN then called for the unfinished business of Saturday; being the bill to indemnify Major General Andrew Jackson the fine imposed on him for conduct in the discharge of his official duty.

THE ARMY BILL.

Mr. EVANS, before proceeding to that business, hoped the Senate would take up the army bill, which had been returned, with an amendment, disagreeing to the amendment of the Senate, allowing the Secretary of War to appoint ten cadets from the country at large, one of them to be from the District of Columbia.

Mr. LINN said he would withdraw his motion for that purpose, and no other.

Mr. BERRIEN desired merely to say that, to redeem his pledge to the Senate in relation to the bankrupt bill, he would resist the motion of the Senator from Missouri; because it was the general understanding that the bill to repeal the law would be taken up to-day.

The motion to take up the army bill was then agreed to.

Mr. EVANS remarked that the amendment to which the House had disagreed, relative to the appointment of 10 cadets of the country at large, had, after a short discussion, met with the unanimous concurrence of the Senate. The probability was, that the matter could be arranged by a committee of conference; he therefore hoped that the Senate would insist on its amendment, with the view of having a committee of conference.

Mr. SEVIER said, if he understood the matter, that now there was more than a full number of cadets there.

Mr. EVANS remarked that the corps was not full; and he believed that there were no more there than this bill would admit of.

Mr. GRAHAM said he would much prefer that the Senate should recede. It was a very small matter for which to jeopard the bill. He made the motion to recede from the amendment of the Senate. The question was first put on the motion to insist, and negatived—yeas 19, nays 20. The motion to recede was then agreed to.

The joint resolution of the Senate for the distribution of certain copies of the census returns, and the Compendium of the Sixth Census, which had been returned from the House with an amendment, was taken up; and

Mr. TAPPAN moved that the Senate concur in the amendment.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE explained that the amendment of the House had been made in consequence of some information received from the State Department since the passage of the resolution by the Senate.

Mr. KING remarked that this resolution authorized the distribution of those books to all such as received congressional documents. Members of Congress were entitled to receive congressional documents. He inquired whether, that being the case, members of Congress were not, by the terms of the resolution, entitled to receive copies of the work. They were now burdened with more copies than were necessary.

Mr. MOREHEAD replied that such was not the intention of the resolution, nor did he think the language of the resolution justified such an interpretation.

The amendment of the House was then concurred in.

The bill granting a pension to William McPherson was read the third time and passed.

Several bills of the House were then read twice, and referred to appropriate committees.

Mr. GRAHAM said, since the recession of the Senate from the amendment relative to the ten cadets to be appointed from the country at large, he had been impressed with the belief that it was a matter of more importance than he first conceived it to be. He, therefore, moved to reconsider the vote by which the Senate receded.

Mr. ARCHER then made some remarks. He said that the bill reduced the whole number of cadets to the reduced number of the congressional districts in the United States under the new apportionment. In the propriety of that, he concurred entirely. The number had been reduced from 260 to 226. He did not think that the ten which the power was proposed to be given to the Secretary of War to appoint from the country generally, was too great a number to enable that officer occasionally to appoint the meritorious orphan sons of military and naval heroes.

Mr. SEVIER did not think it was worth while to reconsider the vote, as the provision would last but one year.

Mr. EVANS replied that the Senator was mistaken; the provision would last until it was repealed. It would take a new law to repeal it.

The question was then put on the motion to reconsider, and carried in the affirmative; and

The question recurring on the motion that the Senate do insist on its amendment, it was put and carried in the affirmative—ayes 23, noes not counted.

On motion by Mr. EVANS, a committee of conference on the bill was appointed by the Chair.

Mr. LINN moved to proceed to the consideration of the unfinished business; being the bill for indemnifying General Jackson.

Mr. BERRIEN conceived this day had been set apart for entertaining his motion to proceed with the consideration of the bill concerning the bankrupt law.

Mr. LINN thought two hours would suffice to dispose of the bill to indemnify General Jackson. He thought it would be best to finish one business first.

Mr. BERRIEN wished to make good his promise of calling for the consideration of the bankrupt question. He therefore did so; and hoped the Senate would consent to take up that subject. He therefore made his promised motion to that effect.

Mr. LINN called for the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

The question was then taken on Mr. BERRIEN's motion to postpone all previous orders, and take up the bill for the repeal of the bankrupt act, with the amendments reported by the Committee on the Judiciary; and resulted in the negative—yeas 20, nays 22, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Archer, Barrow, Bayard, Berrien, Clayton, Crafts, Crittenden, Dayton, Graham, Huntington, Merrick, Miller, Morehead, Phelps, Smith of Indiana, Sprague, White, Wilcox, Williams, and Young—20.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Bagby, Bates, Benton, Calhoun, Choate, Conrad, Cuthbert, Evans, Fulton, Henderson, King, Linn, Rives, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Sturgeon, Tallmadge, Tappan, Walker, Woodbridge, and Woodbury—22.

GENERAL JACKSON'S FINE.

Mr. LINN's motion to proceed with the unfinished business then brought up his bill to indemnify Major General Andrew Jackson for damage sustained in the discharge of his official duty.

It was placed under consideration as in committee of the whole; the question pending being on the amendment proposed by the Committee on the Judiciary, to strike out the original bill and insert:

That, in consideration of the distinguished military services of Major General Andrew Jackson in the defence of the city of New Orleans, and of the desire expressed by sundry citizens and Legislatures of this Union, in divers petitions and legislative resolutions submitted to the Congress of the United States, the fine of one thousand dollars imposed upon Major General Andrew Jackson by the honorable Dominic A. Hall, be, and the same is hereby, restored; and that the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to pay to Major General Andrew Jackson the said sum of one thousand dollars, with interest at six per cent. thereon, from the day of its payment by him, out of any moneys in the treasury not otherwise appropriated.

The Judiciary Committee also proposed to change the title of the bill to that of "A bill for the relief of Major General Andrew Jackson."

Mr. SMITH of Connecticut, being entitled to the floor, proceeded at considerable length, and with great force of argument, to show that General Jackson's necessity for declaring martial law at New Orleans was an imperative duty, which formed a law in itself, the obligation of which had a priority in the natural rights of self-defence, paramount to all written laws and constitutions. He argued that this natural law of self-defence belonged to a community as well as to an individual; and that General Jackson, the admitted military commander for the defence of the country, was the organ of the community, bound to carry out the self-defence of the country according to the same natural rights which belonged to an individual.

The invasion of a foreign nation, and the presence of foreign troops, constituted the antagonist principle of aggression, which made it his duty to resort to every weapon of self-defence in his power. It was the territory, property, and liberties of the people, the creators of the Constitution and the laws, which were at stake and in peril; and his duty to preserve and defend them was necessarily due to the first cause, from which only they emanated. In preserving the territory, property, and liberty of the community, he best preserved the Constitution and laws, although for the moment necessarily compelled to suspend their operations. That he had done his duty nobly and well, was evinced by the universal approbation of a grateful people. To restore him, then, this fine, so unjustly imposed, was but a simple act of justice. These positions Mr. S. maintained with great ability, and concluded by exhorting the Senate to pass the original bill, without appending to it any qualification.

Mr. DAYTON moved an adjournment.

Mr. LINN hoped not. He merely wished to advance the bill this evening. Senators who wished to speak would have full opportunity on the third reading. If, however, the Senator pressed his motion to adjourn, he should call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and taken; and the Senate refused to adjourn—yeas 17, nays 26.

The question then came up on the amendment of the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BERRIEN explained the reasons which had induced the committee to propose the amendments they had recommended. Their principal object was to admit of a unanimous vote, by such a modification of phraseology as would carefully avoid expressing or imputing any reflection upon either the General or the Judge. He contended that the inferences drawn by the friends of General Jackson, from the wording of these amendments, were not justified by their meaning. That, in the first place, the true meaning of the proposed change in the title, "for the relief of Major General Andrew Jackson," was to relieve him, not by a gratuity, but from the effects of a judgment of the court pronounced against him; which judgment he and his friends view as a grievance. And, in the substitute for the bill offered, the motives stated for restoring the money were three—not as a remuneration for his military services, but in consideration of three things—his services, the popular wish, and the express desire of several of the State Legislatures. These were honorable motives, and should be viewed as such. Having made his explanations at large, he left the matter in the hands of the Senate.

Mr. LINN replied, and showed that, in framing the title of the original bill, he had merely followed the precedents which be found in the titles of other bills for the relief of officers under similar circumstances. He referred to, and quoted, the petition of Lieutenant Wells, and the report of the Committee of the House on his case; also, to the case of Lieut Stopton. He then adverted to the condition of things at New Orleans, where the occurrence took place, which led to this collision between General Jackson and Judge Hall; and asked which was responsible for the safety and preservation of the country. The Judge had fled his post of duty at the critical moment when it called for his presence and support against a foreign enemy, and did not return to it till the critical moment when his interference was calculated to do most mischief. The moment was too critical for the responsibility to be thrown off by the commanding general, while an enemy was yet at hand, threatening conquest, plunder, and devastation. But he (Mr. L.) did not mean to prolong the discussion; he merely wished the bill to be advanced to a third reading this evening, and hoped the amendments of the Judiciary Committee would be rejected.

Mr. ARCHER thought, as the Senator had expressed a desire to avoid any expression of opinion against the Judge, he could have no objection to the amendments.

Mr. LINN had very serious objections to them. As to the title, neither General Jackson nor his friends demanded any "relief" for him. What they wanted was the same measure of justice extended to other officers. And as to the amendment to the body of the bill, he could not consent to the repayment being placed on the grounds of General Jankson's services in any shape or form.

Mr. ARCHER explained why he did not regard the matter in the same light with the Senator.

Mr. HENDERSON preferred the original bill to the amendment. A very slight modification of one or two expressions would satisfy him with the original bill, and induce him to give it his support. One was, to modify the title so as to make it a bill to "reimburse" Major General Andrew Jackson, &c.; and another modification in one or two words in the body of the bill.

Mr. DAYTON expressed his desire to say a few words on the subject; and to afford an opportunity for that purpose, moved an adjournment.

The yeas and nays were called for and ordered, and the Senate refused to adjourn—yeas 19, nays 25.

The yeas and nays on the committee's amendments were then called for, and ordered.

Mr. CONRAD addressed the Senate with the view of explaining, first, that his opinions had undergone no change since last summer; on the contrary, they had been strengthened by subsequent investigation into the facts and circumstances. Another point of explanation was in reference to General Jackson's letter to the Editor of the Globe, in which he (Mr. C.) had been placed in the position of misrepresenting a fact, that Louallier had been tried by court-martial for a libel. He had since cleared up these points, by calling for a copy of the record of the court-martial, in which it appeared that one of the charges before the court-martial against Louallier was that of writing and publishing a libel to incite sedition and mutiny. He did not make this statement as a charge against General Jackson, but to show that, at his age, he could not rely on his memory. There had, in his opinion, been no inconsiderable advantage gained by the discussion of this subject. The authentic records both of the proceedings of the court and of the court-martial had been placed in the archives of Congress, and would remain to do justice to all parties concerned in them.

Mr. BUCHANAN had very few words to say. It was with great reluctance he had twice voted against an adjournment, while the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. DAYTON] desired to address the Senate upon this question. He should not have done so, but for his perfect knowledge, that no matter how the question might be decided to-night, that gentleman would have precisely the same opportunity to-morrow; and everything he had to say would be as relevant then as to-day. His desire was, after having spent so much time upon this bill—looking at the list of orders, and considering that there were but ten days yet to elapse, to allow the bill to advance one stage, at least, before they adjourned. Suppose the amendment of the Judiciary Committee be adopted: the friends of the bill would then oppose its passage? Suppose it were negatived: the question would come up on the third reading of the bill, and gentlemen would then have an opportunity of addressing the Senate? He had no disposition to curtail debate; far from it. He voted as he did, only because he knew it would not deprive the gentleman from New Jersey of any privilege. He had not taken up much time in debating this session; and he felt himself constrained to say that every moment ought now to be devoted to finish the business upon the calendar. He hoped, therefore, the vote would now be taken.

Mr. DAYTON said his desire was to address the Senate on the subject of the amendments; but if the vote could be taken now, he would waive his claim to the floor.

Mr. GRAHAM said he was always willing to vote for the indemnity in such form as would leave untouched the question of fact whether it was a matter of duty with General Jackson to declare martial law. He, therefore, in accordance with that wish, proposed to amend the original text of the bill. He proposed to adopt it, with a slight modification. He would not do anything to impeach the character of General Jackson, and, at the same time, nothing that would cast an imputation on Judge Hall for his conduct on the occasion alluded to. He proposed (to avoid censure or imputation to either party) to strike from the original bill the words "for official acts in that capacity," and to insert the words "an alleged contempt of court;" so as to make it a bill to indemnify the fine of $1,000, for an alleged contempt of court. He proposed also, at the proper time, to amend the title so as to make it read, "A bill to indemnify Major General Andrew Jackson;" which, it appeared to him, must be acceptable to all sides of the Senate. He then submitted the amendment to strike out the words "official acts in that capacity" from the original bill, and insert the words "an alleged contempt of court." If the amendment prevailed, he would vote against striking out, as proposed by the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. ARCHER inquired whether he understood the Chair to give the decision that the first question did not arise on the amendments proposed by the Judiciary Committee?

The CHAIR replied that it was competent to make the original bill, proposed to be stricken out, as perfect as possible before the question was taken on the motion to strike out.

Mr. CONRAD was under the impression that when a report was made from a committee, proposing to amend a bill, the usage of the Senate had been to first take the question on the amendments of the committee.

The CHAIR said the Senator was mistaken as to the usages of the body, and explained how it was competent to amend the original bill; but if there was any doubt on the subject, he would like to have the opinion of the Senate.

Mr. ARCHER said he would like to have the opinion of the older members of that body as to the usages of the Senate.

Mr. KING said there was no necessity for taking the sense of the Senate upon the matter. If the report of the committee was in favor of striking out the whole bill, and to insert, it was competent for the Senate to amend and perfect both the part proposed to be stricken out, and that which was proposed to be inserted. Such was not only the usage of the Senate, but such was the parliamentary law upon the subject.

The question was then taken on the amendment of Mr. GRAHAM, and agreed to.

Mr. GRAHAM then said that when the question came up on the title, he would move to amend it by inserting the words he had indicated for the words of the original title—that was, to insert the words "A bill to indemnify Major General Andrew Jackson."

The question then recurred on the amendment of the committee—being the substitute (as inserted above) for the original bill; which question was taken by yeas and nays, and decided in the negative—yeas 16, nays 27, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Archer, Barrow, Bates, Berrien, Clayton, Conrad, Crafts, Crittenden, Dayton, Evans, Huntington, Merrick, Miller, Morehead, Phelps, and Smith of Indiana—16.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Bagby, Bayard, Benton, Buchanan, Calhoun, Choate, Cuthbert, Fulton, Graham, Henderson, King, Linn, McDuffie, McRoberts, Mangum, Rives, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Sturgeon, Tappan, Walker, Wilcox, Williams, Woodbury, Wright, and Young—27.

Mr. ARCHER moved to strike out the original bill, and to substitute in its stead the bill which was voted down in the Senate at the last session, as follows: "That there be remitted and refunded to General Andrew Jackson, out of any money in the treasury not otherwise appropriated, the amount of a fine and costs imposed upon him by the district court of the United States for the district of Louisiana, for an alleged contempt of court, with interest at the rate of six per centum per annum; provided always that this act shall not be construed as an expression of the opinion of Congress upon any judicial proceeding or legal question growing out of the declaration of martial law by General Jackson during the defence of New Orleans."

Mr. LINN demanded the yeas and nays on the amendment proposed; which were ordered.

Mr. BAYARD said he would vote now against the amendment, as he intended to vote against a bill in any form for the restoration of the fine.

The question was then taken, and decided in the negative—yeas 17, nays 26, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Archer, Barrow, Bates, Berrien, Choate, Clayton, Conrad, Crafts, Crittenden, Dayton, Evans, Huntington, Merrick, Miller, Morehead, Phelps, and Smith of Indiana—17.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Bagby, Bayard, Benton, Buchanan, Calhoun, Cuthbert, Fulton, Graham, Henderson, King, Linn, McDuffie, McRoberts, Mangum, Rives, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Sturgeon, Tappan, Walker, Wilcox, Williams, Woodbury, Wright, and Young—26.

The bill was then reported back to the Senate, and the amendments of the committee of the whole were concurred in; and the question now being, Shall the bill be engrossed for a third reading?

Mr. LINN demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. BAYARD now wished to set himself right as to the vote he should give. Last session, when he proposed the substitute which was adopted for the original bill, he did so from a conciliatory and kind motive. He wished the fine to be restored, but he also wished, in doing it, to avoid any imputation on the Judge; and, to effect this, he had so shaped his amendment as to leave that point untouched. Some time after, a letter was published from General Jackson, in which this kind and conciliatory motive was spoken of in anything but a reciprocal spirit.

He (Mr. B.) could not, therefore, vote for a renewal of that attempt, because it would be still viewed in the same light by General Jackson; and he had no wish to press anything not acceptable to him. But, as he could not have the bill modified so as to be approved by his judgment, he certainly could not vote for it in a shape in which he conceived it did not fully and justly present the case.

He was therefore constrained to vote in the negative on all the propositions.

Mr. ARCHER suggested to the Senator from Missouri [Mr. LINN] to withdraw the call for the yeas and nays, and let the vote on the subject of the bill be taken without. He thought it would answer the purpose of that Senator as well to have the yeas and nays taken on the passage of the bill.

Mr. LINN yielded to the suggestion; and the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading in the following form:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the proper accounting officers of the Treasury Department be, and they are hereby, directed to ascertain the amount of the penalty or damages awarded by the district judge of the United States at New Orleans, in the year eighteen hundred and fifteen, against Major General Andrew Jackson, then commander-in-chief of that district, for an alleged contempt of court, and paid by him at that time; and that the sum so paid, with interest at six per cent. per annum, be paid to Major General Andrew Jackson, out of any moneys in the treasury not otherwise appropriated.

On motion by Mr. BERRIEN,
The Senate then adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, February 20, 1843.

Mr. DODGE of Iowa presented a joint resolution of the Legislative Assembly of Iowa Territory, praying for the establishment of a mail route from Keokuck to the town of Farmington, in Van Buren county; and one from Keokuck, via Winchester, in Van Buren county, to Fairfield, in Jefferson county.

Also, to have the mail carried by water in steamboats) from the city of St. Louis to Keokuck during the navigable seasons of the year.

Also, two petitions praying for the establishment of a mail route from Fairfield, via Glasgow, to Mount Pleasant.

Also, a joint resolution from the Legislative Assembly of Iowa, praying for an appropriation to defray the expenses of holding treaties with the Pottawatomies, Ottawas, and other Indians, for the extinguishment of their title to lands in Iowa Territory.

Mr. HUBARD offered the petition of Mary Crafton for a pension under the act of July 7, 1838. Also, the petition of Mary Gafford for a pension under the same act; both of which, under the late rule of the House of Representatives, were appropriately referred.

Mr. GUSTINE submitted the following resolution; which was considered and adopted:

Resolved, That the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions be instructed to inquire into the expediency of placing James Hots on the pension roll, and that the accompanying papers be referred to said committee.

Mr. GUSTINE presented the following resolutions of the Legislature of the State of Pennsylvania:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, That our Senators and Representatives in Congress be requested to use their exertions to revive, at their present session, the law passed by Congress in eighteen hundred and thirty-eight, granting a pension, for five years, to the widows of officers and soldiers of the revolutionary war.

Resolved, That the Governor be requested to forward to each House of Congress a copy of the above resolution as soon as convenient after the passage thereof.

Mr. GUSTINE said: Mr. Speaker, if there is one legislative proposition more than another that would induce me to break the silence which I have hitherto observed within this hall, it would be to ask the members of this House to accede to the measure proposed by the resolution sent to your desk. It is a measure, Mr. Speaker, which the feelings of honor, philanthropy, patriotism, humanity, and all the better feelings that inherit the human breast, call upon us, as the guardians of the nation's honor, to adopt.

While we are daily appropriating millions to propagate and foster the arts and sciences, to increase the wealth, add to the powers, and extend the fame of the mightest Republic on earth, shall we withhold and refuse to appropriate a few thousand dollars to give a mere sustenance to the aged and feeble widows of those great men who erected the mighty fabric of our independence—whose labor compassed the liberties we this day enjoy—whose blood purchased the privileges we are this moment exercising? It cannot be, that the descendants of such men can remain indifferent to the tears and tremulous tones of the enfeebled widows of these worthies of the Revolution. This will, unquestionably, be the last opportunity ever presented to many of us to participate in thus bringing relief to objects the worthiest that the world ever presented to the consideration of a legislative body. Let us not separate without adopting measures necessary to carry out the object of the resolution offered.

Mr. MATHIOT suggested that the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions had reported a bill on the same subject; and he should be glad if the House would assign some particular day for its consideration.

[Cries of "Move to take up the bill now," from several.]

Mr. M. then moved that the Committee of the Whole be discharged from the further consideration of the bill granting pensions to certain widows of revolutionary soldiers; and the motion having been agreed to, the bill was read in the House. The question being on its engrossment,

Mr. MERIWETHER objected to taking the question now.

Mr. MATHIOT moved the suspension of the rules, which was carried; and then—under the operation of the previous question—the bill, after being ordered to be engrossed, was read the third time, and passed.

GENERAL JACKSON'S FINE.

Mr. GWIN moved that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole; and gave notice that, if the motion prevailed, he would then move to take up the bill to refund the fine imposed on General Jackson. Mr. G. also called for the yeas and nays on his motion.

Mr. ADAMS inquired of the Speaker if this was not the regular day for the presentation of petitions? He had one that he wished to offer.

The SPEAKER said that this was petition day; but the motion of the gentleman from Mississippi was in the nature of a suspension of the rules; and, if it prevailed, would override the regular orders.

The question was then taken on Mr. GWIN's motion, and decided in the affirmative—yeas 114, nays 71.

Mr. J. IRVIN, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported a bill which was signed by the Speaker.

Mr. ADAMS then rose and asked the consent of the House, before going into Committee of the Whole, to allow him to present a petition from 51,863 citizens of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts.

Mr. C. J. INGERSOLL. I object.

Several other gentlemen objected also.

Mr. ALLEN rose and inquired if it did not require a vote of two-thirds to go into Committee of the Whole, such a motion being in the nature of one for the suspension of the rules. [Loud cries of "Oh, that's been long settled."]

The SPEAKER replied that a suspension of the rules for any other purpose required a vote of two-thirds; but a motion to go into Committee of the Whole was an exception to that rule, as settled by the practice of the House.

Mr. ADAMS asked if it would be in order to move a suspension of the rules; his object being understood to be to get an opportunity to present the petition to which he had before alluded.

The SPEAKER replied that such a motion was not in order, inasmuch as the rules stood suspended by a vote of the House.

Mr. ADAMS. Well, I hope I shall have an opportunity to present the petition in the course of the day—(loud cries of "Order, order," from Mr. WISE and others)—for I do not wish the petition to remain here as a monument (—"of infamy," some gentleman remarked.)

The petition to which the honorable gentleman referred, was placed on his desk, on a large wooden framework, and presented the appearance of a gigantic reel, or a juvenile water-wheel; and it bore the following inscription: "Great petition to Congress."

The following is a copy:

"To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America:

The undersigned citizens of the State of Massachusetts, earnestly desiring to free the Commonwealth and themselves from all connexion with domestic slavery, and to secure the citizens of the State from the danger of enslavement, respectfully pray your honorable body to pass such laws, and to propose such amendments to the Constitution of the United States as may forever separate the people of Massachusetts from all connexion with slavery."

As objections were made from all parts of the House, the petition was not presented.

The House then resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. PICKENS in the chair.)

Mr. FILLMORE said he was instructed by the Committee of Ways and Means to ask the House to take up "a bill to bring into the treasury certain moneys received by public officers, before it can be disbursed, and for other purposes."

Mr. BARNARD asked if it would be in order to move to amend the motion to go into Committee of the Whole, so as to move that the committee take up another bill.

Mr. WISE also inquired if it was in order to move to take up another bill? (Cries of "No, no, no.") He thought it was in order to make such a motion, though the question would be first put on the motion first made.

The committee took up the bill designated by Mr. FILLMORE.

Mr. GWIN inquired if it was in order to move to lay aside that bill, for the purpose of taking up another.

The CHAIRMAN was understood to decide in the negative.

The Clerk then read the bill through all its sections.

Mr. FILLMORE rose, when the bill had been read through, and explained its object. In the first place, the bill proposed to enact that all moneys collected should be brought into the treasury, before being paid out again to defray the expense of collection, so as to allow annual appropriations to be made by Congress for those expenses; thereby bringing those expenses annually before Congress. Another object was to compel the officers to give security for the moneys that come into their hands. And a further object was to impose penalties on such officers as receive and do not pay these moneys over to the Secretary of the Treasury. He would only observe, further, that this bill had been prepared on consultation with the department, and so as to create no difficulty in the keeping of the accounts; and it was reported with the unanimous consent of the committee. If, therefore, this explanation was satisfactory, and there were no amendments offered, he would move that the bill be laid aside, and that the committee take up the bill to authorize the re-issue of treasury notes.

Mr. GWIN moved that the committee take up the bill for the relief of General Jackson.

Some conversation followed between Mr. WM. COST JOHNSON and Mr. FILLMORE, and the Clerk then read the bill for the relief of General Andrew Jackson.

Mr. J. P. KENNEDY asked the committee to take up, and dispose of, a bill (which would lead to no debate) to test the practicability of an electro-magnetic telegraph in the United States. [Cries of "No, no."]

The CHAIRMAN then put the question on Mr. GWIN's motion; and Messrs. GWIN and LINN were appointed tellers, who reported ayes 77, noes 91.

So the committee refused to take up the bill to refund General Jackson's fine.

Mr. FILLMORE moved that the committee take up the bill for the re-issue of treasury notes now outstanding.

Mr. ADAMS expressed a desire to have the committee take up the bills for the establishment of commercial intercourse with China, and with the Sandwich Islands.

Mr. FILLMORE said he could not yield his motion, anxious as he was that the bills referred to by the gentleman [Mr. ADAMS] should be passed.

TREASURY NOTES AND LOANS.

The motion to take up the bill authorizing a re-issue of treasury notes was carried, and the bill taken up and read.

Mr. BARNARD rose to offer an amendment to the bill—in substance, the same as that which he had offered as a substitute for the exchequer bill introduced by the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. CUSHING.)

Mr. FILLMORE rose to a question of order.

The CHAIR decided the amendment to be in order, as it was not an original bill, but only an amendment to another bill.

Mr. FILLMORE said he had supposed it was an original bill. He would, however, submit that it was not in order, upon another ground. He submitted it to the Chair whether the subject of the amendment was sufficiently analogous to that of the bill now before the committee.

The CHAIR said that the bill was a proposition to re-issue treasury notes. The amendment of the gentleman [Mr. BARNARD] purported to be a proposition to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to borrow $15,000,000 from the State banks. It was, in fact, only another form of borrowing money, and therefore in order.

Mr. FILLMORE then rose and appealed to his colleague [Mr. BARNARD] to withdraw his amendment, and allow the bill to pass without delay, as it was indispensable to the wants of the treasury. Let the appropriation bills be passed, and then it would be time enough to offer the amendment.

Mr. BARNARD said there was only one condition on which he could consent to withdraw his amendment—and that was, an assurance from the committee and the House that he should have an opportunity to submit and discuss his proposition one day this week. Unless he pressed it now, he would have no opportunity of doing so at all prior to the adjournment.

Mr. B. called for the reading of his amendment; and it was read through.

Mr. CUSHING expressed a desire that the gentleman from New York [Mr. BARNARD] would permit him to put in an amendment to his amendment, so that the committee might have the whole subject before them.

Mr. BARNARD declined yielding to the request, and observed that the gentleman from Massachusetts had better offer his proposition after he (Mr. B.) had concluded his remarks.

Mr. BARNARD then went on to say that upon reflection, he did not think there could be a more fitting opportunity for him to discharge what he conceived to be a great duty to the country, by presenting his proposition to the House; nor did he think that there could be a more fitting occasion than the present for the House to consider the subject. Here was a proposition, brought in by the Committee of Ways and Means, for the relief of the treasury by the mode to which this Government had been in the habit of resorting, for six years past, year after year, and session after session. It was a mere temporary expedient to enable the Government to get along from day to day, and to maintain its credit without repudiation. He held the treasury-note policy and system to be no financial system whatever. It was an expedient, and not a system; it was a mere temporary resort, and not the adoption of a great financial measure, such as ought to be adopted for the relief of the treasury. Under present circumstances, however, he made no opposition to the treasury-note bill. The object of that bill, as he understood it, as introduced by the Committee of Ways and Means, was merely to postpone the day of payment upon treasury notes already issued and now in the hands of bona-fide holders, beyond the period of time when the Government promised to pay them. That was one object of the bill. Another object was to induce the holders of these notes to keep them in their pockets as investments, by the promise to pay interest on them.

The Government issued its promissory notes for the payment of its current expenses, just as an individual might do under similar circumstances, for the sake of getting along in a Jeremy Diddler sort of way from day to day; and after the notes had become due, proposed to raise the wind by asking the public creditors to forbear to press their claims for payment. This was the financial policy of the treasury-note bill before the House; and he repeated, that he would not oppose it, but he must say that it was a most wretched and ill-judged system. He had never voted for a treasury-note bill, either under the last administration or the present; and he should not vote for one until he was better satisfied than he now was that it was a proper mode of raising money, and better satisfied than he ever had been of the immediate pressing necessity of the measure. His doctrine was, that, in a time of profound peace, with a plenty of money in the money market, whenever it was necessary for this Government to borrow money, it was better to borrow it by way of a loan, than by the issue of treasury notes. But still he was willing, in deference to the opinions of his friends, that, as this policy had been pursued for six years, it should be pursued a little longer. At the same time, however, he would propose, as an amendment to it, a measure which, if adopted by the House, would supersede all necessity for carrying on the operations of the treasury by the means of treasury notes. The Government would then have no need to apply to the holders of these notes to postpone their demands for payment, and would have no need to offer them interest to induce them to keep them in their pockets. He would have preferred that his proposition should have come in, as he originally contemplated, in the form of a substitute to the exchequer bill reported by the select committee of that House; for, after all, the great object he had in view was the adoption, not the creation (for that they all knew to be out of the question) and nationalizing of a currency. After the great political revolution which took place in 1840, there was no one subject to which the people looked with so much solicitude as that of the currency, and which they so anxiously expected from the party they had placed in power. The majority in Congress promptly answered this universal demand, and attempted to give to the country a sound, safe, stable, and uniform national currency, in the form of a good old-fashioned bank of the United States. They failed; and failed without any fault of their own. They failed in consequence of the "fixed constitutional fact" at the other end of the avenue, of which they had heard so much. The plan that the majority then proposed, and which failed in the manner stated, was the one which he should always consider the best that could be adopted for the country. They all knew, however, that that plan could not be adopted under present circumstances. Another plan had been proposed—that of the exchequer; and the House had considered it at this session, and decided against it by almost a unanimous vote; and he might be allowed to say that that was a vote pronouncing condemnation as well against the plan of the select committee, as that of the Secretary of the Treasury. The exchequer scheme of the gentleman from Massachusetts differed, in some unimportant particulars, from the one of the Secretary of the Treasury; but, in his opinion, the former was not relieved from the objections which weighed so heavily against the latter. Mr. B. then went on to compare the two projects, stating his objections to both.

We have had (said Mr. B.) the exchequer presented to us, and have discarded it by an almost unanimous vote; and the condemnation of the plan of the Executive was equivalent to a condemnation of the plan of the select committee; and he believed that, at the present moment, it would find no greater favor in the House. A bank of the United States could not be had; and, in the mean time, what were they to do? Were they to sit still and fold their arms, and do nothing? Was there nothing else to be done? Was there no plan which could be devised, after rejecting both the bank of the United States and the exchequer, of supplying the country with a safe, sound, and stable circulating medium, through the operations of the Government? He contended that there was; and the plan was one to which no Whig of the country, consistently with his principles, could object.

The State banks had hitherto been resorted to, under General Jackson's administration, with a promise on his part, and on the part of those who stood around him, that a national currency of uniform value should be supplied. That plan failed, as everybody foresaw it must fail. In the form in which it was proposed that the State banks should supply a national currency, the plan failed, because there was no attempt to nationalize such a currency. It was all a currency of local banks, and could not circulate beyond their immediate neighborhoods; and, for that reason, the plan failed. But he contended that, through the agency of this Government, the currency of the State banks might be nationalized, and made a safe, sound, uniform currency—and that, too, without a particle of risk to the Government or to the people. If this, then, could be done, was it not their duty to do it? The effect to be produced in the present condition of the treasury was an important element in the plan he proposed to adopt. The Government must borrow money; it was already in debt, and had now an amount of treasury notes outstanding, of from eleven and a half to twelve millions of dollars, which were already due, or soon to become due. If they did not mean to borrow more money for the current service of the Government, it was indispensable that these treasury notes should be kept out. The estimates and plans of the Secretary of the Treasury, and of the Committee of Ways and Means, all went on the ground that the outstanding treasury notes were not to be paid at the treasury when due. If they were to be paid when due, then it was necessary that they should borrow money to pay them. With the aid of five and a half millions, (or about the sum borrowed upon loan at the last session of Congress,) and by keeping back the treasury notes now outstanding, the treasury would be able to get on during the year. But so sure as these notes came in for redemption, unless authority to re-issue them be given by this bill, there must be a great deficit. At all events, there stood the fact, that they had eleven and a half to twelve millions of these notes outstanding; which was discreditable to the nation, and he desired to remedy it.

He deemed it a measure of high import, as it furnished a currency for the country. He was of opinion that, even if this treasury note bill should be passed, it was quite possible that the treasury might find itself in difficulties before the end of the year; and he would take away from this Administration the very possibility of an excuse for an extra session of Congress; and he believed his amendment would accomplish that purpose.

He then detailed the plan which he proposed. It was simple, he said, and could be comprehended at a glance: there was no mystery about it. It was intended to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to borrow from the State banks a sum of money not exceeding $15,000,000—eleven and a half millions of which would be required for the redemption of treasury notes; a large portion of which, he observed in passing, was now in the hands of those very State banks. So far, then, it was a mere change of the form of indebtedness, and a substitution of one form of credit for another. The sum so borrowed, however, was not to exceed the wants and exigencies of the Government, and to be borrowed from specie-paying banks; but in no instance more than one-fourth of their capital; and in this way the banks of every part of the United States would be brought into use in furnishing the loan. For the amount so borrowed, this Government would then stamp the notes of the lending banks to the amount borrowed from them and such notes should be received in payment of public dues; and in case such banks should suspend specie payments, either for these notes, or their notes generally, the Government should be absolved from all obligation to pay to such banks the interest on their loans, which in no case was to exceed 6 per cent. though he thought it might be obtained at 5 per cent.

He dwelt on the security which this bill would provide, on the aid which it would furnish to the treasury, and on the facilities it would extend to commerce, by this provision of a concurrent circulating medium; and enforced it on the attention of the House in some general remarks.

Mr. CUSHING moved, as an amendment to the amendment, the bill reported some time since by the select committee appointed on that subject, entitled "A bill amendatory of the several acts establishing the Treasury Department," in which he had made several changes, striking out one entire section, and materially altering others; and thus making it, in fact, a different bill.

Some conversation ensued on a point of order, in which Messrs. CUSHING, FILLMORE, WISE, and others, took part.

The CHAIR decided that the amendment was in order, and that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CUSHING] was entitled to the floor.

Mr. CUSHING observed that there were then two propositions before the committee, presented fairly for their consideration: the one on the plan of currency and deposites, proposed by the select committee of the House; and the other, the antagonist plan, coming from the other side of the House, proposed by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. BARNARD;] and he was, therefore, thankful that the gentleman had obtained the floor before him, and, by this means, made his plan the first question in order. He was also gratified that the gentleman from New York had discussed the question as between these two plans, and, by his admissions, placed his (Mr. C.'s) bill in a totally different attitude from that in which it stood when it was last before the House; for the gentleman emphatically assumed that it was the duty of the majority to legislate on the subject of the currency, which was the very reverse of what was assumed by the Committee of Ways and Means when they made their report on the exchequer bill. The gentleman commenced by an emphatic declaration that it was the duty of the Whig party, in accordance with their avowed principles, and with their professions before the people, to pass some act for the establishment of a uniform and national currency. The gentleman also admitted that a bank of the United States was out of the question; and he thanked the gentleman for that admission. He agreed with the gentleman that there were alternatives for a United States bank; and that it would be wrong for the House to neglect their duty in adopting one of these alternatives, because they could not, by their own fiat, make a bank. They entered, then, into this discussion under new auspices; and it was not the question whether the House should remain negative and derelict to its duty, but it was the question which of the two plans before it was the best?

He was happy to join issue with the gentleman from New York on this question. In the first place, what was the gentleman's plan? Had the committee examined it? The gentleman assumed that it was the duty of Congress to provide a national currency; and he proposed—what? He proposed that the United States—not having, it would seem, any credit of its own to issue paper money—should borrow fifteen millions of the paper of the State banks, and endorse it, to make it a national currency. [Here Mr. BARNARD explained.] He had stated it briefly as the borrowing of bank paper, and it was so in effect. What did the second section propose? It was true, the first section said that the Government should borrow fifteen millions of specie-paying banks; but what was the thing to be borrowed? Was it gold and silver? Certainly not; for the banks could not make the loan, unless the Government took their paper promises. But what did the second section say? Why, that the Secretary of the Treasury was to cause the notes of these banks, to an amount equal to that borrowed, to be stamped with the guaranty, that they should be taken in payment of all the dues of the Government, so that the practical effect would be, that the United States will have received in its coffers fifteen millions of paper of the State banks, which it stamps with its signet, to give it currency in the United States. Now he objected to this, in principle. The United States could make a better currency of its own; and, in the second place, there would be saddled on the Government fifteen millions of bank paper, which would be put in its custom-houses in payment of public dues; and if the banks stopped payment, what would be the remedy? It would be the same as it was in a previous instance. The Government might sue the banks, if it pleased; but it would have fifteen millions of broken bank paper on hand, which nobody would take. But, again. Why take this bank paper at all? If he considered it as a matter of personal interest to his constituents alone, he would go for it, inasmuch as, under this plan, the paper of the banks of Boston and New York would constitute the principal currency of the country.

But who was to select the banks? who was to decide which of the banks should be taken to make a currency for the country? The Secretary was to take good bank paper; but how was he to tell what paper was good? But why do this thing? What would be gained by it? It would add nothing to the sum total of the currency of the country; and it would only give a currency in certain portions of the United States to the paper of certain banks. [Mr. BARNARD here explained.] Mr. C. continued: that the plan proposed that the officers of the Government should pick among the banks, and select such as they thought proper. The gentleman from New York assumed that, by the cabalistic operation of stamping the paper of these banks, the prosperity of the country would be restored, and relief would be given to the treasury. He should have been glad if the gentleman had gone into some arguments to show how this could be brought about. For his part, he could see no necessary connexion between the prosperity of the country and the giving currency to the paper of certain favored banks. He could readily see that the banks themselves might be benefited by the operation; and, indeed, he could only see in it a device by which fifteen millions of bad bank paper might be put into circulation. The gentleman argued, in favor of his plan, that it might be set aside, and another plan substituted for it, by whichever of the two parties came into power;—that if the Whigs came into power, they might substitute for it a national bank; and if the Democrats came into power, they might substitute for it the sub-treasury. This was the only advantage he saw in the plan at all; but would not the same argument apply in favor of the exchequer plan? It would be equally easy for any party that might get into power to substitute for the exchequer their favorite plan, and then they would not have fifteen millions of bad paper on hand. Again: there were other means by which the United States might supply their necessities. If they did not choose to borrow money in the form of a loan—if they must have paper money, he preferred that they should borrow it on their own treasury notes, rather than borrow the promises to pay of banks. He desired to see an end of the fallacious idea that the Government could not get along without being propped up under each shoulder by the State banks. Heretofore, it had been supposed that the United States, which collected fifteen millions or more, annually, from the people, could not proceed on through the instrumentality of that much of real capital, without availing itself of the credit of the banks. Now, he desired to see that state of things reversed; and that the specie should be in the hands of the Government, while the banks should be left to subsist on credit. If there was to be a dead capital on which there was to be a currency, he desired to see that in the hands of the people, through their Representatives. It was for these reasons that he had advocated the exchequer bill. He denied that the decision of the House against the exchequer plan of the Secretary of the Treasury was a decision against the exchequer plan of the select committee, as contended by the gentleman from New York. It was impossible for him to say upon what principles and what conclusions the House voted; but he must say that, upon a careful analysis of that vote, it would be found that the objections which applied to the plan of the Secretary of the Treasury did not apply to the one of the select committee. Mr. C. here went into a comparison of the two plans, explaining the difference between them.

He objected to the form of currency which the gentleman from New York [Mr. BARNARD] would thus provide, and for reasons (he said) which he gave in a speech four years ago, which had been quoted by the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, to prove his inconsistency. He next noticed the bill affirmatively. The first objection raised was one of power. It was alleged that it placed power in the hands of the Executive; and he proceeded to notice it in relation to Government patronage, and administrative power. He said this was a question affecting the Government. The Administration would remain, though the Government might be unable to go on; and it was the duty of Congress to provide for the support of the Government; and he affirmed that this bill would give no more administrative power than the sub-treasury, and much less than a United States bank. There remained, then, nothing but the details of the measure. There must be somewhere a depository for the public money; there must be some legislation on this subject; and this scheme presented the least objectionable mode. The committee were not, however, wedded to its precise phraseology; and if amendments upon be suggested, they would not object to consideration.

He then alluded to the prospect of the separate parties in the next presidential election, on the several measures of a United States bank, a sub-treasury, and an exchequer. He said the gentleman to whom one party looked [he was understood to allude to Mr. Clay] as the great advocate and representative of their principles, did not speak of a United States bank, but only of a national currency under the regulation of the nation. Well, the exchequer would give them a national currency under the control of the nation; and no electoral college of any State of this Union would find its interest in going into the contest on a United States bank measure as a sine qua non.

Mr. BOTTS moved that the committee rise, with a view to the adoption of a resolution to stop the debate, and take the bill out of the power of the committee. He said it must be evident that the committee were discussing a proposition which could not be carried, and which was wholly different from the bill to which it was proposed to be attached.

The CHAIR suggested to the gentlemen to include in his motion a motion to report the bill laid aside this morning; to which the gentleman [Mr. BOTTS] assented.

Tellers (Messrs. MEDILL and J. COOPER) were appointed to take the vote on the motion to rise, who reported ayes 75, noes 50.

The committee rose, and reported the first bill (770,) and also their progress on the second (that for the re-issue of treasury notes.)

TERMINATION OF THE DEBATE.

Mr. FILLMORE then obtained the floor, and offered a resolution, to the effect that all debate on the bill for the re-issue of treasury notes shall terminate at 3 o'clock this day, when the committee shall vote on all amendments pending, and that may be offered. He also moved the previous question on his resolution.

[It was now half-past 2 o'clock.]

Mr. S. MASON expressed a strong desire to speak, as he had not made a speech this session.

Mr. FILLMORE declined to modify or withdraw his resolution.

Mr. WISE made an inquiry on a point of order, which was answered by the Speaker.

Mr. GILMER rose to ask the gentleman from New York to modify his resolution, and make the daily hour of meeting 10 o'clock.

Mr. FILLMORE could not accept of the modification. He thought it would be impracticable for the House to meet at such an early hour.

Mr. GILMER gave notice that he should take the first opportunity of offering the resolution (for meeting at 10 o'clock) which he had intimated.

The previous question was sustained, and the main question ordered to be now put.

Mr. ATHERTON asked for the yeas and nays on the adoption of the resolution; and they were ordered.

It was now twenty minutes to 3 o'clock, and Mr. FILLMORE rose and asked leave to modify his resolution, so as to fix the time for taking the bill out of committee at half-past 3, instead of 3 o'clock.

The SPEAKER said the resolution could not be modified, as the previous question was ordered.

The roll was called, and resulted—yeas 83, nays 80.

So the House adopted the resolution.

Mr. WISE then moved an amendment: rejected—ayes 29, noes not counted.

On motion of Mr. FILLMORE, the House again went into committee, (Mr. PICKENS in the chair,) and took up the bill for the re-issue of treasury notes, which was under discussion when the committee last rose.

Mr. WISE obtained the floor, and said he believed he had three minutes left. [A voice—"One and a half."]

Mr. T. F. FOSTER appealed to the gentleman to leave him half a minute. [Laughter.]

Mr. WISE said he should, in the few minutes left him, discuss the exchequer, as far as he could. [A member: "Only a quarter of an inch."] In reply to the remarks of those gentlemen who had a wish to have the Government separate its fiscal operations, from local banks, he would observe, that, so far from the exchequer having a tendency to encourage the State banks in their over-issues, it would be a regulator and (some might call it) a scourge of the local banks. It allowed the notes of the local banks to be received where they were payable, in specie, on demand; but it did not permit a dollar to be paid out in notes. A settlement was to be held weekly, if not oftener, with the banks, which were to be called upon to pay their notes, dollar for dollar, in specie. It was well known what a scourge the United States Bank was to the local banks. Yet that bank paid out their notes, although it enforced constant settlement.

He would conclude the last word he was allowed to say by protesting that, after all the promises made by the head of the dominant party in that hall that an opportunity should be afforded to discuss the exchequer, he had been deprived of it [here the Chairman's hammer fell three times] by that hammer. [Laughter.]

The question was then taken on Mr. CUSHING's amendment, resulting in—ayes 99, noes 89.

No quorum voting, another count was then taken, which resulted in ayes 37, noes 98.

So the amendment was rejected.

The question was then taken on Mr. BARNARD's amendment, and it was also decided in the negative—ayes 34, noes 105.

On motion by Mr. FILLMORE, the committee rose and reported the bill to the House without amendment; and

Mr. ANDREWS of Kentucky having moved the previous question on the engrossment of the bill, it was seconded, and the main question ordered; and then the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The bill having been read the third time,

Mr. ANDREWS of Kentucky called for the previous question on its passage.

Mr. C. J. INGERSOLL called for the yeas and nays, which were ordered; and the bill, under the operation of the previous question, was passed—yeas 111, nays 51, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Allen, Sherlock J. Andrews, Arnold, Aycrigg, Baker, Barton, Besson, Bidlack, Birdseye, Blair, Boardman, Borden, Bowne, Briggs, Brockway, Bronson, Jeremiah Brown, John Campbell, Cary, Casey, Chapman, John C. Clark, Staley N. Clarke, Coles, Cowen, Cranston, Cross, Cushing, Richard D. Davis, Dawson, Deberry, Doig, John Edwards, Everett, Ferris, Fessenden, Fillmore, John G. Floyd, Charles A. Ingersoll, Keim, Andrew Kennedy, Littlefield, McKay, McKeon, Alfred Marshall, Mathiot, Medill, Meriwether, Miller, Mitchell, Payne, Pickens, Ramsey, Rayner, Reding, Reynolds, Rogers, Snyder, Sprigg, John T. Stuart, John B. Thompson, Tomlinson, Van Rensselaer, Joseph L. White, and Christopher H. Williams—51.

So the bill was passed.

Mr. YORKE moved a reconsideration of the vote by which the bill was passed.

Mr. TURNEY moved to lay that motion on the table, which was rejected; and the motion of the gentleman from New Jersey went over until to-morrow.

Mr. FILLMORE then asked the House to take up the bill to bring into the treasury the moneys received by public officers before it should be disbursed, and for other purposes.

The bill was accordingly taken up, ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time, and passed.

Mr. ADAMS again rose for the purpose of obtaining permission to present the petitions which had been intrusted to him for that purpose. He moved a suspension of the rules to enable him to do so.

Mr. HOLMES said he really hoped the request would be granted, (cries of "No, no,") for it was time they should know what it was. [Great confusion.]

Mr. WELLER moved that the House adjourn.

Mr. SLADE called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered, amidst cries of "What will you gain by that?"

The yeas and nays having been taken, they resulted as follows—yeas 86, nays 75.

The House then adjourned, at 4 o'clock.

IN SENATE.

The PRESIDENT pro tem. laid before the Senate a communication from the President of the United States, transmitting a report from the State Department, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of the 14th instant, requesting the President of the United States to communicate to the Senate a copy of any commission or letter of instruction to Daniel Webster, esq., Secretary of State, to treat with Lord Ashburton, &c.; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Also, a resolution in relation to the establishment of marine hospitals on the Mississippi and its tributaries, and the great Northern lakes, for the benefit of sick and disabled seamen. These resolutions were referred to appropriate committees; the latter one to the Committee on Commerce.

Also, presented joint resolutions of the Legislature of the State of Indiana, in reference to the burdens placed on commerce by the towns on the Western rivers, by wharfage, rates, &c., and particularly by the municipal authorities of the city of New Orleans, by their regulations imposing duties on produce landed there, and asking Congress to assert its power to regulate commerce by removing these obstructions. Read, ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. PHELPS, from the Committee on Pensions, to which had been referred House bill for the relief of Maria Fowler, reported the same back without amendment, and with a recommendation that it be indefinitely postponed; its passage being unnecessary, because power existed in the department to grant the relief prayed for. CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

PUBLISHED BY BLAIR AND RIVES, AT ONE DOLLAR PER SESSION, IN ADVANCE.

27TH CONG.....3D SESS. TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 28, 1843. VOLUME 12....No. 21.

On motion by Mr. BENTON, it was

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be directed to include the permanent appropriations in the list of current appropriations made each session, now directed to be published by law.

Mr. KING presented the credentials of ARTHUR P. BAGBY, who has been elected by the Legislature of Alabama a Senator of the United States from that State for six years, from and after the 3d day of March next; which were read, and ordered to be placed on the files of the Senate.

On motion by Mr. McDUFFIE, the previous orders of the day were postponed, and the bill for the relief of Charles J. Jenkins and Wm. W. Mann, assignee of John McKinne, was taken up.

The bill was understood by the reporter to involve a claim growing out of a contract of McKinne with the United States to collect for the Government some $32,000, the consideration for which service to be one-fourth of the amount collected. It seems that the contractor collected the amount by a note payable to the Government; the payment of which was conditionally guarantied. But, before the note arrived at maturity, the drawer of the same was relieved, by act of Congress, from the payment of the amount due the United States, and covered by the note.

This bill was debated at some length. Messrs. EVANS, KING, WOODBURY, and BUCHANAN opposed the bill, on the ground (as was understood) that the contractor agreed to involve his claim to one fourth of the amount collected, in the act of cancelling the debt by the Government. They were willing to pay the actual expense incurred by the contractor in his efforts to secure the debt; but they were unwilling to pay him the quarter of the debt, for the reason above; and for the further reason, that the debt was not actually collected as contracted—the Government never having received the money.

Messrs. BERRIEN, McDUFFIE, and DAYTON defended the bill. They maintained that the contractor never agreed to involve his interest in the claim, in the act of cancellation by the United States; and that though the Government did not actually receive the money, the money was collected. The reason that the Government did not receive it, was, that they had cancelled the debt. They maintained that the Government could not, by its own power, on any principle of common justice, absolve itself from the obligation of its own contract.

There being no amendment proposed to the bill, it was reported to the Senate; and the question being, Shall the bill be ordered to be engrossed for a third reading?

Mr. BUCHANAN demanded the yeas and nays, which were ordered; and the question being put, it was decided in the negative—yeas 15, nays 28. So the bill was rejected.

Mr. EVANS now moved to proceed to the consideration of the navy appropriation bill.

Mr. WALKER suggested the bankrupt bill.

Mr. LINN suggested the propriety of proceeding to the consideration of the bill which was ordered to be engrossed on yesterday, to indemnify Major Gen. Andrew Jackson.

Mr. HUNTINGTON inquired what would be the order of business now.

The CHAIR replied that the call for resolutions was the next thing in order.

Mr. LINN made some further remarks in favor of taking up the bill alluded to by him; which, he conceived, was the first in order.

Mr. BAYARD pressed on the attention of the Senate the several bills touching the naval service, which had been made the special order for Saturday last, but were superseded by other bills. He hoped the chairman of the Committee on Finance [Mr. EVANS] would consent to let these bills be taken up, before proceeding to the navy appropriation bill.

Mr. EVANS could not yield to the suggestion. He had refrained for several days from pressing this, although he felt the necessity of having action upon it.

Mr. TAPPAN also suggested the propriety of taking up the Senate bills in the order in which they stood on the calendar, in preference to considering the bills from the House, which could be soon disposed of.

The question was, however, taken on the motion of Mr. EVANS, and decided in the negative—yeas 23, nays 23.

The resolution submitted by Mr. WALKER yesterday, as follows, was taken up for consideration, viz:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to communicate to the Senate, at the next session of Congress, a plan and estimates for the improvement of the navigation of the Ohio, by the construction of an enlarged steamboat canal on the Indiana side of the falls, near Louisville; also, to report what effect would be produced on the navigation of that river above the falls, by the removal of the ledge of rocks at that point; also, what would be the expense of enlarging the present canal, so as to admit the largest class of boats; and what arrangements, if any, can be made for rendering the said canal toll free, or subject to such toll only as may be necessary to keep the same in repair.

Messrs. TAPPAN, WALKER, MOREHEAD, EVANS, SEVIER, and SMITH of Connecticut, discussed the above resolution at some length. The points involved in the discussion were as to the best mode of improving the Ohio river at the falls, and the necessity of making some improvement to afford facilities to commerce, and to relieve it from the onerous tax imposed on it by the tolls collected by the Louisville and Portland Canal Company.

The debate was, however, terminated on the presentation of the following, by Mr. TAPPAN, as a substitute; which was accepted by the mover of the resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to ascertain and report to the next Congress what is the best mode of improving the navigation of the Ohio river at the falls near Louisville, and the probable expense of such improvement.

The resolution was then adopted as amended.

GENERAL JACKSON'S FINE.

Mr. LINN's bill to indemnify Major General Andrew Jackson for damage sustained in the discharge of his official duty, came up as an engrossed bill, and was read a third time.

The question then being, "Shall the bill pass?"

Mr. DAYTON addressed the Senate for about half an hour in opposition. There were principles involved in the bill which he considered of such consequence as to induce him to call the attention of the Senate to them before they voted for its passage. It had been urged by the friends of the bill that there was no other principle involved in it than that which had been acted on repeatedly in regard to other officers of the Government. He had looked into this matter, and found that such was not the fact. In the first place, with respect to the title, he found that the bills passed by Congress to restore fines to other officers, inflicted on them for violations of law in the performance of their duties, were all entitled acts for the relief of those individuals. In the next place, there was nothing in the bodies of those acts in the slightest degree tending to cast imputation, directly or indirectly, on the tribunals which had inflicted those fines. In these two respects, he argued at some length, that this bill differed altogether from the principle of the bills claimed as analogous cases.

After Mr. D. had delivered his views in support of this position,

Mr. BERRIEN rose, and referred to the opinions expressed by the Judiciary Committee in support of the amendments which it had recommended. As that report contained his views on the subject, he should now merely state that those amendments having been rejected by the Senate, he could not vote for the bill. So far from the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina, adopted yesterday, making the original bill more acceptable to him, it had the opposite effect; for he now considered it more exceptionable than ever. It was a decision of Congress that the fine was inflicted for an alleged contempt of court—leaving that doubtful about which no doubt whatever before existed.

Mr. CONRAD, in reference to his remarks of yesterday, said he would now merely repeat what he then said—that, so far from having changed the opinions which he expressed last session, when the subject was before the Senate, he had, upon more careful examination and mature consideration, been more and more confirmed in the correctness of the views he had taken on that occasion.

Mr. C., in the course of his remarks, said he was perfectly tired and disgusted with the eternal subserviency and sycophancy displayed by the worshippers of this political idol. He alluded to the manner in which this subject had been agitated through the country, and in the Legislatures of the States.

Mr. LINN said the Senator from Louisiana had used an expression which required some explanation. He had introduced this bill with the motives which he had always expressed to the Senate.

Mr. CONRAD was not aware that he had said anything from which the Senator from Missouri could possibly infer that he intended to impute to him other motives than those which he had avowed.

Mr. LINN said the expression to which he alluded was this: "Was this eternal sycophancy to General Jackson never to cease?" Did the Senator mean to apply the epithet "sycophancy" to his (Mr. L.'s) conduct, or that of any other gentleman who had advocated the bill? If the Senator meant to impute to him a sycophantic disposition, in making an offering to General Jackson, it was a very offensive ——

Mr. CONRAD said he was really very sorry that the gentleman should have conceived that he intended, by any portion of his remarks, to cast a reflection upon any gentleman, and particularly upon that honorable Senator; for if there was a man in that body to whom he was bound to impute entire sincerity and singleness of heart, it was that gentleman. He was aware that with that gentleman it was a matter of personal feeling of regard; and he was not at all surprised that that gentleman should view the question in a different aspect from that in which he viewed it. And he assured him the remark he had made was not intended to reflect upon him, or upon any member of that body.

The question was then taken by yeas and nays; and the bill was passed—yeas 28, nays 20, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Bagby, Benton, Buchanan, Calhoun, Cuthbert, Fulton, Graham, Henderson, King, Linn, McDuffie, McRoberts, Mangum, Rives, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Smith of Indiana, Sprague, Sturgeon, Tallmadge, Tappan, Walker, Wilcox, Williams, Woodbury, Wright, and Young —28.

NAYS—Messrs. Archer, Barrow, Bates, Bayard, Berrien, Choate, Clayton, Conrad, Crafts, Crittenden, Dayton, Evans, Huntington, Kerr, Merrick, Miller, Morehead, Phelps, White, and Woodbridge—20.

Mr. GRAHAM now moved to change the title to that of "A bill for the indemnity of Major General Andrew Jackson."

This motion was concurred in without a division.

Mr. YOUNG now moved to postpone all previous orders, and proceed to the consideration of the bankrupt bill.

Mr. EVANS hoped the motion would not prevail. It was most important that the navy appropriation bill should be passed without delay. It would not take more than an hour to dispose of it.

Mr. KING was under an impression that the bankrupt bill was the special order, entitled to preference.

Mr. BERRIEN explained that he had only given notice that he would, on Monday, (yesterday,) move to proceed to the consideration of that subject. It had not been made the special order.

Mr. KING remarked that, at all events, there was more propriety in proceeding with that question now, than with an appropriation bill, which might stand over several days, if necessary, without being affected by the delay; whereas every hour's delay to the subject of the bankrupt law rendered it more doubtful whether there would be time in both Houses to consider all the proposed amendments of the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. CALHOUN hoped the bill would be taken up, and acted upon forthwith; for if there was any one bill in which the community was interested more than another, it was this. There ought, if possible, to be a decision at this session; it had been already too long delayed.

Mr. BERRIEN hoped he would not be misunderstood as evincing any indisposition to proceed with the bankrupt bill. He was ready, at any time it was agreeable to the Senate, to state the views of the Judiciary Committee. He thought, however, there would be less interruption if an hour or two were given to the navy appropriation bill, so as to leave the Senate free to continue with the bankrupt question till disposed of.

Mr. MERRICK was as anxious as any gentleman in the Senate to dispose of the bankrupt bill as speedily as possible; but it appeared to him that some courtesy was due to the chairman of the Finance Committee, who had stated that the navy appropriation bill would not occupy more time than an hour.

Mr. WALKER observed that both Houses of the Legislature of his State had, in 1840, requested their Representatives, and instructed their Senators in Congress, to vote for a bankrupt law; in compliance with which he had voted for the law of last session. By a subsequent action of the Legislature, the instructions had been reversed, requiring the delegation of the State in Congress to vote for the repeal of the law of last session, or a modification protecting the rights of creditors, and including in the operation of the law banking incorporations. He now gave notice that, when the subject should be taken up, as soon as the amendments of the Judiciary Committee should be disposed of, if the repeal bill was not adopted, he should move to make the amendments called for by his Legislature.

Mr. SEVIER asked if the motion pending was debatable.

The CHAIR was understood to say that a motion to postpone was debatable.

Mr. SEVIER said he owed it to the Senator from Maine, much as he desired the bankrupt bill to be taken up, to vote for his motion.

Mr. YOUNG proposed a compromise—to take up the bankrupt bill, and pass it over informally till to-morrow.

Mr. BUCHANAN said he, for one, was opposed to any compromise on the subject.

Mr. EVANS said he was constrained to insist on proceeding with the navy appropriation bill.

The question was then taken by yeas and nays on Mr. YOUNG's motion, and decided in the negative—yeas 23, nays 24.

Mr. EVANS then moved to postpone the previous orders, and take up the navy appropriation bill; which was concurred in.

THE NAVY APPROPRIATION BILL

Was accordingly taken up as in committee of the whole, and the amendments recommended by the Committee on Finance were read.

The first amendment, being merely verbal, was adopted.

The second amendment was to strike out from the appropriation of $300,000 for clothing for the navy, the proviso, "that the duties of the Chief of the Bureau of Provisions and Clothing be hereafter discharged by a captain of the navy, who shall receive the same compensation that is allowed to the chief of the bureau of dock yards."

Mr. EVANS explained that, in the opinion of the committee, the captains of the navy were not the sort of persons required to perform the duties of Chief of the Bureau of Provisions and Clothing. It was a person rather of mercantile habits, acquainted with business and accounts.

Mr. WOODBURY concurred; and said, if it needs must be an appointment to be made from the officers of the navy, it should be rather from the pursers than the captains.

The amendment was adopted.

The third amendment was in the appropriation for surgeons' necessaries and appliances for the sick and hurt of the naval service, including the marine corps, to strike out the proviso: "That hereafter no person shall hold the place of Chief of the Bureau of Medicine and Surgery who shall not have had five years of sea service."

Mr. MERRICK hoped this amendment would not prevail.

Mr. EVANS explained that the committee had had the subject under consideration for a long time, and, from the mass of evidence before it, felt perfectly satisfied that the proviso was inexpedient, and that its effect would be to deprive the public service of the most valuable officer now at the head of the bureau, who had done more, since his appointment, to correct abuses and check expenditures than had ever been done in the same length of time.

Mr. MERRICK thought the principle a good one, of requiring the head of the bureau to have had five years' experience at sea. On this ground he opposed the amendment at great length.

Mr. BUCHANAN said ever since he had been a member of that body, in all situations, and under all circumstances, he had been opposed to legislating men out of office, and particularly in cases where the men were entirely competent to discharge the duties of their offices. However much the Senator from Maryland [Mr. MERRICK] might disavow any such intention in this case, he (Mr. B.) would undertake to say that, from the circumstances of the case, if this proviso should not be stricken out, the inference throughout the country would be irresistible. What was the nature of the case? A constituent of his, (Mr. B.'s) a physician of very high character in his profession, a man of most extensive learning, without the slightest solicitation on his part, was brought here and placed at the head of the medical bureau. He never sought the office; the holding of it, in fact, was an injury to his private interests; and his determination was not to continue to hold it a single day beyond the time when he should be enabled to complete the reforms which he had commenced. It was, as he said, at an inconvenience to himself, and from patriotic motives alone, that that gentleman continued to fill that office. And now it appeared it had been suddenly discovered that this gentleman had not been at sea for five years, and consequently, according to the opinion of the Senator from Maryland, was not acquainted with all the diseases, epidemic and endemic, to which seamen were liable. This was the argument of the honorable Senator. But the gentleman it appeared had been at sea for upwards of three years, and had left that service only because the Government desired his services in another department.

He would forbear to go into the merits of the question; he had no doubt the distinguished officer who had made charges against this gentleman believed every word he had stated; but, from his position, he could not possibly be acquainted with the facts. The gentleman in question had devoted himself to the remedying of abuses in the medical department; and, in these days of reform, if he was to be legislated out of office, it could only be because he had exposed those abuses.

Mr. CALHOUN said he knew nothing about the parties, even by reputation; but he was decidedly averse to the system of displacing individuals from office by legislation. It was a system which was very likely to give rise to injustice; and if there were no other consideration, this would be sufficient to induce him to vote against such a proviso as that. He knew nothing of the gentleman who was the subject of this proviso; but he could easily imagine that, if he was indeed a reformer of abuses, as had been represented, he would have many enemies. There was no branch of the service which was more liable to abuses than the medical department. Upon this subject he spoke with the light of experience, for the expenses of that department, when he went into the War Department, he found to be as high as $100,000. And yet it was getting along with great difficulty. The expenses were five times greater than they ought to be; and when they came afterwards to be reduced to $25,000, it was found that they could still be supplied with all the comforts belonging to the medical department.

He would not consent to give his vote in such a way as to favor the system of displacing individuals from office by legislation.

Mr. CUTHBERT concurred with the Senator from South Carolina that this sort of legislation would operate unjustly, capriciously, and injuriously, and ought not, therefore, to be countenanced.

The debate on this subject was continued by Messrs. BAYARD, MERRICK, STURGEON, CALHOUN, WOODBURY, EVANS, and CUTHBERT.

The amendment was then adopted—yeas 27, nays 7.

The fourth amendment was to strike out from the sources of general expenses to be paid, the words "for taxes and assessments on public property;" which was adopted.

The amendments of the committee having been gone through,

Mr. EVANS moved an amendment limiting the payment of arrearages due in the medical department to $50,000; which was adopted.

He next moved to insert an appropriation of $6,000 for carrying into effect the joint resolution of Congress, authorizing the establishment of two agencies for the purchase of water-rotted hemp in Kentucky and Missouri.

This subject was debated by Messrs. WOODBURY, EVANS, CRITTENDEN, KING, MOREHEAD, WALKER, BAYARD, and CALHOUN.

Finally the proposed appropriation was limited to $4,000; and the amendment, modified to that sum, was adopted.

Mr. EVANS next moved a verbal amendment, as to machinery necessary for the navy-yards; which was adopted.

Mr. WILLIAMS, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, moved an amendment authorizing the application of the $100,000 appropriated in the navy appropriation bill of last session for the construction of a floating or dry dock; on which considerable debate arose.

Mr. HENDERSON moved as an amendment to the amendment, an appropriation of $100,000 for the construction of a dock at the navy-yard of Pensacola.

Pending the question on these amendments,

The Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, February 21, 1843.

Mr. PAYNE asked leave to report a Senate bill.

Mr. BRIGGS objected.

Mr. JACOB THOMPSON called for the orders of the day.

PENSIONS.

Mr. WELLER asked leave to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of bill No. 295, being "An act to extend the pension laws to the soldiers engaged in the Indian wars of the West, down to the treaty made at Greenville, in 1795."

Objection was made by Mr. MERIWETHER.

Mr. WELLER moved to suspend the rules; but the motion, requiring two thirds, was not carried.

Mr. ADAMS wished to present a petition, (Abolition,) and appealed to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. JACOB THOMPSON] to yield the floor.

Mr. THOMPSON said he had refused many gentlemen, and could not now yield the floor without our incurring the danger of losing his right to it.

THE STATE DEBTS.

The House resumed the consideration of the motion made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. J. R. INGERSOLL,] to print 10,000 extra copies of the reports of the majority and minority of the Committee of Ways and Means against the proposition to issue $200,000,000 Government stock to be distributed to the States.

Mr. THOMPSON of Mississippi occupied the morning hour on this subject, and principally in defence of the course pursued by his own State.

NEW BANK PROJET.

Mr. POPE gave notice that to-morrow he should ask leave to introduce a bill to be entitled An act to aid National and State credit, and to reform and regulate currency and facilitate exchanges, through the agency of a bank, based upon the proceeds of the public lands.

LOUISIANA LAND BILL.

Mr. J. C. CLARK moved a reconsideration of the vote of the House, by which it laid on the table his resolution, a few days since, to discharge the Committee of the Whole from the Louisiana land claim bill; and on this he moved the previous question.

Mr. C. JOHNSON appealed to the gentleman not to move the previous question; and as the gentleman from New York refused to withdraw it, he called for the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and resulted thus—yeas 104, nays 80.

So the House reconsidered, and then negatived the motion to lie on the table.

The question then recurred on the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. EVERETT raised a question of order, and contended that the bill involved a charge upon the treasury.

After some debate, in which Messrs. W. COST JOHNSON, C. JOHNSON, BRIGGS, MOORE, and the SPEAKER participated, it was decided that the bill did involve a charge upon the treasury, and, under the rules of the House, required a vote of two-thirds to discharge the Committee of the Whole from its consideration.

Here the subject dropped.

MEETING AT TEN O'CLOCK.

Mr. GILMER asked leave to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That from and after to-day, the daily hour of the meeting of the House shall be 10 o'clock.

Mr. MALLORY objected to the reception of the resolution.

Mr. GILMER moved a suspension of the rules, in order to get in the resolution.

The motion was voted down without a division.

On motion of Mr. FILLMORE, the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. WINTHROP in the chair.)

Mr. F. expressed a desire to have the navy pension bill taken up; but yielded the floor for the present.

ELECTRO AND ANIMAL MAGNETISM.

On motion of Mr. KENNEDY of Maryland, the committee took up the bill to authorize a series of experiments to be made, in order to test the merits of Morse's electro-magnetic telegraph. The bill appropriates $30,000, to be expended under the direction of the Postmaster General.

On motion of Mr. K., the words "Postmaster General" were stricken out, and "Secretary of the Treasury" inserted.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON wished to have a word to say upon this bill. As the present Congress had done much to encourage science, he did not wish to see the science of Mesmerism neglected and overlooked. He therefore proposed that one-half of the appropriation be given to Mr. Fisk, to enable him to carry on experiments, as well as Professor Morse.

Mr. HOUSTON thought that Millerism should also be included in the benefits of the appropriation.

Mr. STANLY said he should have no objection to the appropriation for Mesmeric experiments, provided the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. CAVE JOHNSON] was the subject. [A laugh.]

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON said he should have no objection, provided the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. STANLY] was the operator. [Great laughter.]

Several gentlemen called for the reading of the amendment; and it was read by the Clerk, as follows:

Provided, That one half of the said sum shall be appropriated for trying Mesmeric experiments, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. S. MASON rose to a question of order. He maintained that the amendment was not bona fide, and that such amendments were calculated to injure the character of the House. He appealed to the Chair to rule the amendment out of order.

The CHAIRMAN said it was not for him to judge of the motives of members in offering amendments; and he could not, therefore, undertake to pronounce the amendment not bona fide. Objections might be raised to it on the ground that it was not sufficiently analogous in character to the bill under consideration; but, in the opinion of the Chair, it would require a scientific analysis to determine how far the magnetism of Mesmerism was analogous to that to be employed in telegraphs. [Laughter.] He therefore ruled the amendment in order.

On taking the vote, the amendment was rejected—ayes 22, noes not counted.

The bill was then laid aside to be reported.

INTERCOURSE WITH CHINA.

Mr. ADAMS moved that the committee take up bill 720, for the establishment of future commercial intercourse with China.

The motion was agreed to—ayes 83, noes 53—and the bill taken up, and read, as follows:

A BILL providing the means of future intercourse between the United States and the Government of China.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the sum of forty thousand dollars be, and the same is hereby, appropriated and placed at the disposal of the President of the United States, to enable him to establish the future commercial relations between the United States and the Chinese empire on terms of national equal reciprocity; the said sum to be accounted for by the President, under the restrictions and in the manner prescribed by the act of first of July, one thousand seven hundred and ninety, entitled "An act providing the means of intercourse between the United States and foreign nations."

Mr. ADAMS moved to amend the bill, by striking out the words "under the restrictions and."

Mr. MERIWETHER opposed the amendment. If he understood its effect, it would be to leave the mission without any restriction. The bill, as it came from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, placed this mission on the same footing as other missions. The Secretary of State, however, wished the whole sum placed at his own disposal and control—wished it left to him to pay as much as he pleased. He (Mr. M.) did not consider this mission to China as a matter of so much importance as had been claimed for it. He thought it would be difficult to persuade the people of that country to change their polity, give up their aversion to foreigners, and enter into commercial intercourse with other nations. He wished, at any rate, to have this mission placed on the same footing as other missions. He knew not how the whole of this sum of $40,000 was to be expended, although he was a member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs. Our ministers generally received $9,000 a year salary, and $9,000 outfit. Now, if the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ADAMS] should be adopted, it would be in the power of the President to pay the minister who might be sent to China $20,000 outfit, and $20,000 more salary. The minister would be subject to no expense, would go out in a national vessel, and would not be compelled to land until it suited his pleasure. Why make a difference in the case of China? Was that mission of greater importance than the French? Look at Turkey—a semi-barbarous country—where our minister received $6,000 a year. He thought if $6,000 was enough for the services of Commodore Porter at Constantinople, that sum would be sufficient for any minister that might be sent out to China. When the amendment now before the committee should have been disposed of, he should move to place the mission to China upon the same footing with that to Turkey.

Mr. J. C. CLARK next obtained the floor, and addressed the committee, during his hour, upon the state of the Whig party and its relations to the present Administration, which he condemned generally.

Mr. BIDLACK rose, and inquired of the Chairman what the question before the committee was; for it was impossible to ascertain from the speech of the gentleman from New York. He made this inquiry for the purpose of reminding the majority that the gentleman was debating the same question which his colleague [Mr. BARNARD] had, the other day, considered out of order. He (Mr. BIDLACK) had no doubt what the decision would be; but his object was gained, by showing how "circumstances altered cases," and how what was out of order when it was unpleasant to certain gentlemen, was perfectly in order when it pleased them, and made in their favor. This kind of remark would call for reply; and, at this late day in the session, no good could grow out of it.

Mr. J. C. CLARK said he hoped the Chairman would tell the gentleman from Pennsylvania; for he never could find it out, unless he was informed.

The CHAIRMAN replied that, in Committee of the Whole, the custom had been to allow great latitude in debate; and he therefore decided that, according to the custom of the House, the remarks of the gentleman from New York were in order.

Mr. J. C. CLARK then resumed, and continued at great length; interrupted occasionally by gentlemen for explanation, and by a message from the Senate, transmitting a bill for the relief of Major General Andrew Jackson.

He took within the range of his remarks many prominent politicians, on whose course he was animadverting when the Chairman announced that his hour had expired. He said, however, that he had much more to say, which he should add to his remarks when he wrote out his speech.

Mr. GORDON addressed the Chair. He commenced by remarking that he did not rise as the apologist and defender of this Administration; for he had nothing to do with bringing it into power in 1840. His colleague [Mr. J. C. CLARK] said he was sorry that it was invested with power. He (Mr. G.) did not doubt, even in 1840, that his colleague, in case of the success of the exertions then made, would be sorry. And why? Because he foresaw that the Whig party would fall to pieces by its own want of any cohesive principle, and that longing after office and the spoils which could not be satiated. The gentleman [Mr. J. C. CLARK] had well described the party to which he belonged; and, unless he had been familiar with the materials of which it was composed, could not have used the figures he did. What were they? The cheese-parings, the candle-ends, the rag-tag-and-bob-tail of all the factions and parties that had ever existed. Such was the assemblage at Harrisburg; and so sensible were they themselves of it, that they did not even dare to talk to each other about any common principle. They therefore suspended the consideration of all such subjects, put the gag in the mouth of their own candidate, and surrounded him with a committee to speak for him, lest any one of the candle-ends should be disturbed! They held no one principle in common with each other. Indeed, the convention at Harrisburg was a fit representation of the party to which the gentleman belonged, and under whose banners he fought in the contest of 1840. His colleague once belonged to the Democratic party, long prior to 1837; but the evil spirit, called ambition, whispered in his ear, and he performed what is termed a somerset.

[Here the CHAIR called to order.]

He was not impugning the motives of his colleague by any means. No; he was only stating facts, [laughter,] and he believed that, according to the decision of the Chair, money bills in Committee of the Whole opened the door for all sorts of debate. [Laughter.] His colleague left the Democratic party. There was no doubt of that. It was for his colleague to explain the motives he had in so doing, when he became the candidate of an irregular party.

Mr. J. C. CLARK wished to ask a question.

Mr. GORDON declined yielding the floor. He wished it to be understood that, when he was addressing the Chair, he desired to occupy the floor exclusively. His colleague was elected to Congress, in the first instance, by the Democratic party.

Mr. CLARK inquired whether he did not go in a minority of ten hundred, and work up?

Mr. GORDON said, so much the worse; for it showed that the gentleman broke down the party whose cause he espoused. The party had great trouble and tribulation on his account—all owing to the great confidence which was reposed in him, and which enabled him to deceive so many faithful followers. These honest Democrats followed him for a short time; but they soon quit him, and returned to their first love, whither every other Democrat would, if God should only spare his life to take a "sober second thought."—[Laughter.] His colleague got back to the Democratic party. He entered it under the Jackson banner, which he was among the first to unfurl. Yes, his colleague triumphed with that hero and statesman—his constituents having pardoned him of former transgressions, in consideration of his years, and of the natural proneness of youth to indiscretion! He served with the Democratic party in Congress until 1837, when, after he came to Washington, he joined the Conservative clique; and, from that day forward, battled against the Democratic party. Not joining the Federalists immediately, he stopped at the Conservative half-way house, and there refreshed himself, until that resting-place was razed to the ground, when he went smack over to the embraces of the Federal party. There he now is! There he (Mr. G.) trusted he would ever remain! There he must remain, if he depended upon the Democracy of old Chenango to rescue him! He (Mr. G.) did not impeach his colleague's motives; he only stated facts, which his colleague might explain if he thought proper. In his speech to-day, he had sneered at the Democratic party, by calling one of their Governors the hero of clam-bakes, and by denouncing the party with whom he once acted as Locofocos and disorganizers. It had been well remarked, that the devil could preach a good sermon. Now he (Mr. G.) thought his colleague was not a fit person to read a lecture to this Administration on the subject of apostacy, and to deal out denunciations right and left upon it, and upon the Democratic party! Such lectures came with bad grace from such an author!

Now, what was the principal ground of the gentleman's complaint, and the source of all his grief in mourning over his fallen party? Was it that he mourned the sacrifice of any principle which bound his party together? Not at all: the gentleman did not once allude to the principles of his party. It was the loss of the spoils—the loss of power and patronage and place that the gentleman lamented; and that was the loss of all for which his party were contending. The gentleman talked about the love of office, and the treachery of men in high places; but he said nothing about the principles of his party, nor did he utter one regret for the failure of their measures. He (Mr. G.) was about to retire from public life; but he felt now as great an interest in the success of his party, and the triumph of their principles, as he would feel if he were to continue in Congress. He was not surprised at the gentleman's silence with regard to the principles of his party; for, from what he could observe, there was now no more of principle to govern that party than there was in 1840. What had they seen as the fruits of all the labors of that party, now existing nowhere, as the gentleman was forced to admit? The quarrel between the gentleman and the administration he considered but as a family quarrel. They were now disunited, but would be soon united again, as they had the same objects to pursue. They both wanted to establish a paper currency for this great nation. What was it that disunited them? Some of them went for an exchequer, some for a bank of the United States, and some of them were for bolstering up the paper of the State banks by the aid of the credit of the Federal Government. They all sought to renovate that same system of paper currency, under the evils of which the country was now suffering. Now, he took it, that it would be in order to glance at some of the schemes of this party, and, among the rest, the two hundred million scheme of the gentleman from Maryland. What was that scheme? It was, that the Government should issue two hundred millions of bonds, at an interest of 3 per cent., based upon the pretended sale of the Government lands; in other words, two hundred millions of Government paper to be put afloat, without any adequate security for its redemption. What was the proposition of another gentleman of the same side of the House? Why, that the Government should carry on the business of private banking on private account, and, at the same time, give currency to depreciated bank paper. But he would return back to this two hundred million scheme; for he feared that all this longing after paper money was to end in it.

The CHAIR here called the gentleman from New York to order for irrelevancy.

Mr. SMITH of Virginia hoped the gentleman might be permitted to proceed without interruption, as the other gentleman from New York had been permitted to speak on the same subject.

The CHAIR made some observations not distinctly heard.

Mr. GORDON said that he would proceed in order. He took the ground, that this party was not to be intrusted with money, because of the extravagant and impolitic projects they were forcing on the House. He wished to know, before he intrusted this Administration and this party with money—(for he took it that this bill had emanated from the majority)—before he intrusted them with money, he wished to inquire into their system and policy of government which, he presumed, would be as much in order as to debate the Faneuil Hall speech of Mr. Webster. He wished to know if it was not as much in order to allude to the finances of this Government, as to what the gentleman had been pleased to term the treachery of his political friends. He wished to know whether the position taken by a majority of that party, that it was competent for the Government to issue this $200,000,000 of bonds to be given to the States; and he wished also to inquire, what relief it would be to the people. As the prospect of relief from this quarter was too remote, he was willing to pass it over, and inquire what relief this exchequer was likely to afford.

The CHAIR here interrupted Mr. G., and said that the topics he was discussing were irrelevant to the question before the House, and therefore out of order.

Mr. R. D. DAVIS said he understood his colleague as alluding to these subjects incidentally, as illustrative of his argument.

Mr. WELLER said that the gentleman from New York [Mr. J. C. CLARK] had been allowed to allude to these subjects, and the Chair decided that he was in order. The gentleman now on the floor, therefore, had a right to discuss the same subjects in reply.

The CHAIR made some reply not heard; when Mr. WELLER appealed from his decision.

Mr. GORDON hoped the gentleman from Ohio would withdraw the appeal, as the decision of it would take largely from the time allotted him. [Mr. WELLER accordingly withdrew the appeal.] He would be able to bring himself out, in order. The gentleman gave a glowing description of the temple of the Whig party, with columns, and colonnades, and its lofty dome; and complained that the man behind the throne, at the other end of the avenue, had exercised his great strength in tearing down that mighty edifice. Why, it would not take a Samson to tear down a log cabin; for even the boys of this very city had made it their pastime to pull down those very few models of Whig architecture that were found here. What were the columns and colonnades of this mighty edifice, constructed and adorned, according to the glowing description of the gentleman? Why, he believed the sign out of doors, whether the latch-string was pulled in or not, was a cider-barrel and a coon-skin; while the edifice itself was built of rough logs, with the chinks between them stopped up with mud. It was a temple of night revelry and debauch, where its votaries drank hard cider, and got themselves fuddled. But if this mighty man at the end of the avenue, aided by the boys of the city, tore down such a temple, he did more good than harm by the act, and should be applauded for it. It was, to be sure, a small business for such a mighty man to be engaged in; though it must be admitted that he did a better deed when he tore down the building, than when he assisted in raising it. He believed that it was at Faneuil Hall, and in the celebrated speech made there, that this two hundred million project was first broached. Now, he should like to know whether that project originated in this country or in England; and whether it originated before, or after, the visit of this mighty man to that country; or before, or after, he got the thousand pounds for his opinion on the subject of State credit.

If this project of the British fundholders was to succeed, the Republic would be crushed. Adopt this scheme, and the Government would be destroyed, for two reasons: First, there would be a consolidation of all the power of the States in the Federal Government. Congress would have taken upon itself to discharge all the obligations created by the profligacy of the States, without the power to restrain their extravagance. This would be consolidation in its fullest sense, and would break up our present form of government; for the States would, in time, come to their senses, and would shake off the odious burden imposed on them, by repudiation or nullification. He took it upon himself to declare, that if his State (New York) was to be saddled with the debts of the other States, he would sooner go for repudiation or nullification. He would sooner repudiate than entail on his people debts created by the profligacy or extravagance of others. The best way to preserve the credit of the States, would be to preserve inviolate the faith of the Federal Government. He should like to know how the people were to be benefited by the assumption of the State debts.

Whether war with England would be a blessing or a curse he would not undertake to say. He did not know but it would be a blessing; for it might arouse a spirit of patriotism, and enkindle the best feelings of the hearts of the money-making people, who were not unwilling to ask even a desecration of the Constitution itself, if thereby they could make money. But even if a war with England would be a blessing, the people of this country would do no improper act to promote it; if, however, England should espouse the cause of the Rothschilds and the foreign bankers—of the Nicholas Biddles and the brokers—and with them should make common cause, and wage war on our country and our Constitution, Heaven knew he should wish the trial to come at once, that the strength of our Constitution and the bravery of our people might be tested. He had said the people of this country owed an everlasting debt of gratitude to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ADAMS] for putting the matter on the basis on which he had placed it; but what was the tendency of his argument? Why, that this Government must necessarily assume the State debts, for it was shown that a State might go on ad libitum, contracting what debts she pleased, giving her bonds to foreigners for the amount, and then this Government must be dragged into the payment of her obligations; for a single State had in this way the power to involve this Union in a war with a foreign power, notwithstanding the power to declare war was, by the Constitution, placed, not with the Government of a State, but with the Federal Government. He would not discuss the validity of Mississippi bonds, for that subject had been sufficiently discussed on this floor. He cared not whether they were valid or not, so far as the argument there was concerned; but the idea that a State might contract what debts she pleased, and that this Government must pay them, or assume her indebtedness, was putting this country in the power and at the mercy of a single State. Why, he would prefer consolidation to such a state of things—he would prefer that the State lines should be blotted out—that the whole people of this Union, if they were to be compelled to assume the responsibility of repayment, should at least have a voice in the contracting of these debts. He asked the House what control the State of New York, which he in part represented, had either here or at home, in her State Legislature, or by her press, or her public meetings—or, indeed, in any form—over the contracting of the debts of the States of Indiana, of Mississippi, or of Pennsylvania. Those States contracted their debts without consultation with New York; she was not permitted to say a word on the subject; and yet the modern doctrine which they heard there was, that the pockets of the people of that State were to be reached for the repayment and liquidation of those debts. Now, he would appeal to the chairman of this committee [Mr. WINTHROP] as a patriot, as a statesman, and as a high-minded man from Massachusetts, who had studied the fathers of the Constitution, whether this wild scheme was ever dreamed of by those revered framers of the charter of our liberties; and whether, in the whole range of their deliberations, there was the least perceptible leaning to such an enormous power which now found advocates in the venerable gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ADAMS,] and the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. W. C. JOHNSON,] and some others.

But perhaps he had said as much on the Faneuil Hall speech and its tendencies, as the occasion would justify; and he would turn for a moment to the exchequer, which was but another emanation of the same brain—the brain of one who had said that, if he understood anything, it was the subject of finance; and that the bill of the gentleman from Massachusetts was not worth the parchment on which it was written, compared with the mighty scheme of consolidation which he had prepared. And what did the scheme of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. CUSHING,] propose? Why, in the first place, that private individuals might deposite $10,000,000 in the treasury of such exchequer of the United States, thereby withdrawing $10,000,000 of specie, gold and silver, from the currency of the country, and receiving, in return, ten millions of certificates, which would become its circulation. But further, it provided that the Government creditors—the holders of its bonds and obligations or treasury notes—might receive certificates for the amount of the debts due to them by the United States, to a like amount of $10,000,000; thus making the issue of certificates equal to $20,000,000 if this latter provision be observed, being but a modification of the former one; a receiving of the debt due to the public creditor, and a returning of it to the treasury, and receiving, as in the case of a private depositor, certificates for the sum deposited. Thus, then, they had $20,000,000 of specie drawn from the circulation of the country, and paper certificates substituted. And yet even this was not all; for the mints had an unlimited power to receive foreign coin, and to issue certificates for the coin so received. But further still; the exchequer board was to be authorized to sell bills of exchange, also to an unlimited amount, at a premium of not exceeding 2 per cent. And for what purpose, he would ask, was all this to be done? It was certainly not to add to the circulation of the country; for every dollar of the great amounts he had enumerated was taken from the circulating medium, for which the paper certificates were to be substituted. They were thus to take the gold and silver from circulation, and supply the place of it with paper, that this Government might become the depository of the funds of individuals to the amount of millions, for which this Government would become responsible.

Here the honorable gentleman's hour expired, and he was suddenly brought to a full stop.

Mr. J. C. CLARK obtained permission to make some explanations of a personal nature, which he deemed called for by the remarks of his colleague, [Mr. GORDON.]

Mr. EVERETT then moved that the committee rise, and the motion was agreed to; and the committee rose accordingly.

The SPEAKER having taken the chair,

Mr. FILLMORE desired permission to say that they had yet five appropriation bills which must be passed, as they were indispensable to allow the Government to go on, viz: the navy pension bill; the Indian treaty bill: the fortification bill; the harbor and river bill; and the civil and diplomatic bill for the fiscal year. These must, necessarily, all be acted upon; and they had but nine days of the session left. He felt, therefore, bound to press forward such bills as were before the House; and, at the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ADAMS,] who had the bill under consideration in charge, he now submitted a resolution to terminate debate in Committee of the Whole upon it, after it should have been further discussed half an hour; and on this resolution he moved the previous question.

The previous question was sustained by the House; and the resolution was adopted.

The bill which the committee had amended—whose purpose was to test the electro-magnetic telegraph—was taken up for disposal; but, at the request of Mr. WINTHROP, was passed over to a future day.

The House then again resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, and resumed the consideration of the bill, which occupied its deliberations when the committee last rose, (Mr. WINTHROP in the chair.)

Mr. EVERETT was understood to advocate the postponement of legislation on this subject, until it could be ascertained what the policy of China would be with respect to the diplomatic agents of foreign powers.

Mr. ADAMS said he did not think it necessary to waste the time of the House in arguing the propriety of a mission to China. The message of the President was sufficient on that point.

He then replied to the objections urged against the bill, on the ground that it placed too much confidence in the President, and that the appropriation was to be made without restriction. The motion which he had submitted, to strike out the restrictions of law, which were applicable to other diplomatic appropriations, was made after a consultation with the Secretary of State, who thought that to impose restrictions might embarrass the progress of the negotiations.

Mr. HOLMES said he was one of those on the Committee of Foreign Relations who had voted to introduce this bill. In the present state of the commerce of the world, he regarded the proposed mission to China as more important than were all our other missions together. The trade of South America and Europe was fixed on an established basis. But, by the opening of intercourse with China, three hundred and twenty millions of people (hitherto shut out from the rest of the world) would be brought within the circle of commercial republics—for it was commerce that republicanized and civilized men. When England was advancing in this matter, and preparing to take to herself the exclusive benefits of the new state of things in China—was it, he asked, wise for us to stand still until that nation should have arranged the treaties between herself and China, so as to exclude the United States from all advantages whatever? He referred to the efforts now making in France to induce the French Government to move in this matter, and to secure a commercial alliance ere England should have grasped the whole fruit to herself. Should this Congress refuse to make any exertion to obtain the benefit of this intercourse with China, merely for the sake of $40,000, and the fear of trusting to Executive discretion? He referred to the case of the Imaum of Muscat, where we were compelled to act differently from our usual course. It was not our policy to receive presents from foreign Governments; yet, in that case, Congress got around the Constitution, because it would not have answered to send the Imaum his presents back, and said to him that it was contrary to our Constitution. Instead of distributing his rich perfumes—the odor of which was unequalled in sweetness—the five vases were sent to the Patent Office, and there deposited.

The benefits of a commercial intercourse with China could not be too highly appreciated. No man now had it in his power to estimate how much of our surplus productions might be sold in that almost boundless country, and how much of our tobacco might be there chewed, in place of opium. Let not gentlemen continue to talk about $40,000 and Executive discretion. He believed the present Executive was as discreet as Presidents generally. He believed that Mr. Webster, in his Faneuil Hall speech, did more good for his country than did any other speech he had ever made. Mr. Webster, in that speech, showed the Whig party that he did not mean to have his mighty mind confined to the narrow views and principles on which they acted.

Mr. McKEON said there was nothing so very peculiar in the case of China, that Congress should depart from the usual restrictions of law, which applied to diplomatic appropriations generally. He thought it would be better to take the matter quietly, and go about it in a quiet business manner. Should the bill pass as reported by the committee, it would authorize a minister at a salary of $9,000 and $9,000 outfit. Pass it according to the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ADAMS,] and $40,000 would thereby be placed at the disposal of the Executive—more than he (Mr. McK.) was willing to see placed in the hands of any President. He should be as liberal as any man in fixing the salaries of the minister and secretary. But the appropriation was only a beginning. The largest ship in this country (the Pennsylvania) would no doubt be selected to carry out whomsoever should be selected, as minister in order to give as much eclat as possible to our country. Then other vessels would have to be sent to accompany this ship, and to sail where her size would not allow her to go. These, and other paraphernalia, would have to be provided for the minister; and this $40,000 would be but a beginning of the expense. He concluded by expressing the hope that the motion to strike out the restrictions contained in the bill, and thereby place the whole appropriation at the disposal of the President, would not prevail.

Mr. BRONSON expressed it as his conviction that we should possess further information before such a measure as that of sending a minister plenipotentiary to China was adopted. He should prefer having a commercial agent for the present.

The question was taken upon concurring in the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ADAMS,] above stated, and decided in the affirmative—ayes 80, noes 55.

Mr. BRONSON moved to strike out all after the enacting clause, and insert a section appropriating $10,000 for a commercial agent to proceed to China, and obtain information in relation to that country which might be useful to the United States.

Mr. HOLMES said he would as soon have a Chinese juggler.

The amendment was rejected—ayes 57, noes 75.

Mr. MERIWETHER offered an amendment, the effect of which was to place the mission to China on the same footing as that to Turkey, and to limit the salary of the minister to $6,000 per annum. The amendment was rejected.

On motion by Mr. FILLMORE, the committee rose and reported the bill to the House; after which,

Mr. ADAMS having called for the previous question, it was seconded, and the main question ordered.

Mr. ARNOLD then moved that the House adjourn: rejected, without a division.

The question was taken on the engrossment of the bill, under the operation of the previous question, and decided in the affirmative without a division.

Mr. ADAMS called for the previous question on the passage of the bill; which was seconded by the House, and the main question ordered; and the main question being taken on the passage of the bill, it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 96, nays 59.

Mr. ADAMS moved a reconsideration of the vote just taken; which motion, under the operation of the previous question, was rejected.

Mr. C. H. WILLIAMS appealed to the House to go into Committee of the Whole, to consider a bill [title not heard] of some interest to the people of his State.

Mr. MERIWETHER moved that the House adjourn; which motion was carried, and

The House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, February 22, 1843.

The PRESIDENT pro tem. presented to the Senate a petition from Ellen Dix, widow of a deceased surgeon, praying a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. CRITTENDEN presented a memorial from certain persons engaged in the manufacture of fur hats at Louisville, praying that foreign hatters' furs may be admitted free of duty: referred to the Committee on Manufactures.

Mr. EVANS, from the Committee on Finance, made a report (which was ordered to be printed) adverse to the passage of House bill for the relief of Rebecca Guest.

On motion of Mr. EVANS, the same committee was discharged from the further consideration of the petition of the Western Railroad Company of Massachusetts, praying remission of duties on certain railroad iron—the committee conceiving that the object of the petition was provided for in the general bill reported upon the subject.

On motion by Mr. EVANS, the same committee was discharged from the further consideration of the memorial from citizens of Pennsylvania, praying an increase of drawback on domestic spirits manufactured from foreign molasses.

Also, reported back from the same committee, without amendment, the joint resolution from the House for the continuing of an additional clerk in the Second Auditor's Office.

Mr. ARCHER, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, reported back, without amendment, and with a recommendation that it be rejected, the bill from the House for the relief of Seth Sweetser.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE remarked, that a few days ago a joint resolution was reported from the Committee on the Library, for the publication of the debates and proceedings of Congress. The same committee had, since the resolution was reported, considered it proper, necessary, and expedient that the resolution should be accompanied by a report, explaining the grounds on which the matter rested, and showing the propriety of the publication. The committee were anxious that the resolution should receive the definitive action of Congress at this session; but should it not, unfortunately, be reached, owing to the accumulation of other business, the grounds upon which the committee acted would be known hereafter. He then made the report; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. WALKER, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the bill from the House to refund to Charles Holt a fine imposed on him under the sedition law, reported the same back, without amendment, and with a recommendation that it be passed.

Mr. PHELPS, from the Committee on Pensions, to which had been referred House bill for the relief of Samuel Edgcombe, reported the same back, without amendment, accompanied by a special report recommending its indefinite postponement; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. PHELPS, from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, to which had been referred House bill for the relief of the legal representatives of William T. Smith, reported the same back, without amendment, and with a recommendation that it do not pass.

Mr. P., also from the same committee, to which was referred the bill from the House for the relief of the legal representatives of Joseph W. Newcombe, reported the same back, without amendment, and with a recommendation that it do not pass.

Mr. BENTON presented a petition from citizens of Manchester, St. Louis county, Missouri, praying the rights of pre-emption to certain town lots in that place; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Also, presented a petition from a number of citizens of Cape Girardeau, on the Mississippi river, praying that that place may be made a port of entry; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

ASSUMPTION OF STATE DEBTS.

The resolutions introduced by Mr. WALKER on Monday last, were taken up and read, as follows:

Resolved, That the assumption of the debts of the States, contracted by them separately, and for local purposes, would be a palpable violation of the Constitution of the United States, a consolidation of all power in the Federal Government, and a final and total overthrow of the safety of the States.

Resolved, That Congress having no power to assume such debts, any act attempting such assumption would be utterly null and void; that it would not be obligatory upon the States, nor could the people of the States be lawfully required by Congress to pay the debt so assumed; nor could any taxes imposed by them for such purposes be collected; and it would be the duty of a succeeding Congress to restore the supremacy of the Constitution, by the entire repeal of the act of assumption.

Mr. WALKER remarked that he did not intend to address the Senate on the subject of the resolutions. He would not consume a moment of its time; but if it met the views of Senators on both sides to permit a direct vote to be taken on them, he would content himself by simply asking for the yeas and nays on their adoption.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. WALKER reiterated the suggestion, that if the Senate would consent to take a direct vote on the resolutions, he would waive all right to discuss them; but if it was the intention of any Senator, so soon as he (Mr. W.) might take his seat, to rise, with a view to evade a direct vote, and get clear of them by a side vote, or move to lay the resolutions on the table, he would persist in his right to go on and discuss them then.

Mr. MOREHEAD rose for the purpose of suggesting to the Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. WALKER,] that the Senate was then very thin—too much so to undertake to decide a great constitutional question. It was certainly desirable to have a full vote. He rose, then, not with any view of discussing the principles of the resolutions, but for the purpose of suggesting to the Senator, for the reasons urged above, to permit the resolutions to lie on the table till to-morrow, at which time they could be taken up. In the mean time, they could be printed. He (Mr. M.) felt some solicitude to deliver his views on the resolutions, in very brief terms. He was not then prepared to do so. He hoped, therefore, the Senator would let the resolutions lie on the table till to-morrow.

Mr. BAYARD said he designed to move an amendment to the resolution, which the Senator from Mississippi would probably accept as a modification of his. He proposed to strike out all after the word "resolved," with the view to insert the following:

That the Congress of the United States has no constitutional power to assume debts contracted by any one or more of the States, unless for some end or purpose involving the common defence and general welfare of the United States.

Resolved, That it is inexpedient to assume the debts of the States, which have been contracted for mere State purposes.

Mr. WALKER said he could not consent to accept these resolutions as a substitute for his. They declare only that it is inexpedient to assume those debts; while the object of his resolution was to assert the great principle that Congress had no power to repeal the Constitution; and that, if it undertook by law to assume the debts of the States, such act of assumption, so far as it had any effect at all, would be to attempt to repeal the Constitution; and, as such, would be useless and void, and could never be carried into effect. That was the great principle which he wished to assert by his resolutions, in order to put an end to the hope which might be entertained in this country, that Congress would ever, or could ever, assume those debts. And to put an end to the insolent overtures which have been made, and the efforts which were now being made, by the British stockholders, to procure a guaranty of those debts by the Federal Government, he wished to announce to them, that, if they accomplished any temporary success at one session of Congress, it would be of no effect. As to this question of general welfare, as set forth in the substitute, it was a question about which the Democratic and Federal party had been contending ever since the organization of the Government. Under the general-welfare clause of the Constitution, the Federal party had always sought a justification for whatever outrageous measure they wished to foist upon the country. They will continue to do it.

Mr. BAYARD, after having stated his understanding of the difference between the old Federal and Democratic parties about the clause of the Constitution alluded to, said the words used, in the substitute he proposed, were the very words of the Constitution; and, unless the Senator from Mississippi intended to be more constitutional than the Constitution, he could have no objection to the wording of the resolution. This was simply a resolution declaring that Congress had no right to assume the debts of the States, except it be on the grounds on which the debts of the Revolution were assumed—debts which were contracted by the States for the purposes of national defence.

Mr. WALKER said he would agree that the resolutions should be passed over informally, if Senators would agree that they should come up to-morrow, at one o'clock.

The CHAIR remarked that, if they were passed over informally, they would come up during the morning hour, and could not come up at one o'clock.

Mr. WALKER continued. He deemed these resolutions of the utmost importance; for he believed, if a large vote was had in favor of them, it would terminate the controversy about the assumption of those debts; a controversy upon a subject which was fraught with more direful consequences to the Government, than any subject ever acted upon by Congress. He believed, if the resolutions met the sanction of the Senate, the conflict waged by the foreign bond-holders to force an assumption would be abandoned. Therefore, he would say to Senators on the other side, (the Whig side,) that if they would consent to let a vote be taken on the resolutions to-morrow, he would agree to let them be passed by informally.

Mr. BARROW was understood to say that these resolutions could not be adopted without discussion; for the doctrines of nullification embraced in them would have to be discussed.

Mr. WALKER would be glad if the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BARROW] would show whether the doctrines of these resolutions had any resemblance to the doctrines of nullification, as asserted by South Carolina. He (Mr. W.) asserted that it was within the power of Congress to repeal, at any time, an act which it believed to be unconstitutional; but he believed that the doctrine of nullification, as asserted in South Carolina, was, that a single State could annul a law of Congress. He wished that Senator to point out whether such a doctrine was asserted in these resolutions. No; no such power was asserted: but they merely asserted, in effect, that a subsequent Congress had the power to repeal an unconstitutional act of a preceding Congress. They assert, secondly, that an act to assume the State debts would be null and void, and could not be carried into effect; and, thirdly, that, if such an act were passed, it would be the sacred duty of Congress to restore the Constitution by its repeal. These were the principles, and the only principles, in the resolutions. He again asserted, that, if the Senate would agree to take a vote on them to-morrow, at 12 o'clock, he would consent to a postponement.

Mr. ARCHER made some remarks, with a view to show, that if it had not been for the interference of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WALKER] the other day, by moving these identical resolutions, as an amendment to the resolutions introduced by the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. McDUFFIE,] an expression of the opinion of the Senate could have been had on this subject. Senators belonging to the Whig side were willing to vote on the question as presented in the resolutions of the Senator from South Carolina; and, to accomplish that end, he had suggested to the Senator from South Carolina to withdraw his acceptance of the modification for his resolutions, proposed by the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. WALKER replied that his resolutions could not have embarrassed the Senators on the other side, because the Senator from South Carolina did withdraw his acceptance, and he (Mr. W.) actually withdrew his resolutions.

Some further remarks touching the subject of the withdrawal by Mr. WALKER of his resolutions took place between Messrs. ARCHER, WALKER, MERRICK, and the CHAIR; which was terminated by a general acquiescence that the resolutions alluded to formed no bar to a direct vote on the resolutions of the Senator from South Carolina on this subject.

Mr. WALKER said, as it was now admitted that his resolutions, as introduced the other day, did not obstruct the wishes of the Whig party to give a direct vote on the resolutions of the Senator from South Carolina—they not being before the Senate when the vote was taken—he must be permitted to say that it was the vote of the Senator from Virginia [Mr. ARCHER] himself that obstructed the wishes of the Whig party; because, after his (Mr. W.'s) resolutions were withdrawn, and the question was put on the postponement of the resolutions of the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. McDUFFIE,] it was by the casting vote of the honorable Senator from Virginia [Mr. ARCHER] that these resolutions were postponed till December next. The journals would show that it was by the vote of that honorable Senator that an expression of opinion of the Senate on these resolutions was prevented; for, if he had voted against the postponement, a direct vote could have been had.

Mr. ARCHER made some reply not distinctly understood, with a view to maintain that the Senators on the Whig side were willing, as he had been, to express their opinion on the subject in the form in which it was presented by the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. McDUFFIE.]

Mr. TALLMADGE said he did not think they had any more time to spend on these resolutions at this late period of the session; he, therefore, with a view to end the whole matter, moved to lay the resolutions on the table.

Mr. WALKER remarked that, inasmuch as it was asserted by the Senator from New York that he made the motion with the view to put an end to the matter, he (Mr. W.) had a right to consider it a test vote, and therefore asked for the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

The question, then, being put on the motion to lay on the table, it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 25, nays 18, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Archer, Barrow, Bates, Bayard, Berrien, Choate, Clayton, Conrad, Crafts, Crittenden, Dayton, Evans, Graham, Henderson, Huntington, Kerr, Mangum, Merrick, Miller, Morehead, Phelps, Smith of Indiana, Sprague, Tallmadge, and Woodbridge—25.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Bagby, Benton, Buchanan, Calhoun, Cuthbert, Fulton, King, Linn, McRoberts, Smith of Connecticut, Sturgeon, Tappan, Walker, Williams, Woodbury, Wright, and Young—18.

The following resolution, introduced by Mr. BENTON on yesterday, was taken up for consideration, viz:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be directed to include the permanent appropriations in the list of current appropriations made each session, now directed to be published by law.

Messrs. BENTON and WOODBURY made a few remarks, showing that, as the Secretary of the Senate was now authorized to make out his report for publication, it was almost impossible for the public, or even Senators, without much investigation, to know what was the actual amount of appropriations annually made.

Mr. EVANS maintained that the Secretary of the Senate could not comply with the terms of the resolution. He was required by it to include in his report of current appropriations all permanent appropriations. He could not do it, because many appropriations were made, not specific in their character, but dependent entirely upon the action of the heads of departments. The only thing that the Secretary of the Senate could do, would be to append to his report the conjectural estimates of the Secretary of the Treasury in the cases alluded to. Mr. E., therefore, moved to strike out all after the word "resolved," and substitute the following:

That the Secretary of the Senate be directed to append to the publication of current appropriations now required by law, the amount of standing appropriations reported by the Secretary of the Treasury to Congress at the commencement of each session.

Mr. BENTON accepted the substitute, and it was then adopted.

Mr. YOUNG made a motion for the postponement of the business of the morning hour, for the purpose of proceeding to the consideration of the bill to repeal the bankrupt law.

Messrs. EVANS and GRAHAM assured the Senator from Illinois that they did not wish to retard or postpone action on that bill; but suggested to him the propriety of gentlemen first disposing of the unfinished business of yesterday—being the naval appropriation bill; after which, the bankrupt bill could be taken up without opposition.

Mr. YOUNG withdrew his motion, with the understanding that the bankrupt bill would come up so soon as the naval bill was disposed of.

Mr. EVANS then moved that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the naval appropriation bill.

Mr. BATES said that there had been barely an impression made on the calendar of private claims. He suggested that the morning hour should not be wasted in idle debate, but that they should devote the remainder of the morning hour to the private calendar.

The question was then taken on the motion to resume the consideration of the naval appropriation bill, and decided in the affirmative.

NAVY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The unfinished business was then proceeded with—being the further consideration of the navy appropriation bill, as in committee of the whole; the question pending being on the amendment proposed by Mr. EVANS to the amendment submitted by Mr. WILLIAMS, in relation to the sum of $100,000 authorized by the navy appropriation bill of last session, to be expended on the dry-dock at Brooklyn, New York; in which a discretionary power was given to the Secretary of the Navy to apply that sum, or part of it, to the construction of a floating dry-dock.

The amendment of Mr. WILLIAMS was, in substance, to authorize, by reappropriation, the Secretary of the Navy to expend the $100,000 alluded to, with outstanding balances of former appropriations, on the construction of a floating dry-dock at New York, in conformity with the plan approved of by the commissioners appointed by him to investigate the subject last fall; to which Mr. EVANS moved an amendment, that the expenditure should be upon such plan as, upon a re-examination of the subject, may be approved by the Secretary of the Navy, provided that such floating dry-dock—of sufficient capacity to raise a ship of the line, if one of that size be deemed expedient by the Secretary—shall be contracted to be built by persons of sufficient responsibility, for a sum not exceeding $200,000; and one of a sufficient capacity to raise a frigate of the first class—if one of that size be deemed sufficient for the service of the navy—shall be contracted to be built for the service, not exceeding the sum of $125,000; and whenever it may be contracted for and agreed upon, the sum agreed to be paid therefor shall not be paid until the dock is satisfactorily tested by the Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. WILLIAMS explained, at some length, the reasons which had induced him to believe that the plan approved of by the commissioners should be adhered to.

Mr. EVANS contended that there was a great diversity of opinion with regard to the preference that should be given either to that plan, or the plan of the sectional floating dock. His own mind was made up, from the mass of evidence before him, that the weight of testimony was in favor of the latter. It was, therefore, with a view of enabling the Secretary of the Navy to reconsider the whole subject, and to take into view the contingency that it might be desirable to contract for one capable of raising a ship of the line, that he had shaped his amendment, and specified the limitation of cost.

Mr. WILLIAMS maintained that the commissioners were competent judges, and had given the subject a thorough examination. The result of their mature deliberation was the recommendation they had made. He therefore gave it the preference.

Mr. BAYARD observed that, not only on that point, but as to the necessity of a floating dock at all, there was a difference of opinion among the members of the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. HENDERSON explained that his intention (as expressed yesterday) was, in case any appropriation should be made for the dry-dock at Brooklyn, to ask for a similar appropriation for Pensacola. Now, if, according to the amendment of the Senator from Maine, [Mr. EVANS,] a quarter of a million of dollars were to be expended on a floating dry-dock at New York for ships-of-war of the largest class—which, being few, might be accommodated more advantageously in the stone-wall docks already constructed—he asked, would it not be better to make two floating dry-docks, each capable of raising a frigate—one of which might be placed at New York, and the other at Pensacola—each costing only $100,000?

Mr. PHELPS preferred leaving the subject just as it was left by the appropriation bill of the last session—at the discretion of the Secretary of the Navy to apply the money then authorized either to the dry-dock at Brooklyn, or a floating dock, as most needed by the service.

Mr. BAYARD said this subject had been constantly and urgently pressed upon members of Congress. They had been importuned without mercy by those who were interested in the matter. For himself, he had been importuned almost to death. The subject had been pressed upon him, upon Congress, and upon the country, in every variety of shape. The press had teemed with it, and had been probably paid for its exertions.

At the last session of Congress, $100,000 had been appropriated for the erection of a permanent dry dock at Brooklyn; and a clause was inserted, that if the Secretary of the Navy, after making the necessary examination, should decide such a dock to be preferable in every point of view, he might apply the money to the construction of a floating dock. The Secretary appointed a board of commissioners, consisting of three competent gentlemen, to make the necessary examination. This commission did not report in favor of a floating dock, except as auxiliary to a permanent stone dock. It reported that a floating dock could not supersede a permanent dock; and, under certain circumstances, no floating dock would be necessary at all. He read from the report of the commissioners the opinion, that a permanent dry-dock at Brooklyn would be sufficient for the repairs of all ships coming into New York harbor. Only in cases of sudden emergency would a floating dock be necessary. But at Pensacola, it was thought, a floating dock, sufficient to raise a sloop-of-war, might be both convenient and necessary. It would enable our vessels in the Gulf to remain there to protect our commerce, longer than they now do; as they have to leave very often for the dry-docks at Charleston and Gosport, to undergo the slightest repairs.

The report of these commissioners had been seized upon by the friends of a floating dock, as conclusive that such alone was the proper one to be erected. But the report itself arrived at no such conclusion. A floating dock for repairs, as was the case with the Vincennes, might be found very convenient; but it could not, and would not, answer for rebuilding. This was the conclusion of the commissioners, endorsed by the Secretary of the Navy. All the Secretary asked for was an appropriation to erect a floating dock to be stationed at Pensacola, and to institute further inquiry and examination as to the relative merits of the dry and the floating docks in question.

He thought the Government, under the existing state of its finances, ought to employ the floating docks already erected for the benefit of commerce, and pay them as the owners of merchant ship do—by the ton. The Vincennes, one of our Government ships of twenty guns, had been repaired in one of these docks, and others might be; why, then, go to the expense of erecting a floating dock at Brooklyn at this time? He read several passages from the report of the Secretary of the Navy, to show that he asked only for an appropriation, at present, to erect the proposed floating dock at Pensacola, and to make further inquiry as to the merits of the two systems, now agitated, of constructing these docks.

The debate on this point was continued by Messrs. GRAHAM, CALHOUN, BAYARD, MILLER, CHOATE, WOODBURY, CONRAD, EVANS, HENDERSON, and CUTHBERT; and the yeas and nays being demanded by Mr. EVANS on his amendment, they were ordered; and it was rejected—yeas 10, nays 26.

Mr. GRAHAM now submitted the following amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Maine, [Mr. WILLIAMS:]

To substitute for it: "That the Secretary of the Navy be directed not to apply or expend any part of the appropriation of $100,000 mentioned in the ninth clause of an act of Congress, approved on the 4th day of August, 1842, 'making appropriations for the naval service;' nor the unexpended balances of former appropriations mentioned in said act, for the construction of a floating dock at Brooklyn, or in the harbor of New York; and this shall not be understood as reviving or conferring any authority thereby to proceed with the construction of a dry dock in said harbor, the making of which was provisionally suspended by the said ninth clause of the said act; but the said sum of $100,000 appropriated, as above mentioned, shall be applicable to the construction of a floating dock at Pensacola, of the capacity for the repair of frigates of the smaller class, and upon such plan as the Secretary of the Navy shall approve."

A long discussion ensued on this amendment, in the course of which it was maintained by Messrs. WALKER, CALHOUN, ALLEN, and WOODBURY, that if an experiment was to be tried either between two plans of a floating dock, or between a floating dock and a stone-wall dock, with a view of testing whether the floating dock would supersede the necessity for a stone-wall dock, the experiment ought to be tried at New York. Mr. BAYARD contending that no experiment was to be made, as the capability of a floating dock for repairs had been already satisfactorily tested, and its incapacity for building ships decided.

Mr. GRAHAM's amendment was sustained by himself and Mr. CONRAD.

The question was then taken on this amendment to the amendment, and decided in the affirmative—yeas 22, nays 17.

The amendment as amended was adopted.

The bill was then reported back to the Senate, and the several amendments made in committee of the whole, with the exception of that relating to $50,000 to the medical bureau for paying off arrearages, and the last amendment, [Mr. GRAHAM's,] were concurred in.

In relation to the appropriation of $50,000 proposed by the amendment made in committee of the whole for paying off arrearages ascertained by the medical bureau—

Mr. WILLIAMS explained the estimates of the bureau itself, with a view of showing that there would be enough without this $50,000 to pay the arrearages.

Mr. EVANS differed from his colleague on this point, and contended that the arrearages, amounting to $82,753 77, would swallow up the whole appropriation for medicines, &c.

After a good deal of discussion between the two Senators, it appeared that some changes made in the House, by which a few vessels would be thrown out of commission, would necessarily lessen the estimates about $10,000; which Mr. E. undertook to strike off the appropriations after the adoption of the committee's amendment.

The amendment was then concurred in.

Mr. GRAHAM's amendment, adopted in committee, next came up, and was read.

Mr. TALLMADGE offered the following amendment to the amendment, as a substute:

"And the Secretary of the Navy is hereby directed to apply $100,000 of the appropriation mentioned in the 9th clause of an act of Congress, approved on the 4th day of August, 1842, entitled 'An act making appropriations for the naval service of 1842,' and the balances of former appropriations mentioned in said act, to the construction of a floating dry-dock at Brooklyn, New York, upon the plan preferred by the commissioners appointed for that purpose; and if the said dock prove satisfactory to the Secretary of the Navy, then the Secretary is hereby authorized to construct a similar dock at Pensacola, of a proper size for frigates of the smallest class, at a sum not to exceed $100,000; and the same is hereby appropriated for that purpose."

Mr. BAYARD contended that this was a proposition to force upon the Secretary of the Navy an appropriation of $100,000 more than he himself calls for, or says is necessary, contrary to his express remonstrance; for he says he does not want a floating dock at New York at all. He says it would be wholly unnecessary.

Mr. WOODBURY asked if the Secretary of the Navy had not called for a dry-dock at Brooklyn.

Mr. BAYARD said, in a former report he had; but that would cost a million of dollars; and, in the present state of the treasury, the Secretary did not ask to prosecute it. He says the docks already in use are ample enough for a much larger navy than ours, and will be sufficient, in time of peace, for years to come.

Mr. WALKER called for the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

The subject was further debated by Messrs. ALLEN, BAYARD, WILLIAMS, WOODBURY, and CALHOUN; and the amendment (Mr. TALLMADGE's) was rejected—yeas 17, nays 22, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Bagby, Calhoun, Choate, Crafts, Cuthbert, Fulton, Kerr, Smith of Indiana, Tallmadge, Tappan, Walker, Wilcox, Williams, Woodbury, Wright, and Young—17.

NAYS—Messrs. Archer, Barrow, Bates, Bayard, Benton, Berrien, Buchanan, Clayton, Conrad, Crittenden, Dayton, Evans, Graham, Henderson, Huntington, Linn, McRoberts, Mangum, Merrick, Miller, Morehead, and Phelps—22.

The question then recurred on the amendment of the committee of the whole, (Mr. GRAHAM's,) and it was concurred in.

Mr. BENTON moved to strike out the appropriation "for the support of Africans recaptured on the coast of Africa or elsewhere, and returned to Africa by the armed vessels of the United States, $5,000."

Mr. B. made some observations not distinctly heard in the gallery; but they were understood to relate to the African squadron.

Mr. EVANS assured the Senator that this appropriation had nothing to do with the African squadron. It was an appropriation annually made for the specific purpose which it states. Whatever the Senator had to say about the African squadron, would more appropriately apply to another bill from the House, which would be under the consideration of the Senate in a few days. It was a bill for carrying out the provisions of the treaty.

What followed was so imperfectly heard in the gallery, that it is rather by inference than otherwise it was understood that Mr. BENTON, with a view of addressing the Senate on the subject of appropriations for the treaty, wished to have an adjournment; and Mr. EVANS urged that the Senator might allow this bill to proceed, and reserve his purpose for the House bill, yet to come up; on which he said he could move an amendment, to the effect that no money appropriated by this appropriation bill should be applied to defraying the expenses of the African squadron. This would bring up the whole question. It was also understood that Mr. BENTON asked the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations if any information had been received by this Government that the British ministry did not construe the treaty in the same light it was viewed by the Executive, as to the old British claim of the right of search.

Mr. ARCHER was understood to say he was unadvised on that subject, but would endeavor to be able to answer the Senator in the morning.

The adjournment not being pressed, the question was taken on Mr. BENTON's motion to strike out the $5,000 appropriation for returning captured Africans to the coast of Africa, and decided in the negative.

The amendments were then ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

Mr. BUCHANAN gave notice that to-morrow he would ask leave to introduce a bill in relation to holding a court in the western district of Pennsylvania.

Messrs. WALKER and CRITTENDEN asked and obtained leave to withdraw the papers of certain claimants.

Mr. BERRIEN moved to take up the bankrupt bill, with a view of passing it over informally, that it might be the first thing in order after the morning hour to-morrow.

The House bill to repeal the bankrupt act, and the amendments proposed by the Judiciary Committee, were accordingly taken up, and, on motion, passed over informally.

Mr. BAYARD called the attention of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. BENTON] to the resolution which he (Mr. BAYARD) had introduced early in the session, and to which the Senator had offered an amendment—he meant the resolution to rescind the expunging resolution. His object was to fix some time for taking the vote on the amendment and resolution. At this late period of the session, when there was so much business to be done, he had no intention of making a speech, or raising a discussion on the subject; and would be perfectly willing to let both go to the vote at once. But if the Senator had a speech to make on his amendment, and would fix a day for taking the vote, he might do so.

Mr. BENTON said the Senator could recommend his own time.

Mr. BAYARD proposed Friday next, during the morning hour.

Mr. BUCHANAN thought, in consideration of the pressing business yet to be accomplished, Friday week would be better. There were but eight days of the session left to get through the most important business. The question could not be taken on these resolutions without discussion.

After a few remarks from Messrs. BAYARD, ARCHER, and BUCHANAN, the subject was dropped; and

The Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, February 22, 1843.

Mr. LOWELL presented the petition of Andrew Ring and 67 other citizens of Lubec, Maine, praying Congress for an additional duty on sawed lumber, spars, piles, wood, bark, &c. from the British provinces; which was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. WASHINGTON, from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, made an adverse report in the case of the heirs of Captain John Winston; which, on his motion, was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. McKENNAN asked the House to take up a bill for the relief of Asahel Brainard, a man who was literally shot to pieces in the last war. The bill was read a third time and passed.

Mr. PAYNE reported, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, Senate bill No. 109, being an act for the relief of the heirs of William Fisher; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. DANIEL presented a petition in relation to French spoliations prior to 1800: referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. ADAMS asked leave to present a variety of petitions in his possession, which he had been prevented from presenting on Monday, the usual petition day, by the House going into Committee of the Whole.

Mr. MALLORY objected.

Mr. ADAMS moved a suspension of the rules, in order to enable him to present his petitions.

Mr. MALLORY asked for the yeas and nays on the motion, and they were ordered.

Mr. STANLY suggested to the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ADAMS,] that, as the House was thin, he had better let his motion lie over until the expiration of the morning hour.

The SPEAKER concurred in the propriety of the suggestion.

Mr. ADAMS said he would agree to let the committees be called, provided the vote should immediately afterwards be taken.

The SPEAKER then called on the committees for reports.

Mr. S. J. ANDREWS, from the Committee on Commerce, asked to be discharged from the further consideration of various petitions: agreed to.

Mr. BRIGGS, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, reported Senate bill 113, relating to the appointment of the Assistant Postmasters General of the United States; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. BRIGGS also reported a resolution from the same committee, to the effect that Monday next shall be set apart for the consideration of all such business as shall have been reported from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, and remains not acted on.

Mr. L. W. ANDREWS inquired whether the resolution included the bill from the Senate to prohibit private expresses? If it did, he should move to lay the resolution on the table, as he was opposed to that bill in every shape.

Mr. BRIGGS replied that it included all bills reported from the committee.

The resolution (requiring two-thirds) was rejected.

Mr. CHAPMAN, by direction of the Committee on Public Lands, moved to discharge the Committee of the Whole from the further consideration of the bill in relation to the two per cent. fund of Alabama under the distribution law.

The motion was rejected.

Mr. G. DAVIS, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported a bill to authorize a survey of the north line of the reservation for the half-breeds of the Sac and Fox Indians, under the treaty of the 20 h August, 1824.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed, and then read a third time, and passed.

Mr. TRUMBULL, from the same committee, made an adverse report.

Messrs. MAYNARD and HALL, from the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions, made sundry adverse reports.

Mr. LINN, from the Committee on Public Expenditures, reported a resolution, calling on the several officers and heads of departments for information as to whether the 17th section of the act of last session, requiring a report of the contingent expenses of the departments, printing, &c., had been complied with.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. T. W. WILLIAMS, from the Committee on Commerce, reported a bill to fix the salary of the surveyor of the port of Havre de Grace, Md.; a bill in aid of the Nantucket Marine Canal Company; and a bill to authorize the construction of a wharf at the custom-house at New London: read twice, and referred to the Committee of the Whole House.

Mr. PENDLETON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported a resolution requesting the Secretary of War to inform the House whether the pay of Major General Gaines had been reduced to that of a brigadier general; when such reduction took place; by whose order; and the reasons therefor.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. STOKELY, from the same committee, reported a joint resolution requesting the President to cause a sword (to cost $1,000) to be made, and presented to Gen. Clinch, for his services and good conduct at the battle of Withlacoochie, in Florida: read twice, and referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. ADAMS, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, reported a resolution to the effect that all debate upon the bill for the relief of claimants under French spoliations prior to 1800, shall cease in Committee of the Whole on to-morrow at two o'clock.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON inquired whether the subject had ever been taken up in committee.

The SPEAKER said it had last session.

Mr. SAUNDERS moved to lay the resolution on the table. This motion was adopted—ayes 89, noes 80.

Mr. FILLMORE moved the House go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. This motion was adopted—ayes 84, noes 50.

Before the House went into committee, Mr. ADAMS rose, and asked that the vote might be taken on his motion to suspend the rules, in order to enable him to present his petitions.

Objection was made in various quarters; the effect of which was to induce Mr. STANLY to move a reconsideration of the vote by which the House had determined to go into Committee of the Whole. The reconsideration was carried, and Mr. FILLMORE withdrew his motion to go into committee.

Mr. C. J. INGERSOLL rose and asked leave to offer a resolution of inquiry (in relation to the construction put by the British Government upon the treaty of Washington.)

Objection was made; and, after much confusion, the Speaker resumed the call of committees for reports.

Mr. L. W. ANDREWS reported a bill for the relief of John Everard; which was read three times and passed.

Messrs. S. N. CLARKE, AYCRIGG, and A. YOUNG, from the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions, made adverse reports.

Mr. YORKE endeavored to get in a resolution for meeting at 10 o'clock hereafter. Objections were made in all quarters of the hall.

Mr. TILLINGHAST, from the Committee on the Library, reported a joint resolution in relation to the statue of Washington; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Various members endeavored to obtain action upon business relating to their constituents; but the House refused to depart from the rules.

Mr. ADAMS asked the House to take the question now on his motion to suspend the rules, to allow him to present petitions.

Mr. WISE inquired whether the petition on the desk of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ADAMS] was one of the petitions which he wished to present.

[The gentleman from Virginia pointed to the mammoth petition on frame-work, which we described some few days since.]

The SPEAKER was understood to reply that that was one of the petitions which the gentleman from Massachusetts wished to present.

Mr. WISE asked whether it was signed by a runaway slave from Virginia. [Cries of "Order."]

The SPEAKER said the motion was to suspend for the presentation of petitions generally.

Mr. A. V. BROWN inquired if the yeas and nays were ordered?

The SPEAKER replied that they were.

Mr. L. W. ANDREWS inquired if, the motion to suspend were sustained, whether it would suspend objections to petitions of a particular description, also.

The SPEAKER said it would not.

The yeas and nays were then taken, and resulted thus: Yeas 80, nays 103.

So the rules were not suspended.

BRITISH CONSTRUCTION OF THE TREATY OF WASHINGTON.

Mr. C. J. INGERSOLL again offered his resolution; which was in these terms:

Resolved, That the President be requested to communicate to this House (if not, in his opinion, improper) whatever correspondence or communication may have been received from the British Government respecting the President's construction of the late British treaty concluded at Washington, as it concerns an alleged right to visit American vessels.

Mr. WISE objected to the reception of the resolution.

Mr. C. J. INGERSOLL moved a suspension of the rules for the reception of his resolution; and on this he called for the yeas and nays, which were ordered; but, before the vote was taken, he wished an extract to be read by the Clerk from a speech delivered by Sir Robert Peel in the British Parliament on this subject, which was of infinitely more importance than any other that could be brought before the House.

The extract was in the following terms:

I rejoice that the honorable gentleman has given me an opportunity of making some observations on the late message of the President of the United States. The sincere and earnest desire I have always entertained for the maintenance of a good understanding between this country and the United States, and the spirit in which I have always spoken of America, makes it a doubly painful duty to me to have to refer to that message; which, I am sorry to say, does not give a correct account of the negotiations relative to the right of visit.

Perhaps I may do right to confirm what the honorable gentleman has said, that there is nothing more distinct than the right of visit is from the right of search. Search is a belligerent right, and not to be exercised in time of peace, except when it has been conceded by treaty. The right of search extends not only to the vessel, but to the cargo also. The right of visit is quite distinct from this, though the two are often confounded. The right of search, with respect to American vessels, we entirely and utterly disclaim. Nay, more: if we knew that an American vessel was furnished with all the materials requisite for the slave-trade—if we knew that the decks were prepared to receive hundreds of human beings within a space in which life is almost impossible, still we should be bound to let that American vessel pass on. But the right we claim is, to know whether a vessel pretending to be American, and hoisting the American flag, be bona fide American.

There must be some great misunderstanding upon the subject: but, considering the importance of maintaining this right—a right not peculiar to England; considering that we are contending for a right which is the only security against fraud, against the grossest abuses by parties interested in this iniquitous traffic; considering that we are now the advocates of a principle necessary for the interests and security of all maritime nations,—it is my duty to state, in the face of the House of Commons, that the claim to the right of visitation contended for in the despatch of Lord Aberdeen has not been relinquished; that, on this subject, there was made no concession whatever; and that to the principles laid down in the despatch of Lord Aberdeen we adhere at this moment. [Cheers from both sides of the House.]

With respect to the treaty which we have entered into with the United States: in signing that treaty, we consider that we have abandoned no right of visitation. We do not understand from the United States that they entered into that treaty with any engagement from us to abandon the right of visitation, which, if not necessarily connected with the question of the slave trade, we thought that it was a step in advance when the United States professed a readiness to despatch a naval force to the coast of Africa for the purpose of suppressing the slave-trade. We did not accept the detachment of that naval force as an equivalent for any right which we claimed; yet, still we thought that, for a great country like the United States to take that step with us on the coast of Africa, although the power of visitation is limited under the treaty in such case—although we claim no right to visit slavers, bona fide American, and the right is to be exercised by vessels of the United States—we thought it, I say, a step in advance towards the ultimate suppression of the slave-trade to accede to the proposition of the United States.

But in acceding to that, we have not abandoned our claims in the slightest degree; nor did it ever make any part of our intention, during the controversy, to abandon the right to which we lay claim in the despatch I have mentioned. [Hear, hear, hear.] We have not contented ourselves, sir, with leaving this fact to become known by a declaration in this House; but since the appearance of the President's message, we have taken an opportunity of intimating to the United States the construction we place on the treaty. [Cheers.] I trust, sir, that I have said enough to satisfy the House on this point. I trust, also, that although compelled to avow a material difference of opinion between the two Governments upon this material question, I have stated this difference of opinion with the respect which I wish to maintain towards the high authorities of the United States. [Hear, hear.]

Objections were still made; and the Clerk began to call the roll on the question of suspension of the rules, on which the yeas and nays had been ordered—great anxiety being manifested through the House in relation to the matter.

Mr. WISE rose when the Clerk had called a few names, and said, if it was the desire of the House to adopt the resolution, he would withdraw his objection.

The call was, therefore, suspended, and the resolution was adopted.

GENERAL APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. FILLMORE moved that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole, for the purpose of taking up the general appropriation bills.

The motion was agreed to, and Mr. GILMER took the chair.

Mr. FILLMORE moved that the committee take up the bill making appropriations for navy pensions.

Mr. CUSHING moved that the committee take up the bill carrying into effect the treaty of Washington.

The motion of the gentleman from New York was agreed to; and, after the bill had been read through, and no amendment proposed, it was laid aside, to be reported.

Mr. FILLMORE then moved that the committee take up the bill making appropriations to fulfil Indian treaties; and, as his motion was agreed to, he said he was instructed by the Committee of Ways and Means to move to strike out an item for the payment of a demand for articles furnished on the order of Mr. Doty, the commissioner to negotiate a treaty with certain Indian tribes.

Mr. JAMES COOPER, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, by direction of that committee, opposed the motion to strike out, and explained the circumstances under which the articles were furnished.

Mr. FILLMORE replied.

After some remarks from Messrs. COOPER of Pennsylvania, REYNOLDS, and JOHN C. EDWARDS, in opposition to the amendment, and from Messrs. FILLMORE and ISAAC D. JONES in its favor, the question was taken on the amendment, and it was rejected.

On motion by Mr. FILLMORE, an amendment was adopted, appropriating four hundred and odd dollars for the removal of 250 of the New York Indians west of the Mississippi.

On motion by Mr. FILLMORE, a further amendment was adopted, appropriating $15,000 for the payment and subsistence of certain Choctaw Indians while attending, as witnesses, the investigations, by a committee of the House, of claims arising under the Choctaw treaty. Also, a modification of the bill, so as to include an appropriation of $402, paid for the ransom of two white boys from the Camanches.

Mr. GOGGIN offered an amendment, appropriating $12,000 to satisfy certain contracts entered into in 1836, by General Jesup, with certain Creek chiefs; which, after some remarks from Mr. G., was agreed to.

Mr. J. COOPER offered an amendment, appropriating $67,400 for the removal and subsistence of the Choctaw Indians west of the Mississippi, in pursuance of the treaty of 1830; also, an amendment, appropriating $51,000 for carrying into effect the Chippewa treaty of October 4, 1842; both of which were agreed to.

Several other amendments were made; and the bill was then laid aside, to be reported to the House.

Mr. FILLMORE then moved that the fortification bill be taken up; and the motion was agreed to.

Mr. REYNOLDS moved that the appropriation be reduced one-half; and he proceeded to advocate his motion for retrenchment.

Mr. R. addressed the House for some time on his motion; but

The CAHIR arrested his remarks, saying that the motion was not in order; and, therefore, there was no question before the committee.

After some further remarks from Mr. REYNOLDS, the bill was laid aside, to be reported.

On motion by Mr. C. H. WILLIAMS, the bill authorizing the examination and survey of the harbor of Memphis, Tennessee, was considered; and no amendment being offered thereto, it was laid aside, to be reported.

On motion by Mr. FILLMORE, the committee next took up the bill making appropriations for the improvement of certain harbors and rivers, and for continuing the Cumberland road, and for other purposes; and the bill having been read,

Mr. GRAHAM moved to strike out the first section of the bill. Unless this Government had made up its mind to contract a debt as large as that of Great Britain, Mr. G. said it seemed to him that it was time to stop these enormous appropriations for such objects as were contained in the bill. Here they were without credit, without the ability to carry on the Government, except by borrowing and with little ability to borrow; and yet they were called on to go all round the United States, giving a bonus to every section, and to pass a bill which would involve the Government in debt for many years to come—and that, too, at a time when they could not pay the current expenses for one year. It appeared to him that, if gentlemen would reflect, they would see the impropriety of such a course of extravagance. They could not tell whether the tariff would produce ten, fifteen, or twenty millions, and some thought that it would not yield ten millions.

It would seem to him, therefore, that to make such appropriations at a time like this, would be a species of improvidence that no man could justify. As his object was to defeat the bill, he had made the motion to strike out the first section.

The CHAIR said that the motion of the gentleman was in order; but it would not reach the object he had in view, inasmuch as, before putting that question, (the bill having but that one section,) it would be in order for gentlemen to offer amendments to make it more perfect.

Mr. ADAMS suggested that the proper motion for the gentleman to make would be, that the committee rise, and report the bill, with a recommendation that it be rejected.

Mr. GRAHAM accordingly withdrew his motion, and moved that the committee rise, and report the bill to the House, with a recommendation that it be rejected.

Mr. FILLMORE objected, that the motion was not in order; but

The CHAIR overruled the objection.

Mr. BARNARD then addressed the committee at length in favor of the bill.

Mr. FILLMORE addressed the committee in favor of the bill, and concluded by moving that the committee rise.

The committee then rose, and reported the bills to the House on which the committee had acted, and the progress on the harbors and rivers bill.

The navy pension bill was then ordered to be engrossed, and was read a third time, and passed.

The bill making appropriations to fulfil treaties with Indian tribes was next taken up; and, after some discussion, in which Messrs. CAVE JOHNSON, J. C. EDWARDS, and others took part, it was ordered to be engrossed; and was read a third time, and passed.

The fortification appropriation bill, the bill authorizing the examination and survey of the harbor of Memphis, Tennessee, and the other bills acted upon in committee, were disposed of in like manner.

On the motion of Mr. FILLMORE, the amendments of the House to the army bill were insisted upon, and a committee of conference appointed to meet a like committee of the Senate.

Several bills from the Senate were read twice, and committed. They were:

A bill for the relief of John Hutchinson.

A bill to indemnify Major General Andrew Jackson.

A bill granting a pension to Wm. McPherson.

A variety of executive communications were then presented to the House; amongst which was a reply to resolutions of this House in relation to the capture of Monterey by Captain Jones, who has been recalled for that act. Also, copies of the correspondence which has taken place between the consul of the United States at Tangier and the Government of Morocco.

On the motion of Mr. HUNT, 2,500 copies of the individual report of Mr. AYCRIGG, a member of the committee on the coast survey, were ordered to be printed.

Mr. CHAPMAN reported a bill from the Committee on Public Lands, the title of which was not heard.

Mr. J. C. CAMPBELL appealed to the House to take up bill No. 649—being his bill to suspend the districting section of the apportionment bill; but, on a motion to that effect,

The House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, February 23, 1843.

The PRESIDENT pro tem. laid before the Senate a communication from the State Department, transmitting further returns in relation to the operations of the bankrupt law, in compliance with the resolution of the Senate of December, 1842; which was, on motion by Mr. HUNTINGTON, laid on the table.

Also, presented a communication from the State Department, transmitting statements showing the number and description of passengers who have arrived from foreign countries in each collection district of the United States in each quarter, during the year, according to the returns made to that department by the collectors; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. STURGEON presented two memorials from the Philadelphia Anti-Slavery Society;—one asking for such amendment of the Constitution and laws of the United States as will put an end to slavery in the District of Columbia; and the other against the admission of Texas and Florida, as States, into the Union.

The question of the reception of these memorials was on motion by Mr. GRAHAM, laid on the table.

Mr. SMITH of Indiana, from the Committee on Public Lands, to which was referred the joint resolutions of the Legislature of Alabama, asking for the passage of a law authorizing the bills of the Bank of the State of Alabama to be received in payment (equal to the amount of the 2 per cent. fund belonging to that State, not yet paid over to her) for the public lands sold in that State, reported a bill relating to the mode of payment of the two per cent. relinquished to the State of Alabama; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. SMITH also, from the same committee, reported back, without amendment, Senate bill making donations of land in several States for the education of the deaf and dumb, and blind, and for the relief of insane persons.

Mr. GRAHAM, from the Committee on Claims, reported back, without amendment, and with a recommendation that they do pass, the bill from the House for the relief of Robert T. Spence;

The bill for the relief of Samuel Weller; and

The bill for the relief of John Hodgkin.

Mr. G. also, from the same committee, reported back, without amendment, and with a recommendation that it be rejected, the bill for the relief of the legal representatives of Lieut. T. W. Smith.

On motion by Mr. HUNTINGTON, the Committee on Commerce was discharged from the further consideration of the memorial of the Board of Trade of the city of Pittsburg, praying an appropriation for the erection of a marine hospital at or near that place; on the ground that the committee was opposed to the prayer of the memorial.

Mr. HUNTINGTON, from the Committee on Commerce, reported back, without amendment, and with a recommendation that it be indefinitely postponed, the bill from the House, entitled An act for the erection of a marine hospital at Key West, in the Territory of Florida.

Also reported back, from the same committee, without amendment, and with a recommendation that it be indefinitely postponed, the bill from the House for the relief of Robert P. Norris.

Also reported back, from the same committee, with an amendment, House bill entitled An act to amend an act making an appropriation for the erection of a marine hospital at or near Ocracoke, North Carolina.

On motion by Mr. HUNTINGTON, the previous orders were postponed, and the above bill was taken up, as in committee of the whole.

Mr. H. explained the nature of the amendment. It was then adopted, and the bill was reported to the Senate; and, according to order, was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. H., from the Committee on Commerce, reported a bill making an appropriation for continuing improvements in the navigation of the river Thames, in the State of Connecticut; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. H., from the same committee, to which had been recommitted the House bill entitled An act to reduce the number and compensation of the officers and other persons employed in the port of New York, reported the same back, with an amendment, striking out the whole bill, and substituting another for it, providing that the whole amount of compensation, in the collection of the revenue at that place, shall be reduced so as not to exceed $388,500.

Mr. H., from the same committee, to which was referred, some time since, so much of the annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury, and the memorials of the Chambers of Commerce and Boards of Trade of the several States in favor of the adoption of the warehousing system, made a report, accompanied by a resolution asserting that it is inexpedient, at the present session of Congress, to establish the warehousing system; and recommending that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the subject.

Mr. H. said the report and resolution were the act of a majority of the committee; and the other members of the committee who were friendly to the system, and who differed from them as to the expediency of its adoption, would present their views in a separate report. He wished merely to remark that the main object of the committee was to examine, somewhat at large, what was called the incidental liberal warehousing system, to which the committee does not agree. They believed that it was inexpedient, at this session, to legislate upon the subject. He would not, then, say that, at some other time, a system might not be proper. A majority of the committee, in considering it in a financial point of view, concurred in the opinion that such a system would take from the revenue, during the calendar year, from three to four and a half millions of dollars. The estimate of the net revenue from the port of New York alone, was about eight millions. The effect of the system, then, would be to reduce it to five or six millions. The committee, therefore, in the present condition of the finances, could not recommend the system prayed for in the memorials.

Mr. KING said, being on the Committee of Commerce, to which the subject of the warehousing system had been referred for examination, and, entertaining views different from those of a majority of the committee, the Senator from New York [Mr. WRIGHT] and himself believing that a properly regulated warehousing system would be greatly advantageous to the commercial and shipping interests of the country, had prepared their views in the form of a minority report, to go out to the country with the report of the majority. They conceived it due to the country and to themselves that they should take this course, as it was a subject of great importance. It was proper that they should do so, that the attention of those who were particularly interested should be directed to it. In regard to the financial point involved in this system, he would only say, that when this subject was proposed to be referred to the Committee on Commerce, he had opposed the motion, believing that it involved a very important financial question; but the Senate took a different view of it, and referred it to the Committee on Commerce, as a commercial question. The members of the committee took it up only in a commercial point of view, and had presented their views for the country. He hoped that the report of the minority would be received, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HUNTINGTON remarked that the Senator from Alabama had stated the general importance of the subject of the warehousing system; and it was not necessary for him, therefore, to dwell upon it. It was a subject which had come up there from the boards of trade, and those interested in it particularly, and was new. It was important, therefore, that the attention of the public generally should be called to it. The importance of the subject to the mercantile and navigating interests had been examined in both the reports, and commended to the attention of the country. He hoped, therefore, both reports would be printed. When he (Mr. H.) had spoken of the financial effect of such a system, he spoke of it as one of the reasons for the postponement, and not the only one which they had. He moved, therefore, that the reports be laid on the table, and be printed; and at any time thereafter they could be taken up, if desired, by any Senator.

Mr. WOODBURY observed that he differed entirely from the views expressed by the chairman of the Committee on Commerce. He thought that the present, rather than any future time, was the most imperative for efficient action concerning a liberal warehousing system. He referred to one connected with re-exportation by land, as well as by sea, to foreign countries. The report which had heretofore been made against the latter, he did not then discuss; because the matter might be examined and provided for when the subject of warehousing and exporting merchandise generally came under consideration. Now was the most desirable moment to legislate, for two reasons: 1st. The commercial interests being much depressed, would, by this system, obtain relief from paying cash duties, and laying long out of their money, on goods not consumed in the country. Until the warehousing system is established, the merchants are now unnecessarily subjected to this inconvenience and loss; and thus we tax commerce and navigation, rather than consumption, until the laws are changed.

In the next place, by introducing this system, imports will at once increase, and additional employment, so very desirable, be at once given to our depressed navigation. Would we neglect longer, or refuse to permit this encouragement to so important an interest, and an encouragement needed so urgently?

It had been intimated by the chairman, that the finances might suffer much by such a course the present year. Mr. W. could not concur in this opinion.

Whatever had been said on this subject by the collector of New York, or the present head of the Treasury Department, it was manifest that few goods, now in the country, would go into warehouses. Our merchants, under existing laws, are shrewd enough not to import many more goods than are wanted for early consumption. They are unwilling to lie out of the cost, duties, and interest, any considerable time.

The additional imports, under such a system, would not be brought into the country without it, till needed for immediate use. How, then, would the revenue suffer?

But, on the other hand, a liberal warehousing system might be guarded well against frauds; would relieve the commercial and navigating interests in both the particulars before named, and make our seaports depots for the West Indies and South America, and encourage the sale here for these regions of many more even of our manufactures to make up assorted cargoes desirable there. Extended, likewise, to liberal re-exports by land; our whole interior commerce, our canals, railroads, lake, and river navigation would all be greatly advanced.

Mr. HUNTINGTON said, that, as to the remark of the Senator from New Hampshire that it would not affect the revenue, he would only say that he still entertained the opinion he before expressed, (which was the opinion of seven-eighths of all the officers of the customs who had been addressed upon the subject,) that it would seriously affect the revenue. The reason of its so doing was, because there was now a year's supply of goods in the country more than the people wanted. As to its effect on the navigating interest, all he wished to say, was, that there were two sides to that question. It did not follow that, if Congress adopted the warehousing system, it would give more employment to the navigating interest, so long as there was not proper reciprocity in trade. If it would have any effect at all to give more employment to the shipping interests, it would give employment to foreign shipping, under our present commercial regulations. With regard to allowing a drawback on goods re-exported, as well by sea as by land, he said that that subject had already been disposed of.

Mr. WOODBURY said that his only object was to request the gentlemen on the committee friendly to the warehousing system, to call up this report; and, by some amendment, or some new measure, obtain, if possible, an early and favorable decision, before Congress adjourns. It was the delay that he deprecated. He did not feel justified in going into the merits of the subject farther at the present moment. But he must add, that the idea from the chairman, that a year's extra supply of goods had been brought into the country, was very strange—passing strange—when the whole imports of all kinds for the last two quarters were less than thirty millions of dollars; hardly half the ordinary amount during the ten years past.

The reports were then ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

Mr. ALLEN submitted the following resolution, which was adopted:

Resolved, That the President be requested to cause to be laid before the Senate, at the commencement of the next session of Congress, a complete catalogue of all books, (records and public documents excepted,) atlases, maps, and files of public journals and newspapers belonging to the Government, in the State, Treasury, War, Navy, and Post Office Departments, or in the bureaus or offices of such departments, and in the office of the Attorney General; the whole to be properly arranged and designated under their appropriate heads, by titles, subjects, dates, and languages, after the manner of the catalogue of the library of Congress; and the catalogues from each of the departments to be made out separately, and each giving the particular bureau or office in which such books, atlases, maps, and files are kept.

Mr. BERRIEN, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which had been referred House bill amendatory of the act establishing the branch mint at Dahlonega, Georgia, and defining the duties of the assayer and coiner, reported the same back, with an amendment, applying the provisions of the bill to the branch mint at Charlotte, North Carolina.

On motion of Mr. BERRIEN, the previous orders were postponed, and the above bill was taken up, as in committee of the whole; and, after some explanation by Mr. B., the amendment of the committee was agreed to, and the bill was reported to the Senate, and finally passed.

Mr. HUNTINGTON made an ineffectual effort to have taken up, and considered, the bill reducing the salary of the collector of the port of Camden, New Jersey.

Mr. BUCHANAN, on leave, introduced a bill to provide for holding a court at Williamsport, in the western district of Pennsylvania; which was twice read, and referred to the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. BERRIEN, from the Committee on the Judiciary, at a subsequent part of this day's proceedings, reported the above bill back; without amendment; and

On motion by Mr. BUCHANAN, the previous orders of the day were postponed for the purpose, and the bill was taken up, as in committee of the whole, considered, reported to the Senate, and finally passed.

RIGHT OF SEARCH—THE CONSTRUCTION OF THE ASHBURTON TREATY.

Mr. ARCHER rose and said it would be in the recollection of the Senate, that the Senator from Missouri gave notice last evening of an inquiry which he desired to make to-day, founded upon the recent speech of Sir Robert Peel, in reference to the construction put upon the late treaty. Despatches had since been received from our minister in London, a portion of which related to this topic. He read that portion of the despatch, that the Senator from Missouri might be the better enabled to frame his inquiry.

Mr. A. read as follows:

Extract of a despatch from Mr. Everett to Mr. Webster, dated London, February 3, 1843.

"Parliament was opened by commission yesterday. The Queen's speech, and the very interesting debates upon the addresses in the two Houses, will be found in the papers of to-day, which accompany this despatch. I attended the debate in the House of Commons. You can judge of the surprise with which I listened to the remarks of Sir Robert Peel on the alleged fact that Lord Aberdeen's letter to me of the 20th of December, 1841, remained to this day "unacknowledged and unanswered." It was acknowledged by me in a note dated two days afterwards, (23d December, 1841,) which, however unimportant, was transmitted to Mr. Fox by Lord Aberdeen, and afterwards communicated to Parliament, and printed.

"In this note of acknowledgment, I informed Lord Aberdeen that I should avail myself of an early opportunity of making some remarks on the very important topics treated in this letter. I pursued this course of an immediate acknowledgment of the receipt of Lord Aberdeen's note, with notice of a purpose of replying, in due season, to its contents; because, being just arrived at my post, I had not received the instructions which you had informed me I might soon expect on this topic, and which, as Lord Aberdeen's note modified the ground and disclaimed the language of his predecessor, it was my duty to await. Such instructions I should no doubt, in due time, have received; but, on the 27th of December, Lord Aberdeen informed me that the special mission had been determined on; that Lord Ashburton would go to America, with full power to settle every point in discussion, including what was called the right of search, which he deemed the most difficult; and expressed the opinion that it would be hardly worth while for us to continue the correspondence on matters in dispute between the two countries; and though he was willing to consider and reply to any statement I might think proper to make on any subject pending the negotiation that might take place at Washington, he supposed no benefit would result from a simultaneous discussion here.

"Such were Lord Aberdeen's observations, as reported by me in my despatch of December 31.

"The negotiation took place; and a mode of dealing with and settling the question was happily agreed upon, which made it unnecessary to resume the discussion, so long continued, upon the subject. In fact, from the moment the special mission was announced, I considered the discussion as at an end; and as little likely to be resumed, in reference to search and visitation, as the boundary or the "Caroline."

He merely desired to say to the Senator from Missouri, that he was now prepared to go into any explanation which the Senator might desire, of the views of this Government in relation to this matter. The honorable Senator, however, would understand, that he was not pressing him for the motion; the Senator would, of course, choose his own time for making it.

Mr. BENTON said he was quite prepared with his inquiry. It was already "cut and dried."

Mr. ARCHER. I know that is the habit of the honorable Senator.

The bill making appropriation for the naval service for the half calendar year of 1843, and the fiscal year of 1844, having been engrossed, was read the third time and passed; and the question now being on the adoption of the title to the bill,

Mr. BENTON rose and moved to recommit the bill, with instructions to strike out so much of the appropriations as related to the African squadron.

The CHAIR remarked that the bill was now passed, and the question was merely on the title; and it would, therefore, be necessary to reconsider the vote on the passage of the bill before the motion to recommit could be considered.

The motion was then made to reconsider, and carried in the affirmative; when

Mr. BENTON remarked that the point of inquiry was, whether the Government of the United States had received any intimation of a different construction having been put upon the treaty by Great Britain in relation to the right of visit, from that given to it by this Government? As to whether the despatch of Lord Aberdeen had been replied to or not, although it might be a point of some moment between the parties concerned, it was not, however, the point to which he directed his inquiry. There did not appear to be, in the despatch of the American minister from London, (from which Mr. B. here read an extract,) a single word upon the subject of the construction given to the treaty by the British Government in reference to the right of visitation and search. This was the point of inquiry which he desired to make.

Mr. ARCHER observed that, as the honorable Senator had signified his intention to make an inquiry, without anticipating the nature of that inquiry, and, inasmuch as a despatch had been since received, he (Mr. A.) deemed it but fair and proper that the attention of the Senator should be called to that despatch, that he might be the better able to shape his inquiry.

Mr. BENTON said, perhaps the gentleman would go a step farther, and tell him at what time the Government of the United States would favor them with an answer to the inquiry. If the gentleman would do this, he would confer an additional obligation.

Mr. ARCHER requested the honorable Senator distinctly to repeat his inquiry.

Mr. BENTON said he would read from an English newspaper published at Liverpool, an extract, purporting to be a speech of Sir Robert Peel, in which it was declared that there was no relinquishment, in his opinion, of the right of visitation of American ships upon the coast of Africa; that the late treaty conceded nothing upon this point; and that Great Britain would adhere to the principle which she had assumed in reference to that subject.

Mr. ARCHER said the honorable Senator from Missouri would recollect that it had not been assumed by the Executive of the United States, in the message communicating the treaty to the Senate at the last session of Congress, that Great Britain had renounced her right of visitation. As to the right of search, that had been renounced, according to the distinct declaration of Lord Aberdeen.

[Mr. A. read from the President's message.]

He asked the particular attention of the Senator to the passage. And he asked the honorable Senator how he could affect to suppose that it was ever contemplated, on the part of the executive Government of the United States, that there had been any renouncement of the right of visitation on the part of the British Government? How was that gentleman, with the message of the President before him, authorized to suppose that there had ever been any such expression on the part of this Government, or of renunciation on the part of the British? Not only was this never contemplated, or asserted upon the formation of the treaty, but it was expressly stated, in more than one part of the message, that the keeping of a squadron upon the coast of Africa was, of itself, to put an end to the occasion for the right of visitation. It was not possible to obtain from either party a direct and explicit renunciation of this right; and it was not considered advisable, in such case, that the Government of the United States, (which, as well as the British negotiator, had earnestly at heart to adjust, as far as practicable, all the points in dispute,) because they could not come to an arrangement which would be absolutely satisfactory upon this point, should, as the Senator seemed to imply by his remarks, not attempt to do anything. A renunciation of the right of visit not having been obtained, it was thought advisable to obtain what was considered the next best thing. And, accordingly, an arrangement was made which tended to remove the necessity for the exercise of that right. We had as many as 80 guns dispersed in small vessels upon the coast of Africa; and he put it to the Senator from Missouri to say whether there was a probability that there would be any occasion for the exercise of that right. Although Great Britain might be unwilling to abandon the right; although we could not extinguish the claim of Great Britain to the right of visitation, the exercise of which was so obnoxious to us—it was highly improbable that any occasion would arise between the two Governments for the exercise of the right of visit, or for any collision upon that subject.

It was, he thought, a question for the consideration, not of this Government only, but of the people of the United States, how far we should draw the line of distinction between the right of visitation, and the right of search, which the British Government had disclaimed; how far the line of distinction should be drawn, under the principles of international law. He supposed the Senator from Missouri would agree with him that, whilst we claimed exemption for all vessels sailing under our flag, it was not unreasonable on the part of the British Government to require that we should give some sort of security against the abuse of that flag. We had not, as many gentlemen supposed, followed in the footsteps of Great Britain in reference to this matter; but we had gone pari passu with her. It was to the signal honor of this Government that it had been the first to put the brand of piracy upon the slave-trade, and had been the means of causing the Government of that country to put the brand of piracy upon it. Suppose one of our own vessels, deputed to carry out our own policy, had seen at a port in Cuba, or elsewhere, a vessel destined for the slave traffic—suppose our cruiser meets this vessel at sea, and she runs up the flag of some other nation: would the honorable Senator contend that we had no right to make some inquiry as to the real state of the case? Was it not reasonable, therefore, that we should afford some means of ascertaining whether a vessel, purporting to be American, was so in reality? It was true that the American flag ought to protect every spot over which it was raised; but he would tell the honorable Senator it should be really the American flag, and not a counterfeit.

He could inform the Senator that complaints had been brought to the State Department of the interference of our cruisers with vessels suspected of being engaged in the slave trade, the papers of which vessels actually showed that they had been so engaged; and, if he was rightly informed, more than one investigation was now on foot in reference to such vessels.

He made these observations merely to show that, whilst it is true that no renunciation had been made on the part of the British Government in regard to the right of visitation, yet inasmuch as the conflicting claims of the two Governments were of such a nature as from necessity to render them extremely difficult of adjustment, it was a high merit on the part of the Government of the United States, that, finding itself unable to come to any satisfactory adjustment with the British negotiator, they had done the next best thing to put an end to all pretensions on the part of the British for resorting again to the exercise of that right. He thought that, in doing this, the Government had acted wisely, and that it deserved the commendation of the country.

Mr. BENTON observed, that the extract read from his place by the chairmain of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, [Mr. ARCHER,] only referred to a subordinate point of Sir Robert Peel's letter—that of the neglect to answer Lord Ashburton's despatch of December, 1841. The extract read, only referred to that point; while his inquiry was wholly directed to the question of difference or no difference on the essential point of the meaning of the treaty. Sir Robert Peel declares that difference, and professes himself doubly pained to say that the President's message is not correct. He says the right of visitation is not given up—that England will not concede it: the President, in his message of last December, informs the two Houses that search, visit, and visitation, are all obviated by the treaty; and congratulates the country upon it. This is the point of difference between the two Governments; and it is vital! It is a question of treaty or no treaty! For, if the parties misunderstand it on this great point, there is an end of concord, and dissension must immediately rise.

The Senator from Virginia read from the President's message of August last. Sir Robert Peel was remarking upon the message of December last; and that message shows the difference which the British minister announces. The President, in that message, states the mischief, to wit: that our vessels had been subjected to visitation (as the British called it) in the African seas; that this visitation was only search in different words, and in a new form; and then refers to the treaty as putting an end to all pretence for this practice, call it what you may, in time to come. The evil of this visitation is, then, according to the President, now terminated. According to Sir Robert Peel, it is not terminated. And here is the difference—and a serious one.

Mr. B. would not go into the question of right or wrong, or extend the basis of the discussion, by opening questions of maritime rights. He would confine himself to the question he had made—that of a difference in the meaning of the treaty. If there is a difference, it is necessary to understand it, and to settle it. It must be settled; and the sooner the better. The declaration of the British minister declares a difference; and that is a point on which each Government judges for itself. They have no common superior to judge between them. The declaration of a difference makes a difference; and it is immaterial, so far as consequences are concerned, which is right, or which is wrong. In all national, as in all individual disputes, one party must be in the wrong; but that does not prevent a fight or a war. The party in the wrong may fight; and from the formal manner in which the British minister has stated this difference, it is very clear that he intends that our vessels shall be searched in the African seas hereafter, just as heretofore. What then? Shall our Government go on blindfold with the treaty, until the case occurs—until an American vessel is searched by a British cruiser, and then negotiate, or fight? Shall the Government do this—and it is the fate of weakness to wait for events, instead of guiding them—or shall it stop, and clear up the difference at once? He (Mr. B.) was in favor of stopping all action under this clause of the treaty, until the two Governments agreed as to its meaning.

Mr. B. said here was an exemplification of the mischiefs of negotiating treaties without protocols. There is not a word in the correspondence between Mr. Webster and Lord Ashburton as to the origin, progress, or formation of the articles for the squadron. The British minister's name does not appear in connexion with the subject, until it appears in the treaty; and no light can be thrown upon the meaning of the treaty, from a reference to their propositions pending the negotiations. All is blank there; and the two Governments are left to maintain their respective constructions in the best way they can.

Mr. B. said we now had a practical commentary upon the improvidence of entangling ourselves with foreign alliances. Washington warned us against it: for fifty years we have kept clear of such alliances: in August last, we entered into one of these alliances; and now, in February, we have a difference as to the meaning of an article in this alliance—a difference which cannot go to a practical result, without involving the honor or the peace of the country.

Mr. B. said there was nobody to celebrate the gigantic intellect of General Jackson; yet, in the answer which he directed Mr. Forsyth to give to Sir Charles Vaughan, in October, 1834, in relation to this very point of a convention with England for the suppression of the slave-trade, there was wisdom, which, compared to the wisdom which offered this convention, was as the pyramid of Cheops is to a grain of mustard. President Jackson, at that time, positively refused to enter into any convention on the subject. He directed him to say to Sir Charles Vaughan, that the Government of the United States was "definitely formed not to become a party to any convention on the subject of the slave-trade." This was the answer of General Jackson. It is the American answer; and it put an end to these propositions for a convention until the present Administration came into power.

Mr. B. said he did not go into the question of identity between search and visitation. The President treated them as identical; Sir R. Peel as different. He (Mr. B.) did not entertain the question. It was clear there was a difference as to the execution of the treaty; and whether the ship was to be stopped on the high seas for the purpose of being searched, as for the purpose of being visited, a preliminary objection arose, and that was, the arrest of the ship itself! The arrest of the ship on the high seas, like the arrest of an individual on the high road, was itself an act incompatible with freedom; and in the case of English naval officers, (to use the language of the London Times,) if there was any doubt in the case, they took the trick. This was the language of the Times, in February last, in relation to impressment; and it will apply in all cases where they have a right to arrest an American vessel: they will take the trick, if they have doubts; and doubts can easily be raised, where he that raises them is the authority to solve them, and has an interest in solving them all in their own favor. Stopping a vessel on the high seas, Mr. B. understood to be firing ahead of her, and over her, and then through her, if she does not stop. This was a rude process, even if for an innocent purpose; and he was against subjecting American vessels to be so stopped by British cruisers.

Mr. B. concluded his remarks by reading the passages from Sir R. Peel's speech and the President's message, which showed the difference between the two Governments in relation to the meaning of the treaty; and which must lead to collision between the two countries, if not prevented by an immediate understanding.

Mr. ARCHER remarked that he had cause to congratulate himself and the Senate that it would not be necessary to reply to all the discursive observations of the Senator from Missouri; for the time of the Senate would not be much delayed by the few words he should find sufficient to prove that there was no such difference of opinion between Sir Robert Peel and the President of the United States as the Senator supposes; and if this should be demonstrable, the Senator's arguments must of course fall to the ground. The extracts he should now read from the President's messages, and from the speech of Sir Robert Peel, would justify him in asserting that there was no contrariety of opinion between them on the subject of the treaty. Sir Robert Peel asserted nothing new on the part of the British Government; and what he did assert had been fully admitted by the President of the United States. He (Mr. A.) had told the Senator that it was because no answer could be obtained from the British Government during the progress of the negotiations upon that particular point, and because the British negotiator was not instructed to yield all we desired; that this Government thought it expedient to do what was considered the best thing—and that was to render it improbable that those collisions which had grown out of the exercise of the right of visitation should again occur.

It was not because the two Governments differed; it was because they agreed that it was considered expedient, on the part of this Government, to take the course it did. The views of this Government and of the Government of Great Britain not only agreed in themselves, but they agreed also with the views of the Senator from Missouri himself, if he would sincerely acknowledge them; but he greatly feared that the honorable Senator would renounce his own views rather than agree with the Executive. The Senator had said that the President had intimated, in both his messages, that he regarded the right of search and the right of visitation equivalent to one another; and that it was because the President so regarded them, that he had been induced to procure the adoption of the treaty. Why, he would have procured the renunciation of the right of visitation also, if it had been in his power to do so; but, as that could not be obtained, an effort had been made to prevent the practical operation of that right, and, consequently, to prevent all collision that might possibly grow out of its exercise.

He desired the particular attention of the Senate to the tenor and effect of the argument of the Senator from Missouri. After this Government had vainly endeavored to induce the British Government to renounce the right of visitation, the Senator would have us do nothing, because we could not obtain that concession. Although this could not be obtained in the manner desired, yet they had done what would amount to almost the same thing. They had done what would take away all motive on the part of the British Government to carry into practical operation this right, and they would thus have all the beneficial fruits of a direct renunciation.

The Senator from Missouri had spoken of the wisdom of Jackson. This theme was a favorite one with the honorable Senator. He would ask, Would Jackson, or would any man have exhibited more wisdom, in the negotiation of such a treaty, than this Government had done? But, admitting the view taken by the Senator from Missouri to be well founded, what would it amount to, even in that aspect? What was it he now asked the Senate to do? To break their plighted faith, (for he could not pretend to deny that the faith of the Government had been plighted to observe the stipulations of the treaty,) because, according to his notion, we had not such provisions as were expedient. Sir, (said Mr. A.,) was this the doctrine which the honorable Senator meant to avow on that floor? Did he mean to urge this doctrine in relation to this or any other provision of the treaty, all of which, it appeared, were obnoxious to the honorable Senator? For the doctrine of the honorable Senator, in relation to him who filled the chief place in the Department of State, seemed to be that "nothing good could come out of Nazareth." He would put it to him, if he took such exceptions to all of the provisions of the treaty, was the faith of this Government to be renounced, to be trampled upon, to be disregarded, unless every provision of the treaty should be suitable to the views of one of the parties to the treaty? This was the true interpretation of the honorable Senator's doctrine; though he was sure he would not be willing directly to avow and to vindicate such doctrine. But suppose the treaty to be as bad as the honorable Senator represented it: would he refuse the appropriation necessary to carry it into effect? With the same propriety, he might refuse the appropriation for carrying the recaptured Africans to their homes—which was made necessary by the provisions of a former treaty—should those former stipulations be cancelled, in consequence of the Senator's objections to the recent treaty. Let the Senate judge, from the arguments employed by the honorable Senator, how far that disposition was manifested.

He thought there could be no hesitation, (the gentleman having expectorated the wrath which filled his bosom,) but that he would now let the appropriations go on, and not violate the faith of the Government. The Senator relied very much, in the course of his observations, upon the alleged discrepancies between the two messages of the President—the one of August 11 of last year, and the other at the beginning of the present session. He (Mr. ARCHER) asserted that the purport of the two was identically the same. The President, in both of them, took the ground that he was now stating—not that the right of visitation had been renounced, but that we had procured certain arrangements in substitution of the exercise of that right. Mr. A. then read from the message accompanying the treaty, what followed that which the honorable Senator read:

"In my message at the commencement of the present session of Congress, I endeavored to state the principles which this Government supports respecting the right of search and the immunity of flags. Desirous of maintaining those principles fully, at the same time that existing obligations should be fulfilled, I have thought it most consistent with the honor and dignity of the country that it should execute its own laws, and perform its own obligations, by its own means and its own power. The examination or visitation of the merchant vessels of one nation, by the cruisers of another, for any purposes except those known and acknowledged by the law of nations, under whatever restraints or regulations it may take place, may lead to dangerous results. It is far better by other means to supersede any supposed necessity, or any motive, for such examination or visit. Interference with a merchant vessel by an armed cruiser is always a delicate proceeding, apt to touch the point of national honor, as well as to affect the interests of individuals. It has been thought, therefore, expedient—not only in accordance with the stipulations of the treaty of Ghent, but, at the same time, as removing all pretext, on the part of others, for violating the immunities of the American flag upon the seas, as they exist and are defined by the law of nations—to enter into the articles now submitted to the Senate."

He reaffirmed that the grounds taken in the two messages were the same identically, to wit: not that the right of visitation had been abandoned, but that an equivalent had been obtained.

Mr. BENTON desired to read a single sentence, to show the difference between the two messages.

Mr. ARCHER observed that, if there was a difference, it was not upon this point. It was because the right of visitation had not been renounced, that provision was made for the African squadron.

Mr. BENTON said the real question was the disagreement between this Government and that of Great Britain as to the true interpretation of the treaty. To show that there was a difference, he would first read the language of the President of the United States, and then that of Sir Robert Peel. The President of the United States, in his annual message to Congress at the beginning of this session, says (and it is to that message Sir Robert Peel alludes:)

"In the enforcement of the laws and treaty stipulations of Great Britain, a practice had threatened to grow up, on the part of its cruisers, of subjecting to visitation ships sailing under the American flag; which, while it seriously involved our maritime rights, would subject to vexation a branch of our trade which was daily increasing, and which required the fostering care of the Government. And although Lord Aberdeen, in his correspondence with the American envoys, at London, expressly disclaimed all right to detain an American ship on the high seas, even if found with a cargo of slaves on board, and restricted the British pretension to a mere claim to visit and inquire; yet it could not well be discerned by the Executive of the United States how such visit and inquiry could be made without detention on the voyage, and consequent interruption to the trade. It was regarded as the right of search, presented only in a new form, and expressed in different words."

* * * * * * *

"From this it will be seen that the ground assumed in the message has been fully maintained, at the same time that the stipulations of the treaty of Ghent are to be carried out in good faith by the two countries; and that all pretence is removed for interference with our commerce, for any purpose whatever, by a foreign Government."

He should now turn to what Sir Robert Peel said in his late speech in Parliament:

"I rejoice that the honorable gentleman has given me an opportunity of making some observations on the late message of the President of the United States. The sincere and earnest desire I have always entertained for the maintenance of a good understanding between this country and the United States, and the spirit in which I have always spoken of America, makes it a doubly painful duty to me to have to refer to that message; which, I am sorry to say, does not give a correct account of the negotiations relative to the right of visit."

He then goes on to state the difference between the right of search and the right of visitation, and then says:

"I trust, sir, that I have said enough to satisfy the House on this point. I trust, also, that although compelled to avow a material difference of opinion between the two Governments upon this material question, I have stated this difference of opinion with the respect which I wish to maintain towards the high authorities of the United States."

There is another part in which he declares expressly that the right of visitation, claimed in Lord Aberdeen's despatch, has not been relinquished, and will not be relinquished. Now, here is palpable evidence that there is a difference of opinion as to the construction of the treaty, between Sir Robt. Peel and the Executive of the United States. That was the point at issue.

Mr. ARCHER observed, that all the speech said, was, that the British Government had not renounced the right of visitation contended for in Lord Aberdeen's despatch; and the President of the United States says it was because the British Government would not renounce the right of visitation, that the arrangement became necessary for placing a squadron in the African seas to carry out our own laws, and supersede the necessity for the exercise of the right of visitation adhered to by the British Government. There is no difference of opinion in Sir Robert Peel's views and those of the President of the United States, as to the adherence of the British Government to the right of visitation.

Mr. BENTON had read from Sir Robert Peel's speech the passages in which he insisted on his interpretation of the treaty. He should now read a passage from the President's message of December last, in which are stated his views in relation to the synonymes—right of search and right of visitation. He says:

"In close conformity with these views, the eighth article of the treaty was framed, which provides that 'each nation shall keep afloat, in the African seas, a force of not less than eighty guns, to act separately, and apart, under instructions from their respective Governments, and for the enforcement of their respective laws and obligations.' From this, it will be seen that the ground assumed in the message has been fully maintained * * * * and that all pretence is removed for interference with our commerce, for any purpose whatever, by any foreign Government."

Now, what he (Mr. B.) insisted on, was this: That there was a radical difference of opinion between the two Governments as to the construction of the treaty; and that in the most vital point; and that we should have this difference cleared up before we go any further.

Mr. ALLEN said it was very well known, that, at the time the treaty was presented for ratification, it was supposed by many that its phraseology would give rise to a difference of construction; and by some it was supposed that it was so arranged as to admit of a difference of construction, with the express view of creating future difficulties,

Nevertheless, the treaty was displayed before the Senate and the country as the olive branch of peace—as a sort of love-pledge between the two countries, by which they would be enabled hereafter to live upon terms of unbroken amity; and the circumstance that it was an olive branch of peace, and that, by its ratification, the peace of the country would be guarantied hereafter;—it was for that reason that so much credit was claimed for those who negotiated it. At the meeting of the present Congress, following up, and appropriating to himself the glory of having accomplished this great work of national deliverance from impending war, the President of the United States set forth, in his annual message, the objects which the treaty had accomplished, and the means which had been employed to accomplish them. The message was laid before Congress and the country, as well as before the British prime minister; and upon the opening of the British Parliament, that minister had congratulated himself upon the occurrence of the first opportunity to state in his place, and with all the responsibility belonging to his station, that he was compelled to say that the Government of the United States, speaking through the executive message, had totally mistaken the object of the British Government in negotiating the treaty. From this, it might very naturally be supposed that it would produce an apprehension here that the Administration had been tricked, and that we had failed by this treaty to accomplish the deliverance of the country from impending war; and now they were told, notwithstanding the express and positive announcement of the views of the British Government in relation to it, as expressed by their prime minister, that the President had misunderstood the thing, and that he had put an erroneous construction upon the treaty. Notwithstanding that they were told by an honorable Senator that the prime minister was totally mistaken; though the words of the President's message impressed him (for he must be supposed to have weighed them critically) with the belief that this country thought it had gained something by the African squadron, yet such was not the case; this Government had obtained no advantage—had secured no postponement of a war. No, sir; in order to keep that before the people as an olive branch, in the face of this adverse declaration of the British Government, this Government came down and declared that she was mistaken—that they agree entirely with the British construction of the treaty. What was that construction? Lord Aberdeen has asserted, in a labored communication, first, that there was a difference between the right of search and the right of visitation; and he had likewise asserted, that the British Government would not modify their pretensions to the right of visitation; and Sir Robert Peel had stated, in the House of Commons, that that assertion of Lord Aberdeen remained unanswered. But our minister in England communicated to this Government that its receipt was acknowledged; but no proposition had been laid down, because Lord Aberdeen informed him that a special minister had been sent to this country, charged with the adjustment of all existing difficulties. In consequence of that information, all correspondence was arrested between the American minister in London and the British Government. What was the question between the two Governments at the time? It was not as to the right of visitation, (although that was the question which Mr. Everett informed them Lord Ashburton had especially in charge.) If Lord Ashburton came here to settle that question, and went away without doing so, he would ask, what had been gained by the negotiation? What was the consideration which induced this Government to engage to keep a squadron of eighty guns on the coast of Africa? If this question had not been settled, the negotiations were nothing more than mere child's play.

If Great Britain did not surrender her right to search our vessels, why did we agree to spend half million a year for the purpose of searching our own? The President of the United States had, in his message, put the proper construction upon the treaty; and it was not for Senators now, when a different construction had been put upon it by Great Britain, in order to keep up the idea of making it an olive branch of peace, to say that the President was mistaken in the construction which he put upon it. There was one part of the speech of Sir Robert Peel, which disclosed the whole views of the British Government; that part was worth all the rest, although it was a part which had not been read to the Senate. The delivery of that speech had been predicated upon the necessity of resisting the slave-trade. That was the foundation of the claim of the right of search, or visitation, as it was called in England. That right had been held forth, by those who maintained the anti-slave-trade doctrines. What did Sir Robert Peel say in his speech, as to the nature of the right of visitation? In order to show that the article in the treaty did not suspend the right of visitation, and to shew that the freedom of the sea was as much at the control of England as before the treaty was formed, he made the declaration putting that right on a broader, higher ground, disconnecting it from the idea of the slave-trade. They did not abandon the right of visitation, which Sir Robert Peel now said was not necessarily connected with the question of the slave-trade, but that it extends to the whole world of commerce—extends to vessels in the Pacific ocean, as well as in the harbor of New York, and everywhere else. And it was necessary for Sir Robert Peel to take this ground, in order to justify his construction of the treaty. Suppose, then, you send your eighty guns and your one or two thousand men to Africa—suppose you execute this article of the treaty: the Senator from Virginia [Mr. ARCHER] says the practical effect is obtained. Was it? Allowing his construction to be right, the practical effect would only extend to the coast of Africa; whereas Sir Robert Peel expressly disconnected the right of search from that question. Now, while this was positively asserted, either Sir Robert Peel must be stultified, and incapable of comprehending the true construction put upon the treaty in the President's message, or the President's construction was erroneous; and inasmuch as Sir Robert Peel had acknowledged the basis upon which the right of search was predicated, so as to include the African squadron, it was perfectly manifest that that article of the treaty was a complete nullity. It would be absurd, therefore, to attempt carrying it out by making appropriarions.

As far as he himself was concerned, he did not intend to vote for a dollar of appropriation in furtherance of the treaty—not even to pay the $300,000 dollars to the States. He would not do it, because he considered the treaty worse than a war. But he would not go into the character of the treaty now. Other gentlemen viewed it in a different light—gentlemen of more experience, and who had better means of judging, perhaps. This, however, was his view; and he should continue to act upon it. He desired to know what it was that we had received as compensation for sending out those 80 guns, if there was not to be at least a suspension of the right to visit our vessels. The President manifestly considered that there was to be a suspension of that right, when he penned his message to Congress; and he asked, if it was true that we had gained so much in reference to the right of visitation upon the coast of Africa, what had they gained upon the general principle? The British still assert that they have a right to visit any vessel for any purpose whatever. They were about to pay half a million of dollars under what they supposed to be, some time ago, a compact by which peace had been purchased; and before Congress had had an opportunity to execute its part of the contract, by appropriating the money, it was discovered to have been no guaranty of peace at all. The proper time to meet this question was the present; and he was prepared, if any one would introduce a bill for that purpose, to instruct the President to take possession of every foot of the disputed territory. If the construction put upon the treaty by Sir Robert Peel was right, there were still more pregnant consequences to grow out of it; because it showed a disposition on the part of the British Government to promote a quarrel, by holding up our Government to the world as putting one construction upon the treaty, whilst they held another and a different one.

If the President was right, then there was no difference of opinion, though the attempt to make out a difference, on the part of Sir Robert Peel, showed a desire of presenting the question in a worse aspect than if there was, in reality, a difference. Sir Robert Peel did not say he presumed there was room for some misunderstanding—that there was difference of opinion; but he had come out and placed this Government in the attitude of having endeavored to give a misconstruction to the treaty. Would any statesman in Europe believe that the President of the United States did not know what he meant in his message? How would they stand before the world? They must either, in homely phrase, knock under, in order to impress the treaty with the character of peace-offering; or they must recede from the construction put upon it by the President, and adopt that of the British minister, although the express words of its provisions showed that the President was right, and that he was wrong. Why was not Mr. Fox instructed to ascertain from the American Government what construction had been put upon the treaty, to see if a reconcilement of opposite constructions might not be effected? He considered the course pursued as a declaration on the part of England that the treaty was to be utterly disregarded; and the course we should take was, to disregard it also, and to open the negotiations afresh. We had a treaty with France, by which she had free admission for her silks and wines. The benefit of that treaty she had enjoyed for some time; and when we wanted to claim the benefit of it on our part, the French Chambers flinched. What did we do? General Jackson adopted measures to compel them to stand up to their bargain, and that instanter. Did he not call upon Congress to authorize reprisals upon her commerce? And now, when you pass an appropriation and send out a squadron, and after you have put the British in possession of the half of one of your States, they will inform you that there is some other cause of quarrel subsisting, more serious than the slave-trade itself. The treaty was, in his judgment, improperly undertaken in the first place. The very fact of the British Government sending out a special messenger, without giving us previous intimation, was a suspicious circumstance. Great Britain was not in the habit of going abroad to make peace. When she sends out a negotiator, it is as a merchant, to traffic to the best advantage. She has a direct interest in maintaining the greatest maritime power; and all the minor powers have a direct interest in resisting the extension of her power. Mr. A. concluded by saying that we had gained nothing by the treaty.

Mr. EVANS stated that, in rising, it was not his purpose to prolong the discussion, but to entreat the Senate to put an end to a debate which, to say the least of it, was premature, and wholly out of place. If the Senator from Missouri, and those who concur with him in hostile feelings to the treaty, would but have patience, a bill from the other house would, in a day or two, come before the Senate, on which they could bring up the subject, and discuss it to their heart's content—he meant the bill making provision for carrying out the treaty. How much time to-day had been wasted in unprofitable discussion, leading to no practical result? Enough, he would venture to say, to pass forty bills, now awaiting the action of Congress. The Senator from Missouri has moved to recommit the bill, with instructions to strike out all appropriations for the African squadron. Now, what use would it be for the committee to take into consideration what was not into the bill at all?

There was not a word in it about the African squadron. And, although he would not pretend to say that some part of the money appropriated in the bill was not to be applied to the expenses of the squadron to be kept on the coast of Africa for the protection of our commerce and shipping there, and in furtherance of the provisions of the treaty; yet he would say, that it would make no difference as to the amount of the appropriations, whether any portion of the navy was to be kept on that station or not. The Secretary of the Navy expressly says that the keeping of the eighty guns on the coast of Africa, according to the stipulation of the treaty, will incur no additional expense, as it requires no addition to the navy, and involves only a slight alteration in the arrangements of the fleets and class of vessels. Suppose it was decided that no squadron should be kept on the coast of Africa, and the bill were recommitted: still, no appropriation could be stricken out; for the whole of the navy must be provided for. Did not the Senator from Missouri, then, see that he would not attain his object by recommitting the bill? But he could obtain his object, (if it was as he presumed it to be, to give himself and those who, with him, were hostile to the treaty, an opportunity of expressing their views and obtaining another vote on the subject,) if he would reserve his hostility till the House bill making appropriations for carrying out the provisions of the treaty should come up; when, by a motion to strike out the sixth section, he could bring up the whole question. He could move to insert a provision that no portion of the money appropriated by the navy appropriation bill should be applied to the expenses of any squadron employed on the coast of Africa in pursuance of the late treaty with Great Britain.

He would ask, how much of the valuable time of this short session had been already thrown away in useless discussion of that treaty, long after that discussion could, by any possibility, effect any practical purpose? If the Senator from Missouri still thought he had not exhausted the subject, he could, when the bankrupt bill was disposed of, devote another day to it; and, all important business being first disposed of, he might proceed with his discussion to his heart's content.

Mr. CUTHBERT did not consider the information furnished by the despatch from our minister at London, nor the speech of Sir Robert Peel, sufficient to warrant immediate action on the subject. In the various reports of that speech, there were evident obscurities, leaving it uncertain if the remarks of Sir Robert Peel did not exclusively relate to the general right of visitation, and not to the visitation on the coast of Africa in reference to the slave-trade.

The 8th article of the treaty relates to the right of visitation on the coast of Africa, and the slave-trade; and so far, it is unquestionably a suspension of the British right of search. He (Mr. C.) pointed out an inconsistency with which Sir Robert Peel would stand chargeable if he did not make this reservation; and, therefore, he thought there was too much obscurity in the language of his speech, as reported, to warrant any action of the Senate upon the subject, till better informed.

Mr. CALHOUN said he did not rise to enter into the discussion, but merely to say that he thought the information was really too imperfect upon which to base any action. This discussion was entirely lost. If a paper which he had received from a friend in London contained a correct report of the speech, he conceived that there was not the slightest difference between the opinion of Sir Robert Peel and that of our Government as to the right of visitation. Sir Robert Peel had spoken of the right of visitation in its more enlarged sense; whilst the stipulation of the treaty had reference only to vessels engaged in the slave-trade on the coast of Africa. The question was, whether the right of visitation was waived or abandoned, so far as the examination of vessels on the coast of Africa was concerned, in the treaty stipulations. He certainly understood Sir Robert Peel to admit, by the reading of the speech, as reported in the paper alluded to, (the European Times,) that the right was abandoned so far as that point was concerned. And, to give greater weight to this position, it now turned out that the proposition came from us. He knew that there were other portions of the speech which would induce a different opinion; but he believed that, upon eclairsissement, it would be found that, while the President, in his message, had reference to visitation on the coast of Africa, Sir Robert Peel meant visitation generally.

Mr. ARCHER here interrupting, made some remarks in confirmation of the view taken by the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. CALHOUN proceeding, said that it was impossible for any man to read the treaty, and say that the right of visitation was not superseded by the provisions of that treaty. It was superseded; and he had so treated it in his speech on the treaty; and no man could read that treaty without being thus satisfied that each party was to take supervision of its own vessels. When they looked at the object of the negotiation on this point, no doubt could be entertained. What was the immediate object? Was it not this—to enter into stipulations with Great Britain, such as she had made with all European powers? He believed they had the supervision, not only of their own vessels, but of all European vessels. What was the result of this state of things? The result was, that our flag was used by all persons engaged in the slave-trade. Great Britain then threw herself on the five European powers. She wished to make it a question, not of municipal regulation, but of international law. All the great Christian powers agreed to accept it but this country alone.

Mr. C. spoke at some length, with a view to show that all Europe had given the construction to the treaty which had been given to it by Sir Robert Peel, (as he understood his remarks,)—that, by its provisions, the right of visitation was superseded on the coast of Africa.

[The indistinct manner in which Mr. C.'s remarks were heard in the reporters' gallery induces the reporter to defer them for future publication.]

Mr. BAGBY submitted an amendment to the instructions moved by the Senator from Missouri; it was to strike out the appropriation of $5,000 for the expenses of captured Africans returned to the coast of Africa.

Mr. CALHOUN entreated his friend (the Senator from Alabama, Mr. BAGBY) not to embarrass the question by the introduction of this new issue.

Mr. BAGBY said he would, with great pleasure, yield to the request of his honorable friend from South Carolina, if he could reconcile it to himself to depart from the rigid line of duty by which he had been induced to offer the amendment. He believed it was imperative, because it was the last chance he could have of moving to strike out that appropriation, which, small as it was, involved a principle of great magnitude.

Mr. CUTHBERT did not see why the Senator from South Carolina should object to blending the two issues which related to the same subject. He should vote for the motion of the Senator from Alabama with great pleasure.

Mr. KING begged leave to ask his honorable colleague what was to be done with the Africans recaptured by the vessels of the United States in the execution of existing laws? Were they to be thrown into the sea, upon being recaptured? or were they be brought to this country? Either must be done, if they were not to be taken back to the coast of Africa. Now, he knew his colleague would not have them thrown into the sea; and, even if admissible to bring them to this country, they could not be brought here without expense. The best course, under the circumstances, had been pursued for years; and that was, to take them to the coast of Africa; but that incurred some expense, and this annual appropriation was made to defray that expense. With respect to the main subject of discussion, he felt bound to say that he thought the information before the Senate was not sufficient to justify the course proposed by his honorable friend from Missouri. He (Mr. K) did not differ from the views taken by the President of the United States—that the arrangement made in the treaty, with regard to keeping a squadron of eighty guns on the coast of Africa, was an adjustment of the difficulty growing out of the British claim of the right of visitation, which that arrangement superseded; and that there could be no other object understood by the negotiators, is manifest from the fact of Lord Ashburton being sent here to adjust the principal difficulty, which could not be adjusted otherwise, in consequence of the British Government insisting on the right of visitation. What was the object of bringing the subject to the view of this Government at all, if it was not to induce some arrangement which would admit of a suspension of the claim of the British Government to the right of visitation on board our vessels on the coast of Africa? Lord Aberdeen had refused any concession. It was not the right of search that was claimed. That had been unequivocally given up. It was the right of visitation; and that was what gave rise to the principal difficulty, so hard to adjust between that Government and this. We had declared that we could not, and would not, concede the right of visitation on any terms. The misconduct of British officers, under pretence of ascertaining the validity of the American flag on board our merchant vessels, had been the subject of constant complaint. It had become intolerable, and we could no longer suffer it. Here, then, was a direct point of collision; and that was what bought Lord Ashburton to this country with a view of adjusting the difficulty. There was no longer a question as to the right of search; for that had been given up long ago. The thing to be settled was the claim of the right of visitation, for the mere purpose of ascertaining the validity of the American flag when hoisted by any ship on the African coast. Even the inviolability of the American flag, if a ship properly entitled to carry it had slaves on board, was admitted. The British Government declared that in such case they had no right to interfere. But such would be a case of violation of our own laws; and we are under obligations to those laws to prevent their violation. It was, therefore, proposed by this Government to adopt a course which would supersede the necessity of British visitation to ships bearing our flag on that coast, by keeping 80 guns afloat there to enforce our own laws on our own vessels, and to execute the right of search ourselves in relation to vessels hoisting our flag. The 8th article of the treaty proves that the arrangement was thus accepted by Lord Ashburton, as superseding the necessity for the British right of visitation; for it points out the very mode in which vessels shall be visited.

He did not pretend to say that a newspaper report of Sir Robert Peel's speech could be taken as a correct version of the speech itself. There were evidently obscurities in the version read by the Senator from South Carolina. He (Mr. K.) had seen the version in the London Times, and he could not help saying that it was more likely to be correct; but, in that version, it appeared to him that Sir Robert Peel took still stronger ground than that assumed in the other. It bore the impression that he maintained, not only the British right of visitation in the general sense, but in a sense which would extend it to the coast of Africa. If it should turn out that such was his meaning, it would be a subject of infinite surprise to him; for he would consider it a palpable violation of the treaty. We had agreed to do what, as an independent nation, we were bound to do—to carry into execution our own laws; and, therefore, there remained no longer a pretence for England to persevere in her claim of a right of visitation. Had he not considered this point clearly settled, he never would have voted against striking out that article in the treaty. He firmly relied on its being a suspension of the British claim, and that it was so stipulated by Lord Ashburton. He was satisfied of this, because he so understood it from Lord Ashburton himself. There was a bare possibility that the new state of circumstances in England, and in the intoxication resulting from recent successes, Sir Robert Peele, in his speech, had given way to the national excitement, and expressed himself in a manner not justified by the original understanding of the treaty.

Mr. CALHOUN observed, that if Great Britain should, in the face of the facts, interpret the treaty in the manner supposed, and should act upon that interpretation, we would, in contesting that point with her, have the advantage on our side not only of being right, and having the sympathies of the world with us, but we should have all the benefit of an appeal to the law of nations.

Mr. CRITTENDEN said it seemed to him not a little strange, that gentlemen who seem to be most sensitive on the subject of British aggression on the coast of Africa, and everywhere else, should be the first to move a curtailment of appropriations for the navy—the only force we have at all capable of keeping in check that very propensity to aggression. If he (Mr. C.) had indulged in all the belligerent apprehensions which seemed to trouble the gentlemen opposite; if he had thought as they did, that Great Britain meditated all sorts of encroachments on this country; if he had made up his mind as they had done, that she was bent upon ravaging our merchant vessels on the coast of Africa,—the last thing in the world he would have thought of doing, would be to vote down the naval appropriations. These would have been ample considerations rather to induce him to vote for increased appropriations. The gentlemen fear British aggressions on our merchant vessels on the coast of Africa, yet will not vote a dollar for the protection of our vessels. What a strange inconsistency this is between the sentiments they express, and the measures they propose! The squadron at the coast of Africa is to effect these good purposes; first, to protect our merchant vessels in that region; next, to fulfil our just obligations under a solemn treaty, which we are bound to carry out in good faith.

Mr. C. proceeded to point out the solemn obligations of the treaty, and the necessity of disregarding the insufficient evidence of a disposition on the part of the British ministry to violate it. He contended that a mere speech in Parliament, like a speech in the Senate, was altogether a different thing from a belligerent act. Sir Robert Peel might be allowed, if he felt so disposed, to make a flourish of words before a British House of Commons, which he would be very far from carrying into effect in the face of our squadron on the coast of Africa.

Mr. BENTON said the discussion had taken a turn which he did not expect—that of a question as to the correctness of the report of Sir Robert Peel's speech. True, there were the usual variations in the details of the reports, but they agreed in the main point; and all America and all Europe must see that we had received a slap in the face—that the President's message was flatly contradicted—and principles avowed from which collisions must arise. The difference of opinion amounted to treaty or no treaty on this point! The difference between the two Governments nullified this part of the treaty; and he thought it the part of common prudence to stop now, and remove the difference, before collisions resulted. The treaty was ratified in this chamber, upon the President's view of it. Senators voted upon that view, as they now declare, and as we know; and now, if there shall be any attempt on the part of the Administration to equivocate, and to reconcile the President's message to Sir Robert Peel's speech, by making the message yield to the speech, it will be a fraud upon the Senators who voted for the ratification.

Senators who voted for the treaty say if the British act upon the declarations of their minister, they will go to war; and this is the state to which the peace treaty has brough us! The seeds of war are in it! for they may rest assured that the minister spoke advisedly; and all reports of his speech show that it was cheered as often as he declared his determination to adhere to the right of visit.

Mr. BAGBY considered that the true understanding of the treaty, when ratified by the Senate, was the only correct interpretation of it; and that any attempt to force upon us a different construction, would be so dishonorable that words could not convey his ideas of its enormity. Mr. B. commented with great ability on the position in which the British Government had been placed by this speech of Sir Robert Peel; and maintained that both the motion of the Senator from Missouri and his amendment were perfectly justified by the declaration of the British premier.

Mr. TAPPAN called for the reading of the part proposed to be stricken out by the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. EVANS replied that there was no such part in the bill, and the Clerk need not be running the bill over for the purpose.

Mr. TAPPAN then called for the reading of the instructions, and they were read.

The question being on the amendment proposed by Mr. BAGBY, to the instruction moved by the Senator from Missouri, it was put, and decided on yeas and nays—yeas 5, nays 26, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Bagby, Benton, McRoberts, and Smith of Connecticut—5.

NAYS—Messrs. Archer, Barrow, Bates, Bayard, Berrien, Buchanan, Calhoun, Cheate, Conrad, Crafts, Crittenden, Dayton, Evans, Fulton, Henderson, Huntington, Kerr, King, Linn, McDuffie, Mangum, Merrick, Miller, Morehead, Phelps, Porter, Rives, Sevier, Smith of Indiana, Sprague, Tallmadge, White, Wilcox, Williams, Woodbridge, and Woodbury—36.

The question recurring on the motion and instructions of Mr. BENTON,

Mr. ARCHER called for the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. WOODBURY stated that he would have taken no part in this discussion, if the yeas and nays had not been ordered. It was well known that he assented to the treaty as a whole, but opposed the part now drawn into controversy; and his present vote might be misunderstood, if he made no explanation. But he would detain gentlemen only a moment.

It had been apprehended by some that the English prime minister did not intend, by his speech, to take any step in contravention of the treaty, as understood by us and by the President. Though that minister is reported to have expressed a material difference in his views from the message of the American Executive; yet it may have been only a theoretical or abstract difference. The extract of the recent letter from our ambassador at the court of St. James—just received and read by the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations—would, on re-examination, be found to fortify this inference. The extract was before him; and while it appears that Mr. Everett was present in the House of Commons during Sir Robert Peel's speech, not a syllable is said concerning the remarks of the latter, looking to any practical conflict in views between him and the President.

It is to be presumed that we have all of the letter relating to this subject; and, if nothing has been withheld, Mr. Everett heard nothing from Sir Robert Peel which surprised or alarmed him on this point; though he was surprised that the minister supposed no answer had ever been given to Lord Aberdeen's letter of December, 1841.

The silence of our minister on this point furnishes a strong presumption that Sir Robert Peel's remarks on it were different from the newspaper report, or were a mere political flourish on an abstract right to inquire and visit on the ocean, not renounced, nor intended to be renounced.

If it went farther, and looked to any practical differences concerning the treaty, it was the duty of the minister to have said so; and of the Executive here to have laid the fact before us.

But this provision in the treaty, though, in Mr. W.'s view, a humiliating one, and opposed by him on its ratification, ought to be enforced by us till violated on the other side. Mr. W. thought, in August last, when the treaty was under consideration, and still thought, that it was derogatory for us to engage to England, or any other power, that we would do what it was our duty to do without such an engagement. He thought it placed England in the attitude of a guardian over us. He wanted for our country no protector abroad. He would willingly submit to no national surveillance or tutorship. Such a provision, if not intended for one, opens the door to one; and, without any spirit of prophecy, it was easy to foresee that the manner of enforcing such a stipulation in a treaty was likely to lead to constant complaint, if not collision.

Whenever it might please England to insist that our cruisers did not exercise sufficient activity or vigilance, she would exercise her abstract right of visitation; she would make it practical, and push it into a right of search, as heretofore. But let her push it while this treaty remained in force; or let her ever push it beyond mere inquiry and visitation, and then a case would actually have occurred for belligerent measures on our side. Till then, however, Mr. W. was willing, since the treaty had been ratified, to vote all reasonable appropriations to enforce it. It was not that he liked any doubtful part of it very much, or this provision at all; but because this provision took away all pretence for outrages on our trade and merchant vessels, under color of mere inquiry or visitation.

How this mere inquiry and visitation for certain purposes had been abused, he possessed some means of knowing, in this very class of cases, formerly. Our difficulties had arisen, not from the fair exercise of such a right only by British cruisers, but from the abuse of it—from pushing it to a right of search; from entering our vessels, overhauling their papers, insulting their officers, detaining them on their voyage, and causing actual losses to those engaged in lawful and honorable commerce.

This abuse was what we had protested against. This was what Americans never would tamely submit to. This was, in effect, carrying on the old-fashioned right of search, under the name or cover only of a visit—a right of search now disclaimed by the English minister except in time of war. So Lord Aberdeen had abandoned any right to detain our vessels; but still they had been detained, and they had been searched, and both by violence; and this we had denounced, and would resist. But the mere right of inquiry, or even of visitation, Mr. W., for one, had never questioned, under proper circumstances, on the ocean, by any nation. Ships of war were often a species of police force on the great and common highway of all nations.

When war existed, the parties engaged had a right to inquire and see that none travelled under false colors, so as to escape their enemy. But even then, we had always denied the right to carry this inquiry to a search of the cargo in a neutral vessel—for our motto had been, "Free ships make free goods;" much less had we recognized the right to search the muster-rolls of the vessel, and her decks, to impress any supposed foreigners. When peace existed, if pirates were common in any seas, the right of inquiry and visitation, in case of much doubt, existed there, in order to detect disguises and frauds, and prevent escapes. So in case of smuggling on the coast of any country: if it became frequent, the right of inquiry prevailed there, and was exercised by us as well as well as other nations. So in case of the slave-trade on the coast of Africa—the worst species of crime, if not technical piracy.

But these rights, growing out of special and local exigences, did not justify officious, vexatious, and constant visits to vessels, everywhere, and on all occasions, by a dominant power, and detaining those vessels uselessly or maltreating their officers and crews. The favorable view of this part of the treaty of 1842, as to our keeping a larger naval force on the coast of Africa, was, that it took away all occasion from other powers, either to claim or exercise any right to overhaul, in any way, our ships. It thus should prevent the danger of abuses of any kind, with their inevitable collisions, ending in war.

If it did not, and in fact England should still attempt, with force, to visit our vessels there, or to push visitation into search, none would resist it quicker or longer than he. These, in brief, were the views he entertained on the topic; and on that account, he should, till some actual wrong occurred on the other side, vote for an appropriation like this, and not for a recommitment.

The question was then taken on Mr. BARROW's proposition, and decided in the negative—yeas 4, nays 36, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Linn, and Smith of Connecticut—4.

NAYS—Messrs. Archer, Barrow, Bates, Bayard, Berrien, Calhoun, Cheate, Clayton, Conrad, Crafts, Crittenden, Cuthbert, Dayton, Evans, Fulton, Henderson, Huntington, Kerr, King, McDuffie, Mangum, Merrick, Miller, Morehead, Phelps, Porter, Rives, Sevier, Smith of Indiana, Sprague, Tallmadge, Tappan, White, Wilcox, Woodbridge, and Woodbury—36.

Mr. BAGBY made an ineffectual effort to procure action on the bill permitting the notes of the State Bank of Alabama to be received from pre-emptioners, in payment for lands sold in that State, on certain conditions.

Several bills from the House were then taken from the President's table, and referred to appropriate standing committees.

Mr. SEVIER here made an ineffectual effort to have the joint resolution from the House, authorizing a survey of the harbor of Memphis, Tennessee, with the view of establishing a naval depot and armory there, taken up and disposed of.

On motion by Mr. BUCHANAN, the bill for the relief of the West Feliciana Railroad, and the Grand Gulf Railroad and Banking Company, was taken up for consideration.

CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

PUBLISHED BY BLAIR AND RIVES, AT ONE DOLLAR PER SESSION, IN ADVANCE.

27TH CONG.....3D SESS. WEDNESDAY, MARCH 1, 1843. VOLUME 12....No. 22

Mr. BUCHANAN remarked that this bill was laid on the table at his instance, with a view to enable him to get some information from the department. He had procured that information. He found that the department had yielded, by its decision on the remission of those duties on railroad iron, the grounds which formed one point of his objection to the passage of the bill; and if it was so amended as to strike out the second section, the bill would not at all interfere with the principles he had entertained, concerning the remission of duties on railroad iron.

On motion by Mr. HENDERSON, the second section of the bill was stricken out; and there being no further amendment proposed, the bill was reported to the Senate, and finally passed. So much of the title as related to the Grand Gulf Railroad and Banking Company was stricken out.

On motion by Mr. MERRICK, the Senate then proceeded to the consideration of executive business; and after some time spent therein, adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, February 23, 1843.

Mr. R. McCLELLAN presented the several petitions of Maria Evrit, of Hudson, N. Y., and Polly Thomas, of Claverack, N. Y., praying an extension of the widows pension act.

Mr. BOYD presented the papers of Mrs. Charity Clark, asking to be allowed a pension: referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions.

On motion by Mr. KEIM, the Committee of the Whole was discharged from the further consideration of the bill for the relief of John P. Schuyler; and the same having been ordered to be engrossed, was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BRIGGS asked leave to submit the following resolution:

Whereas all laws passed by the Governor and Legislative Council of Florida are in full force, until disapproved by Congress: therefore

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed, forthwith, to report the following bill:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled, That an act passed by the Governor and Legislative Council of the Territory of Florida, approved by the said Governor on the 5th day of March, 1842, entitled "An act to prevent the future migration of free negroes or mulattoes to this Territory, and for other purposes," be, and the same is hereby, disapproved, and shall henceforth be of no force.

Mr. JACOB THOMPSON rose to a privileged question. He wished to make an explanation personal to himself, and hoped the House would extend the usual courtesy to him.

The SPEAKER requested the gentleman from Mississippi to suspend his explanation till the decision of the House on the question pending.

Mr. MERIWETHER objected to the reception of the resolution.

Mr. BRIGGS moved a suspension of the rules.

Mr. FILLMORE believed that the subject had been referred to the Committee on the Judiciary; and he wished to know whether they had reported on it.

The SPEAKER said that they had not. This resolution was to direct them to report forthwith.

The yeas and nays were ordered on the suspension of the rules.

Mr. JOHN CAMPBELL, to avoid the consumption of time, moved to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. MERIWETHER said that the resolution was not yet received.

Mr. PICKENS appealed to the House to allow the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. THOMPSON] to take the floor. He wished to speak of a matter personal to himself and his State; and in such cases permission was always given as a matter of courtesy.

Mr. THOMPSON of Mississippi rose and said he desired to take possession of the floor but for a minute, on a matter personal to himself. On the day before yesterday, while he was proceeding with his remarks on the resolution of Mr. INGERSOLL, he was interrupted by the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. RAYNER.] The remarks made by that gentleman were imperfectly heard by him; but he had been informed by others who heard him, that his remarks were susceptible of an interpretation which reflected disparagingly and injuriously upon the State of Mississippi, as well as upon himself. No report of what passed has appeared in the papers. On yesterday the gentleman was not in his seat; and as he now saw him in his seat, he took the first occasion to call his attention to this matter, and inquire what was his intention in those remarks.

Mr. RAYNER said the reason why he was not in his seat yesterday, was, that he was detained at his room by indisposition. The gentleman from Mississippi said he did not hear his (Mr. R.'s) remarks; and he (Mr. R.) knew not what it was that the gentleman alluded to. It seemed some busy-body had persuaded him that he (Mr. R.) had said something which might be construed as personally offensive to him [Mr. T.] and that was also calculated to reflect upon the State of Mississippi. As to the State of Mississippi, Mr. R. said he had said nothing about her; and he did not, therefore, feel called on to express any opinion now, as to the course of that State. If the gentleman from Mississippi asked this explanation in good faith, (as he, Mr. R., was bound to suppose he did,) he (Mr. R.) had no hesitation in saying that he meant nothing personally offensive to Mr. T. The gentleman [Mr. T.] had given him (Mr. R.) no cause of offence; and of course, he (Mr. R.) could not intend to be personally offensive to Mr. T. He owed it to himself to say, that he did not wish to be considered as having gone out of his way to offend any one, without cause.

Mr. PICKENS said, as he had called the attention of the House to the explanation of the gentleman from Mississippi, it might be supposed that the gentleman from North Carolina had alluded to him as the informer of the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. THOMPSON.] On the contrary, he had not said a word to him as to this matter.

Mr. THOMPSON here interposed, and said he had held no conversation with the gentleman from South Carolina on this subject.

Mr. RAYNER replied, that he made no allusion whatever to the gentleman from South Carolina.

The question recurring on Mr. JOHN CAMPBELL'S motion to lay Mr. BRIGGS'S resolution on the table, Mr. C. withdrew it.

The question was then taken on the motion of Mr. BRIGGS to suspend the rules; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 66, nays 104, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Allen, Sherlock J. Andrews, Baker, Barnard, Birdseye, Blair, Boardman, Borden, Brewster, Briggs, Brockway, Bronson, Jeremiah Brown, Childs, Chittenden, Staley N. Clarke, Cowen, Cranston, Cravens, Richard D. Davis, John Edwards, Everett, Fillmore, Gates, Patrick G. Goode, Hall, Halstead, Henry, Hudson, Hunt, Joseph R. Russell, Saltonstall, Sanford, Slade, Stokely, Stratton, Tillinghast, Toland, Tomlinson, Trumbull, Wallace, Joseph L. White, Thomas W. Williams, Winthrop, Yorke, and Augustus Young—66.

Mr. WM. C. JOHNSON submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President of the United States communicate to this House all the correspondence between the ministers of the United States and the British Government, and the correspondence and instructions of this Government with said ministers in relation to what has generally been called the "Creole" and "McLeod" cases, not heretofore communicated to this House, if not incompatible with the public service.

Mr. CUSHING and Mr. ADAMS simultaneously rose, and addressed the Chair.

Mr. W. C. JOHNSON said he had not yielded the floor. He had another resolution, which he wished to submit.

[Cries of "The other resolution is not adopted."]

Mr. UNDERWOOD called for the regular order of business.

Mr. FILLMORE said, if debate was likely to arise, he should object to the reception of the resolution.

Mr. UNDERWOOD objected peremptorily, and called for the regular order of business.

Mr. W. C. JOHNSON withdrew his resolution, on a suggestion being made from the Speaker; but he said he would ask the courtesy of the House to allow him to make a report from a select committee.

Mr. UNDERWOOD called for the presentation of reports generally.

Mr. FILLMORE also appealed to the gentleman from Maryland to allow that order of business (the calling for reports) to be adhered to, and the gentleman would then have an opportunity to present his report without obstructing any other business.

The SPEAKER then called committees for reports; and many were presented.

THE FINANCES.

Mr. FILLMORE, from the Committee of Ways and Means, made a report; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed. It was a report on a message of the President of the United States of the 13th of February instant, with a letter of the Secretary of the Treasury accompanying the same, on the subject of the finances.

He then offered the following resolution; which was adopted:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to report to this House—

First. The amounts of outstanding appropriations on the 4th day of March, 1841, and on the 4th day of March, 1843.

Second. The amount of available means in the treasury on each of those days, to meet such appropriation.

Third. The amount of means need to defray the expenses of the Government, over and above the ordinary revenues of the Government from customs and the public lands, for the four years preceding the 4th day of March, 1841, and for the two years succeeding that time, and what such means were.

Fourth. The amount of appropriations which have been made since the 4th day of March, 1841, for arrearages or liabilities existing prior to that time.

Fifth. The amount of appropriations for each year from the 4th of March, 1829, to the 4th of March, 1843, exclusive of the public debt and trust funds.

Sixth. The amount of the public debt on the 4th day of March, 1841, and on the 4th day of March, 1843.

Mr. PICKENS, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported Senate bill for the relief of the Planters' Bank of Mississippi, and the Agricultural Bank of Mississippi, with a recommendation that the bill be not adopted.

He also communicated to the House copies of a correspondence in relation to the bill; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. COWEN made several adverse reports from the Committee of Claims; which were laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WINTHROP, from the Committee on Commerce, reported a bill amendatory of an act for the relief of sick and disabled seamen; which, on his motion, was allowed to go through all its stages, and to be passed.

Mr. J. P. KENNEDY said he was directed by the Committee on Commerce to ascertain if there was a disposition in the House to take up the warehouse bill during the present session; and, with that view, he should move that that bill be made the special order for Tuesday next.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON and Mr. FILLMORE both rose to make some remark.

The SPEAKER apprised the gentleman from Maryland that his motion now would require a vote of two-thirds, as its effect would be to supersede the regular order of business.

Mr. J. P. KENNEDY, under these circumstances, withdrew his motion.

Mr. CHAPMAN, from the Committee on the Public Lands, moved to discharge the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union from the further consideration of House bill No. 788, providing for the payment of the two per cent. fund due by the United States to the State of Alabama.

Mr. FILLMORE wished all the committees to be called, before the gentleman made his motion.

The SPEAKER informed the gentleman from Alabama that his motion would require a vote of two-thirds.

Mr. CHAPMNN said that he had made this motion several times within a few days past, but without success. He felt assured that, if gentlemen could be made to understand the provisions of the bill, they would not oppose it; and, therefore, he would give a very brief explanation, although as much opposed as any member on the floor to consuming the time of the House in useless debate. Mr. C. said that, by the compact between the State of Alabama and the United States, two per cent. on the proceeds of the sales of the public lands within that State was to be expended by the United States in making roads leading to the State. By the act passed at the late extra session of Congress, commonly called the distribution law, this two per cent. fund was relinquished to the State, and the Treasurer of the United States required to pay it over—one half the 1st of May last, and the other the 1st of May next. At the late session of the Legislature of Alabama, resolutions passed, accompanying a memorial to Congress, asking the passage of an act, authorizing the receivers and registers at the several land offices within the State to receive from the actual settlers on the public lands, in payment of their pre-emptions, (not to exceed one quarter section to any one,) the notes of the Bank of the State of Alabama and branches, to an amount not exceeding the sum due to the State by the act referred to for the two per cent. fund—the State obliging herself to receive the said notes in payment of the said fund. The bill provides simply for carrying this into operation.

Mr. C. said he presumed it was known to most of the members on the floor, that the Bank of the State of Alabama, and branches, belonged exclusively to the State, whose faith was pledged for the redemption of the notes. The Legislature of that State has, at its late session, adopted a restrictive policy in relation to her banks, with a view of reducing the circulation as fast as possible. In that spirit, the resolutions referred to were passed.

Mr. C. said that this bill was local in its operations—exclusively confined to the State he in part represented; and to his immediate constituents he considered it of the utmost importance. The country acquired lately from the Cherokees is densely populated by industrious, enterprising citizens, who are entitled to enter their lands under the pre-emption laws; but in the present deranged state of the currency—especially in Alabama—added to the pressue of the times, and the low prices of produce and property of every kind, there were a great many who could not, without the aid this bill would afford, purchase their homes. By passing the bill, not only will relief be afforded to the honest and worthy occupants and cultivators of the soil, but more land will be sold, and an easier mode provided for paying over to the State what is due by this Government; the tendency of which will be to reduce much of the bank circulation, and appreciate what remains.

Mr. C. said that, as the sales of the lands in the Cherokee country are to take place in April and May next, the House would excuse him for the zeal he manifested in pressing for immediate action on this bill. He felt confident that, with the short explanation he had given, the committee would be discharged from the bill, and that it would be passed. The committee was accordingly discharged by the House.

The bill was taken up, read a third time, and passed.

CHESAPEAKE AND OHIO CANAL.

Mr. UNDERWOOD, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, reported the joint resolution authorizing a transfer of the stock held by the United States in the Chesapeake and Ohio canal to the State of Maryland, and the corporations of Washington, Georgetown, and Alexandria, on certain conditions.

Mr. U. offered an amendment, which he moved be printed, and, together with the resolution, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. J. T. MASON hoped that the resolution would not be referred to the Committee of the Whole, where it might not be taken up, but would be suffered to lie on the Speaker's table for the early action of the House.

Mr. HOPKINS objected to such a course, and contended that the resolution must go to the Committee of the Whole, inasmuch as it made an appropriation—an absolute gratuity of a million and a half.

Mr. UNDERWOOD explained his amendment, which was to extend the provisions of the resolution to the stock held by the United States and the Louisville and Portland canal.

The resolution was then referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. MAXWELL, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported Senate bill to alter the places of holding the district court of the United States, for the district of New Jersey, with an amendment: ordered to lie on the Speaker's table.

Mr. M. also made an adverse report.

Mr. MOORE, by direction of the Committee on Private Land Claims, moved that the House take up the bill for the relief of the legal representatives of Antoine Cruzat and others.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill was read a third time, and passed.

Mr. BAKER, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported Senate bill No. 135, granting a pension to Wm. McPherson: referred to the Committee of the Whole House.

Mr. STRATTON, from the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions, made an adverse report.

BRITISH CONSTRUCTION OF THE TREATY.

When the Committee on Foreign Affairs was called on for reports—

Mr. CUSHING rose and asked permission to correct a grave error contained in the late speech of Sir Robert Peel. (Cries of "No, no;" and several voices, "Hear him.")

The SPEAKER inquired if objection was made.

Many members objected.

Mr. CUSHING said he merely wished to state a fact; and if leave was not given, he should move for it.

Objections were still made in various parts of the hall.

Mr. BRIGGS moved that leave be given.

Mr. CUSHING said he should not occupy five minutes. The fact which he wished to state came from Mr. Everett.

Mr. PICKENS said if the statement came from Mr. Everett, it was what he wanted to hear.

Mr. CUSHING moved that the rules be suspended for the purpose of hearing his statement.

Mr. L. W. ANDREWS asked for the yeas and nays on the motion to suspend; but they were not ordered.

Mr. W. C. JOHNSON said, as he understood the vote, it was to allow the gentleman [Mr. CUSHING] to make a statement, without giving rise to a debate.

Mr. KING said he could see no good that would come of the statement.

Several gentlemen called for a statement of the question.

The SPEAKER stated it to be a motion to suspend the rules, for the purpose of allowing the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CUSHING] to make a statement in relation to Sir Robert Peel's speech on the right of search.

Many members: ["No, no."]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts will reduce his proposition to writing.

Mr. CUSHING said he merely desired to make a statement, derived from a letter received from Mr. Everett, an extract from which he would read.

Mr. GRANGER. If it is a letter from Mr. Everett, let it be sent to the House from the President, officially.

The House then proceeded to vote upon the motion to suspend the rules, for the purpose of hearing Mr. CUSHING's statement. The result of the vote was—yeas 99, nays 55.

So (two-thirds not voting in the affirmative) the rules were not suspended.

Mr. CUSHING intended to read to the House the extract from the speech of Sir Robert Peel of the 2d of February, 1843, and that from a letter of Mr. Everett, minister of the United States in London, which follow, viz:

Extract from Sir Robert Peel's speech.

"Therefore, sir, it will be my duty, in the face of the public, expressing deep regret that there should appear to be any difference of opinion on this topic, explicitly to declare that we have not waived one of the principles contended for by my noble friend (the Earl of Aberdeen) in his despatch of December, 1841; and it is further my duty to declare that that despatch has remained to the present hour unanswered by the Government of the United States. I know, I think, too well what is the ability and what the keenness of a Secretary of State in the United States, to believe that, if doctrines so important as those advanced in the despatch could be questioned, it would have been permitted to remain fourteen months unanswered and unacknowledged, had it been thought wise to contest those principles."

Extract from a despatch from Mr. Everett to Mr. Webster, dated February 3d, 1843.

* * * "I attended the debate in the House of Commons. You can judge of the surprise with which I listened to the remarks of Sir Robert Peel on the alleged fact, that Lord Aberdeen's letter to me of the 20th of December, 1841, remained to this day 'unacknowledged and unanswered.' It was acknowledged by me in a note dated two days afterwards, (23d December, 1841,) which, however unimportant, was transmitted to Mr. Fox by Lord Aberdeen, and afterwards communicated to Parliament, and printed. In this note of acknowledgment, I informed Lord Aberdeen that I should avail myself of an early opportunity of making some remarks on the very important topics treated in the letter. I pursued this course of an immediate acknowledgment of the receipt of Lord Aberdeen's note, with notice of a purpose of replying, in due season, to its contents; because, being just arrived at my post, I had not received the instructions which you had informed me I might soon expect on this topic; and which, as Lord Aberdeen's note modified the ground, and disclaimed the language of his predecessor, it was my duty to await. Such instructions I should, no doubt, in due time, have received; but, on the 27th of December, Lord Aberdeen informed me that the special mission had been determined on; that Lord Ashburton would go to America with full powers to settle every point in discussion, including what was called the right of earch, which he deemed the most difficult; and expressed the opinion that it would be hardly worth while for us to continue the correspondence on matters in dispute between the two countries; and remarked, though he was willing to consider and reply to any statement I might think proper to make on any subject, that, pending the negotiation that might take place at Washington, he supposed no benefit would result from a simultaneous discussion here.

"Such were Lord Aberdeen's observations, as reported by me in my despatch of December 31st. The negotiations took place, and a mode of dealing with and settling the question was happily agreed upon, which made it unnecessary to resume the discussions so long carried on upon the subject. In fact, from the moment the special mission was announced, I considered the discussion at an end; and as little to be resumed in reference to search and visitation, as the boundary or the 'Caroline.'"

STEAMBOATS.

Mr. UNDERWOOD, from the Select Committee on Steamboat Navigation, moved, in obedience to a vote of that committee, that the Committee of the Whole be discharged from the further consideration of the bill to modify the act entitled An act to provide for the better security of the lives of passengers on board of vessels propelled in whole or in part by steam, approved July 7th, 1838.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read.

Mr. FILLMORE moved that the third section, which exempts steamboats propelled by Ericsson's propellers from the law requiring steamboats to be provided with fire-buckets and engines, be stricken out.

Mr. UNDERWOOD opposed the motion, and said the section had been inserted at the instance of numerous petitioners.

Mr. FILLMORE was opposed to the exemption of any kind of steamboat machinery from the operation of a law to which others were subject.

The question was taken; and the motion to strike out the section was carried—ayes 96, noes 45.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time.

The question being on the passage of the bill,

MR. BREWSTER moved a reconsideration of the vote by which the clause exempting boats propelled, in part, by Ericcson's propellers from the penalties imposed for not being provided with fire-engines and additional row-boats, &c., was stricken out. He wished to explain to the House why he thought that clause should be retained. In the summer of 1842, several enterprising citizens of his village constructed a number of vessels, to be impelled partly by sails, and partly by Ericcson's propellers, for the trade of the lakes—and particularly for the purpose of going through the Welland canal. Steamboats constructed in the ordinary way not being able to go through that canal, these gentlemen, together with a number of other citizens, petitioned Congress that the vessels of the above description, thus intended for the lake trade, should be exempted from the penalties of the act of 1838, requiring steamboats to be provided with additional boats and fire-engines, on the ground that they were intended solely for freight-boats, and not for passengers. In the year 1838, when this law was first enacted, purporting to be a law to secure the safety of passengers in steamboats, he (Mr. B.) was presiding over an insurance company; and the question arose whether this law was so calculated to effect the object in view, as to authorize them to diminish the rates of insurance; and, after a full debate, this question was decided in the negative. The question was then agitated, whether the rate of insurance should be raised, and this question was also decided in the negative. The prevalent opinion of the board, however, was, that the law, so far from diminishing the hazard of human life, increased it. As, however, the opposite opinion prevailed here, he would not object to the law, though he thought he could show that it did not accomplish the objects it had in view. He approved of the motive which induced its passage, as it appealed to the best feelings of the human heart; but while they were influenced by their feelings, they should also have some regard to reason. The bill required that the steamboats should be licensed; and who were to give the licenses? Why, the inspectors, who were to be examined as to their qualifications to give them. But who were to examine the examiners? In his opinion, just so far as the responsibility was removed for those immediately in the charge of the steamboats, so far would human life be endangered. In conclusion, Mr. B. appealed to the House to permit those gentlemen engaged in the carrying trade—whose vessels were intended solely for freight, and not for passengers, and which in fact contained no accommodations for passengers whatever—to carry on their commerce without being subjected to the burdensome penalties of the law of 1838. Just in proportion as legislation increased the burdens on the carriers of produce, would it impose burdens on the producers.

Mr. FILLMORE said that, in his motion to strike out the section, he had no reference to the commerce of Oswego, where his friend resided, nor to the insurance offices; but he did not like to see one class of steamboats exempted from the restrictions which were imposed on the others. It was well known that all the steamboats navigating the lakes were propelled, in part, by sails, as well as those which were filled with Ericcson's propellers; and that numbers of the emigrants took passage in these freight boats, because they could travel in them at a less expense. It was to protect the lives of this numerous class, that he thought the restriction should be imposed on the freight boats as well as the passage boats. If the gentleman would consent to an amendment exempting boats filled with Ericcson's propellers, coupled with a condition that they should be prohibited from carrying passengers, he would agree to it.

The question was then taken on the motion for reconsideration, and rejected; and,

Under the operation of the previous question, the bill was passed.

NATIONAL FOUNDRY.

Mr. WM. COST JOHNSON, from the Select Committee on the subject of a National Foundry, reported a bill to establish a foundry for the fabrication of cannon for the use of the army and navy of the United States; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. J. then, by instructions of the committee, offered a resolution that the House should go into Committee of the Whole on the above bill on Friday next, and report the same to the House in half an hour.

Mr. FILLMORE objected to any more special orders.

Mr. JOHNSON made a few remarks, urging the House to adopt the resolution; after which,

The question was taken on the resolution, and it was rejected—ayes 62, noes 66.

Mr. SUMMERS, from the Committee on Contingent Expenses, made a report; which was ordered to be printed.

ELECTRO-MAGNETIC TELEGRAGH.

On motion by Mr. J. P. KENNEDY, the bill making appropriations to test the value of Morse's electro-magnetic telegraph was taken up, and, under the operation of the previous question, passed—ayes 89, noes 83.

On the motion of Mr. W. W. IRWIN, a resolution was adopted, directing the Secretary of the Treasury to communicate to this House the report of Colonel W. Robinson, the commissioner sent to Europe to negotiate a loan for this Government.

DIPLOMATIC CORRESPONDENCE.

Mr. W. C. JOHNSON again submitted his resolution, (which is published in an earlier part of this day's proceedings,) calling upon the President of the United States for certain correspondence with the British Government.

Mr. McKEON rose and submitted his intention to submit the following as an amendment thereto:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to this House, (if not in his opinion incompatible with the public interests,) a copy of the despatch from Lord Aberdeen to the Government of the United States, bearing date December, 1841, in relation to the right of visit of American vessels.

Objection was made, and the resolution was not received.

THE TWO HUNDRED MILLION STOCK.

The question on printing extra numbers of the majority and minority reports of the Committee of Ways and Means on Mr. W. C. JOHNSON's project for the issue of $200,000,000 Government stock, now came up in order.

Mr. POPE (who was entitled to the floor from the previous day) now resumed the debate. He was understood to glance at his own course on this question at several preceding sessions, and to avow his desire to do all he could for the relief of the country; but he considered the proposition of the gentleman from Maryland entirely impracticable. He thought it was due to the people to declare that it could not be adopted. If doubt was thrown upon the subject—if any hope was left to the States for relief from this source, it would induce the States to relax their exertions, and give up all effort to pay their debts. Such schemes as that of issuing $200,000,000 Government stock might do very well for young men like the gentleman, [Mr. JOHNSON;] but he was too old to think of anything so visionary. He had no fear of nullification; nor of a war with England in case of a non-payment of the State debts. He alluded to the present state of the treasury, and the large demands upon it. It was, he thought, discreditable that additional taxes were not imposed, in order to make our revenue equal to our expenditures. It was mere delusion to suppose that the present state of things—the neglect to impose additional duties on articles now free—could long continue. He regretted that there was a disposition manifested by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WISE] and the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, to shift the responsibility away from each other. How could the United States Government aid the States, when its own condition was so far from being sound? He expressed a strong desire to do all that could be done for the relief of the States; but it was useless to hold out any delusion of relief at this time.

He entered into a discussion of the treaty-making power of the Government, and arrived at the conclusion that the consent of the House would be necessary to the fulfilment of any treaty which had to be carried out by money. He alluded to the disposition now manifested by various powers in Europe to treat with the United States on terms of reciprocity of trade; and expressed his opinion strongly and forcibly in favor of the proposition to send a commercial agent to Europe to treat for the removal of the restrictions which now hamper our commerce and navigation. After some further remarks in favor of his own projet for a bank to be based on the public lands, he concluded.

BRANCH MINTS.

The bill amendatory of the act entitled "An act establishing the branch mints of the United States," was taken up, with the amendments of the Senate thereto; and the amendments were concurred in.

MARINE HOSPITALS.

The amendments of the Senate to the bill making appropriations for a marine hospital at Ocracoke, North Carolina, were also concurred in.

Mr. CAMPBELL of South Carolina moved that the House take up the bill to suspend the operations of the districting law.

Mr. ADAMS objected.

Mr. CAMPBELL of South Carolina moved a suspension of the rules; which motion was rejected.

Mr. C. H. WILLIAMS moved that the House go into Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering the bill reported by the Committee on Military Affairs, to divide the military districts of the United States; but the motion was rejected without a division.

Mr. FILLMORE submitted a resolution that all debate in Committee of the Whole, on the harbor bill, should cease at four o'clock to day, when the committee should proceed to vote on the pending amendments; and called for the previous question on the resolution.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON hoped that the gentleman would allow a little more time for debate.

Mr. FILLMORE said that the House might dispose of the resolution as it thought proper. He would, however, withdraw the call for the previous question, in order that any gentleman might offer an amendment to extend the time.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON then moved to amend the resolution by substituting 3 o'clock to-morrow, for the time fixed in the resolution; but the motion was rejected.

Mr. MERIWETHER moved to lay the resolution on the table: rejected.

The question was then taken on the adoption of the resolution, and it was decided in the affirmative—ayes 85, noes 77.

GENERAL APPROPRIATION BILLS.

On the motion of Mr. FILLMORE, the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, (Mr. GILMER in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the harbors and rivers appropriation bill, from yesterday—being one of the batch of general appropriation bills reported by the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. RANDOLPH was entitled to the floor; but he gave way to

Mr. R. W. THOMPSON, who gave notice of an amendment which he intended to offer when he got the opportunity—the purport of which was understood to be, to set apart $300,000 of this appropriation to be expended in the States of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois.

Mr. RANDOLPH then proceeded, and directed himself particularly to certain statistical statements and financial documents, to prove to the House that, if this bill were passed, the treasury would be in a condition to meet the expenditure which it proposed to make.

Mr. J. L. WHITE next addressed the committee, and chiefly in reply to the remarks made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. BARNARD] on yesterday.

The debate was further continued by Messrs. BARNARD and GIDDINGS.

The hour having expired for the termination of debate, the committee proceeded to vote on the amendments proposed.

Mr. TILLINGHAST submitted an amendment to appropriate a sum for the survey of a harbor in Block island; which was negatived.

Mr. STEENROD offered the following amendment; which was agreed to:

Provided, That, of the sum appropriated for the Cumberland road, $25,000 of the same shall be appropriated for continuing the Cumberland road in Virginia, and the purchase of materials for the construction of a bridge over the Ohio river, at Wheeling, Virginia.

Mr. REYNOLDS offered an amendment, providing that an appropriation should be made of $2 000 for the survey of the route for the national road from Vandalia, by Greenville, to Alton, in the State of Illinois; said survey to be made under the direction of the Secretary of War, who will report the amount of money necessary to construct the said road from Vandalia to Alton.

The amendment was negatived.

A great variety of amendments were offered by gentlemen for the appropriation of sums to improve rivers and harbors near the respective districts which they represent; the whole of which were negatived. The movers were Messrs. HOWARD, ANDREWS of Ohio, RANDALL of Maine, BOTTS, (to improve James river, $30,000,) REYNOLDS, J. P. KENNEDY, WILLIAMS of Connecticut, SALTONSTALL, J. CAMPBELL, BOARDMAN, FESSENDEN, W. B. CAMPBELL, J. L. THOMPSON, TILLINGHAST, MALLORY, (for the improvement of the Dismal Swamp,) LEVY, J. R. INGERSOLL, RAYNER, PLUMER, (for the improvement of the Alleghany river from Pittsburg, Pennsylvania, to Olean, New York, $50,000,) J. C. EDWARDS, (for further improving the harbor of St. Louis, in the State of Missouri, $25,000,) HUNT, FILLMORE, and others.

Mr. HOLMES offered an amendment appropriating $5,000,000 for opening a communication between the Atlantic and Pacific oceans, by way of the isthmus of Darien.

Mr. TILLINGHAST offered, as an amendment to the amendment, $100,000 for Hell-gate, in New York.

This amendment was rejected—ayes 66, noes 69.

Mr. J. P. KENNEDY moved, as an amendment to the amendment, a clause appropriating $50,000 for enclosing the harbor of Charleston, South Carolina: agreed to.

The question then recurred on the amendment as amended, and it was rejected.

Mr. YORKE offered an amendment appropriating $5,000 for Delaware river: rejected.

Mr. WISE moved that the committee rise: rejected—66 to [illegible].

Mr. WELLER moved to reduce the appropriation for the Hudson river from $153,000 to $50,000: rejected.

On motion of Mr. FILLMORE, the appropriation for the Mississippi, Missouri, Ohio, and Arkansas rivers, was stricken out.

Mr. CHITTENDEN offered an amendment making an appropriation for Black river, New York, and for Sackett's Harbor: rejected.

Mr. GRAHAM moved that the committee rise, and report the bill, with a recommendation that it be rejected.

After some confusion and discussion on points of order, the motion was carried—ayes 97, noes 75.

The committee then rose, and reported the bill, with the recommendation that it be not passed.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON moved that it be laid on the table.

Mr. FILLMORE asked for the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and resulted—yeas 107, nays 87, as follows:

Mr. S. said that the bill had been amended to correspond with the Senate bill which had been reported from the Committee on Public Lands.

Resolved, That on and after Monday next, the hour of meeting shall be 10 o'clock; and that the Senate take a recess on each day from 3 to 5 o'clock.

EXPUNGING RESOLUTIONS.

Mr. BAYARD made an ineffectual effort to have taken up for consideration the resolutions which he introduced in the early part of the session, to rescind the expunging resolutions. He made this effort, in accordance with instructions from the Legislature of the State of Delaware.

Mr. BATES, under instructions from the Committee on Pensions, moved the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the bills from that committee, and to postpone the previous orders of the day for that purpose.

The motion was disagreed to.

Several adverse reports from standing committees on private claims were taken up, and concurred in.

Mr. BAYARD presented a memorial from Thomas Harris, and other surgeons in the navy, praying Congress not to reduce their pay; which was referred to the Committee on Retrenchment.

Mr. BENTON submitted the following resolution, which lies one day on the table, under the rule, viz:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested, if compatible with his sense of the public interest, to communicate to the Senate a copy of the despatch received from Mr. Everett, dated the 3d of February instant; also, a copy of the despatch of Lord Aberdeen of December, 1841, to the American Secretary of State; and a copy of the answer, if any, which was given by the American Secretary to that despatch.

The Senate then proceeded to consider the bills on the calendar, when the following bills from the House were taken up as in committee of the whole, considered, reported to the Senate, and passed, viz:

The act for the relief of Joseph Hover and Abelard Guthrie;

[This bill was amended on the recommendation of the Committee on Public Lands.]

The act for the relief of William G. Saunders;

The act for the relief of John Wharry;

The act for the relief of Benjamin J. Totten;

The act granting to James Lowe $1,000 and a section of land;

The act for the relief of William Allen;

[This bill was amended on the recommendation of the Committee on Naval Affairs.]

The bill from the House, entitled "An act for the relief of Mary Williams, widow of Jacob Williams, deceased," was taken up as in committee of the whole, on an amendment recommended by the Committee on Pensions. The amendment having been agreed to, the bill was reported to the Senate, the amendment ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time. [This bill was subsequently passed.]

The Senate bill to continue in force the act for the final adjustment of private land claims in the State of Missouri, approved the 9th July, 1832, and the act supplemental thereto, approved the 2d March, 1833, was taken up as in committee of the whole, considered, reported to the Senate, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The bill from the House for the relief of Mary Crawford, was taken up as in committee of the whole, on an adverse report from the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. WILLIAMS, a member of the Committee on Naval Affairs, who had presented the adverse report, stated that he had fallen into an error, and asked permission to withdraw the report from the Senate.

Permission was granted.

Mr. BUCHANAN then explained the peculiar merits of the case. Mr. Crawford, the late husband of the widow for whose benefit the bill was, lost his life in an attempt to save a sailor from drowning.

No amendment being proposed to the bill, it was reported to the Senate, read the third time, and passed.

The following bills from the House were taken up as in committee of the whole, on adverse reports of committees: and being considered, were indefinitely postponed, viz:

The bill for the relief of Richard Marsh;

The bill for the relief of Alice Usher was taken up as in committee of the whole.

This bill proposed to give a pension to the widow of a soldier who deserted from the service during the Revolution. Those belonging to the Pension Committee, who had examined the case, maintained that, notwithstanding it appeared by the muster-rolls that the soldier deserted, yet they were satisfied, from the mass of parol testimony before the committee, that the muster-roll was incorrect; or that if the individual did desert, yet he must have again resumed service.

Those who opposed the bill maintained that it having appeared by the muster-roll that the individual deserted, and there being no record of his having returned to service, they were bound to take it as conclusive evidence that he did not return to service; and they were unwilling to discredit a muster-roll by parol testimony—testimony, too, which, considering the imperfection of human memory, could not be relied upon after the lapse of so many years. The bill was defended by Messrs. PHELPS, BATES, and HUNTINGTON; and opposed by Messrs. KING, BAGBY, CALHOUN, SMITH of Connecticut, and WOODBURY; when

Mr. KING moved that the bill be indefinitely postponed; and, on that motion demanded the yeas and nays, which were ordered; and the question being put, the bill was indefinitely postponed—yeas 20, nays 19.

THE BANKRUPT ACT.

The Senate bill for the repeal of this act having been reported upon adversely by the Committee on the Judiciary, was indefinitely postponed.

The House bill for the repeal of the bankrupt law, with the amendments proposed by the Committee on the Judiciary, was then taken up for consideration as in committee of the whole; and the amendments were read.

Mr. BERRIEN, after a few prefatory remarks in relation to the vacillation which would be chargeable on the legislation of the national councils, should the bankrupt act be now repealed, alluded to the instructions of the States, and regretted that, in consequence of them, he had to appeal to Senators whose ears were rendered deaf to all argument; but, at the same time, he declared that, although he, too, had been forbidden by the Legislature of his State to utter a word against repeal, his duty as an American Senator forbade him to obey such instructions.

He assumed that there was in the Senate a decided majority in favor of a commercial bankrupt law. When, therefore, he presented these amendments, the object of which was simply to convert the act already on the statute-book into a mere commercial bankrupt law; and when he was met with the objection that there was not time to investigate their merits at so late a period of the session, he would reply, that if there was not time, it was owing to the unprofitable discussions which had originated on the objecting side of the Senate; and if the argument of want of time was good in regard to the amendments, it was equally good as to the full investigation of the existing necessity for repealing the law. If there was not time to remodel it, there was not to repeal it. The natural deduction, then, was, that the law should be let alone, at least till next session. But the amendments proposed by the Committee on the Judiciary were not obnoxious to the objection of want of time. The modification of the existing law had been the subject of anxious deliberation with the Judiciary Committee during the whole of the present session; and all the lights of judicial inquiry and experience had been consulted. The result of this consideration had been the amendments now proposed. All the evils that had been complained of had been done away with, by the great mass of insolvency having been swept away within the last twelve months; and, from this time forth, the law will have to act prospectively. Now, then, was the accepted time to establish a permanent commercial system of bankruptcy, suitable to the wants and advantages of a great commercial nation.

He then proceeded to explain the objects and expected operations of the various amendments.

The first proposition is, that so much of the existing law as relates to voluntary bankruptcy shall be repealed, and to substitute the provisions of the bankrupt law of the 6th of William IV. Any insolvent may go before the district court and file the declaration of his insolvency, which authorizes any creditor to sue out a commission of bankruptcy; after which, the proceedings are to be the same as in cases of involuntary bankruptcy. This section is subject to various conditions, all explained in the amendment itself.

The next three amendments were definitions of the persons who may be made bankrupts, and the acts which constitute acts of bankruptcy.

The fifth amendment relates to conveyances and assignments of a debtor's property, which are made acts of bankruptcy.

The remaining amendments relate to the choice of assignees by a majority in value of creditors; the certificate of discharge by the same majority; undivided responsibility in partnerships; regulations of the proceedings in court; and proof of debts.

He contended that the deliberate consideration of these modifications was within the time which might yet be devoted to the subject, before the expiration of this session. He next read extracts from the answers received by the Secretary of State, to inquiries made of the judiciary throughout the States, as to the operation of the law. He concluded that the States, classed as they were, into agricultural States and commercial States, were guided by their classification in the opinions they had expressed on the subject of repeal. The commercial states, chiefly interested in the benefits to be derived from a bankrupt law, desired the continuance of the law, properly modified; while the agricultural States, feeling that the benefits of a bankrupt law would be felt most by the commercial States, and that, in the main, such a law was not essential to themselves, were in favor of its repeal. This view of the agricultural States, he contended, was not founded in correct principles; for the interests of the commercial States were also the interests of the agricultural States. He denied that the frauds and evils predicted had resulted from the operation of the bankrupt law. The number of voluntary applications for the benefit of the law had been but 32,899; 341 cases at the instance of creditors; 50 applications not acted upon; 34 in which discharges were refused; the whole number acted upon being 12,024. But the beneficial operation of the law had been felt chiefly in the compromises enforced by it upon contesting debtors and creditors. Gentlemen who anticipated that 500,000 bankrupts would instantly rush for the benefit of the law—and the least calculation was 100,000—should now see that when so small a number as 32,000 applications, in reality, had been made, the indirect benefits of the law must have been most conclusive in its favor. He also dwelt upon the evidence of the returns; that out of 12,000 cases acted upon, only thirty had been refused their discharge on the ground of fraud. Mr. B. then summed up his reasons why the law should not be repealed. He also stated his reasons for the continuation of the law, properly modified.

In conclusion, he contended that the repeal of the law would act most injuriously on the credit of the country abroad.

Mr. WALKER wished to offer an amendment; which was read, as follows:

And be it further enacted, That, when any private incorporated banking company shall fail, upon presentment to said bank of any of its notes, checks, or bills, to pay and redeem the same in specie, said failure shall be regarded as an act of bankruptcy; and the holder of said note, check, or bill, so neglected to be paid as aforesaid, may, upon affidavit of the facts, sworn to by said individual and at least two disinterested witnesses, proceed against said company as bankrupts, as in other cases specified in this act: and the same proceedings shall be had as in other cases; except that no certificate of discharge shall be deemed necessary or proper to be given to any stockholder of said company, except in cases where such stockholders may be personally responsible for the debts of such company; and, in such case, said stockholders shall be discharged, upon the same terms and restrictions as in the other cases of final discharge authorized by this act.

Mr. WALKER observed that he did not wish at all to obstruct the action of the Senate. But he felt bound to make the motion, in conformity with instructions from the Legislature of his own State. He had originally voted for the bankrupt bill, in obedience to instructions; and since the period of its passage, the Legislature of his State had instructed him to do two things: in the first place, to endeavor to make the bill more protective of the rights of creditors; and, secondly, to include banking incorporations within the compulsory provisions of the bill. The amendments proposed by the Judiciary Committee would accomplish his first object; and it was the purpose of the amendment which he had just laid upon the table to effect the second.

Mr. BERRIEN said the ordinary course was to dispose of the amendments proposed by the committee first. If the committee's amendments are adopted, the Senator, having voted for them, can move his amendment; if rejected in committee, the Senator can then vote against the committee's amendments, on the ground that his amendment had been rejected.

Mr. KING said there appeared to him no difficulty in the case. When an amendment was offered, whether reported by a committee, or presented by an individual, it was subject to be amended. He thought it strictly in order to take the question upon the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi to the amendments of the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. BERRIEN was proceeding to reply, when

The CHAIR considered this a distinct proposition, not analogous to the amendments or report of the committee; and that it was, therefore, proper first to dispose of the committee's amendments.

Mr. KING contended that the question being on the committee's amendments, it certainly was competent first to amend them and make them perfect.

The CHAIR still considered it was not competent to introduce a new substantive proposition.

Mr. WALKER desired it to be understood that he had no wish to obstruct the action of the Senate upon this subject; but his position was very peculiar, for, unless the amendment he had offered be adopted, as well as those reported by the committee, he would be compelled to vote for the repeal of the bankrupt bill unconditionally.

Mr. CHOATE hoped the amendment of the Senator would be printed. As he understood it, the object was to reach banks not paying specie, as well as insolvent banks. He wished to have time to consider the amendment, and therefore wished it to be printed.

The CHAIR said that when the first amendment came up, the first of the Senator's amendments might be offered as an amendment to the amendment.

Mr. BERRIEN observed that such a course of proceeding would necessarily involve inconsistencies.

After some general discussion on the point of order,

The CHAIR put the question to the Senate whether the consideration should be given to the amendments of the committee, or those proposed by the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. KING explained his views of the propriety of sustaining the right of amending an amendment.

Mr. EVANS ask in what particular form the Senator proposed to move his amendments. If he chose to move it as an amendment to that section describing the persons who may be bankrupts, it would be perfectly in order; but certainly not as regards the first section.

Mr. WALKER, to obviate all difficulty, would move it as an amendment to the 4th section.

Mr. BERRIEN explained.

Mr. WALKER would greatly prefer if the Senate would allow the vote to be taken on his amendment; because, if he had to vote on the first three sections, it would be on propositions adverse to the repeal of the law.

Mr. ARCHER said he did not see how it would commit the Senator to vote for the first three sections, on the supposition that his amendments would prevail; because he could reserve his vote, should his amendments fail, when the bill was reported back to the Senate.

It was proposed that the Senate adjourn, or go into executive session—the amendments of the Senator from Mississippi being ordered to be printed.

The discussion was continued on the priority of amendments by Messrs. CONRAD, BUCHANAN, and WALKER; when

Mr. EVANS hoped the bill would pass over informally.

Mr. CRITTENDEN hoped not; but

Mr. TALLMADGE suggested that the Senate was not full, and that it would be better to fix an hour to-morrow for proceeding with the subject.

The CHAIR observed, that there was an objection to passing it over informally. It might be laid on the table, or postponed, but not passed over informally; objection being made.

Mr. TALLMADGE moved to postpone the bill till to-morrow.

This was decided in the negative—yeas 16, nays 17.

Mr. BUCHANAN called for a division of the question on the amendments.

Mr. BENTON suggested the propriety of taking the whole as one amendment; and, to give time for consideration, he moved to postpone the subject till to-morrow at 12 o'clock.

Mr. EVANS took the ground that the whole of the amendments could be considered only as one amendment; and it was unquestionably in order, for the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi was first in order as an amendment to that amendment.

The CHAIR then decided that the motion of the Senator from Mississippi was in order.

Mr. BERRIEN objected; and, wishing for time to consider the amendment, moved to postpone the subject till to-morrow at 12 o'clock.

The question of postponement was carried—ayes 20, noes 16

Mr. EVANS submitted the report of the Committee of Conference on the disagreeing votes in relation to so much of the army bill as authorized the appointment of ten cadets from the country at large. The report of the committee was, that the House recede from its disagreement to the Senate's amendment.

The report was concurred in.

The PRESIDENT pro tem. laid before the Senate a communication from the Treasury Department, stating that the annual statement on commerce and navigation could not be completed in time to transmit to Congress before the adjournment, and recommending that power be given to the Secretary of the Senate to receive it, and have it printed during the recess.

Mr. HUNTINGTON moved an order giving the Secretary of the Senate authority to receive, and to have printed, 2,000 copies of the statement above, in addition to the usual quantity.

Messrs. KING and ARCHER objected to the printing of so many, as useless.

Messrs. EVANS and HUNTINGTON maintained that it was a document of great importance to the commercial community, and hoped 2,000 copies additional would be printed.

Mr. BENTON suggested a modification of the number to 520; which suggestion the mover of the motion refused to yield to.

Mr. WALKER then suggested 1,500 copies. This was received; and the order, thus modified, was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tem. laid before the Senate a communication from the Treasury Department, covering statements showing the official emoluments and expenses of the officers of the customs; which was ordered to be printed.

Also, laid before the Senate a communication from the War Department, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of the 21st instant, a copy of the contract entered into by Robert Fulton for the construction of certain steamers; which, on motion of Mr. YOUNG, was ordered to be printed.

Also, laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, transmitting, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of the 20th instant, a report from the State Department, of the correspondence relating to the quintuple treaty; which was, on motion by Mr. BENTON, ordered to be printed.

On motion by Mr. ALLEN, the Senate then adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, February 24, 1843.

Mr. McCLELLAN of New York presented the petition of Hannah Parkman and others, of the city of Hudson, New York, praying an extension of the widows' pension act of July, 1838.

MILITARY DISTRICTS.

Mr. C. H. WILLIAMS asked the favor of the House to discharge the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union from the further consideration of the bill to divide the United States into two military divisions.

Mr. GOGGIN opposed the motion; and alleged, as a reason for its not being adopted, that the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs was absent.

Mr. C. H. WILLIAMS said the bill was a bantling of his own, and therefore he thought he ought to be permitted to nurse it, without waiting for the members of the Military Committee to return from New Jersey, Philadelphia, and all about the Union.

The question was taken on the motion to discharge the Committee of the Whole from the further consideration of the bill, and resulted—yeas 63, nays 28. No quorum.

The following bills from the Senate were read the first and second time, and referred:

An act providing for holding a circuit court at Williamsport, in the western district of Pennsylvania: referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, after an ineffectual effort, on the part of Mr. BINLACK, to have it taken up and passed.

An act for the relief of the West Feliciana Railroad Company: referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

The navy appropriation bill, returned from the Senate with amendments, was taken up; and, after the amendment had been read, was referred, on motion of Mr. FILLMORE, to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Navy, in relation to the arrivals of American vessels in foreign ports: laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Also, a communication from the Treasury Department, showing the number and compensation of the clerks employed in that department.

Also, a report from the Post Office Department, made in compliance with the provisions of the act of 2d July, 1836, showing the operations of that department for the past year; both of which were laid on the table and ordered to be printed.

The SPEAKER communicated certain resolves of the Territorial Legislature of Wisconsin; which were laid on the table and ordered to be printed.

MILITARY DISTRICTS.

Mr. C. H. WILLIAMS renewed his motion to discharge the Committee of the Whole from the bill to divide the United States into two military districts; which motion was decided in the affirmative—ayes 88, noes not counted.

Mr. W. then moved to take up the bill for consideration.

Mr. GRANGER objected.

Mr. C. H. WILLIAMS moved a suspension of the rules; which motion was lost.

Mr. JOHN CAMPBELL moved to take up the bill (No. 649) to suspend the operation of the second section of the act for the apportionment of Representatives among the several States, so far as the same may affect the election of members of the 28th Congress.

Mr. FILLMORE said he would not object, provided the gentleman would move also to take up the bill regulating the taking of testimony in cases of contested elections.

Mr. JOHN CAMPBELL said that he had no objection to take up that bill when the other was disposed of.

Mr. TURNEY objecting,

Mr. JOHN CAMPBELL moved to suspend the rules so far as they regarded the above two bills; which motion was carried—ayes 117, noes 30.

The bill suspending the operations of the second section of the apportionment bill was then taken up and read.

Mr. JOHN CAMPBELL said that the object of this bill was simply to suspend the operations of the second section of the act for the apportionment of Representatives among the several States, so far as it affected the election of members of the next Congress. From present circumstances, there was every reason to believe that the preceding clauses of the apportionment law would go quietly into operation, notwithstanding the loud clamor that was raised at it in various parts of the country at the time of its passage. In every case but one, the people had given unequivocal evidence that it met their approval; and that single exception was the State of New Hampshire, which he had no doubt would, in time, be induced to support it. But the condition of things in New Hampshire was not the only obstacle to carrying the law into operation. In the State of Georgia, the elections came on previous to the time of the meeting of their Legislature; and though the Legislature on its meeting proceeded almost immediately to divide the State into congressional districts for the twenty-ninth Congress, yet the elections for the twenty-eighth Congress having already taken place, they had no power under the constitution to set them aside, and order new elections. The same state of things had happened in Missouri; but he was informed that a majority of the people of that State were in favor of the district system, and they would eventually adopt it.

Mr. J. C. EDWARDS said that the gentleman was mistaken—a majority of the Legislature believed that the act of Congress was unconstitutional.

Mr. CAMPBELL said that he would waive that point for the present; it was not necessary for his argument. Nearly a similar state of things existed in Mississippi as in Georgia and Missouri. Under these circumstances, it appeared to him, that not only sound policy, but justice required the passage of this law, or one of a similar character. If they refused to do it, they must exclude from Congress the representatives of three States, which have had no opportunity to comply with the provisions of the apportionment act. Persons who had been elected in these States would present themselves, claiming their seats here; and a collision would probably take place, such as had never been witnessed in this country. It was true the Governor of Georgia had vetoed the bill passed by the Legislature of his State for laying it off into congressional districts; but this did not weaken the claim of the people of that State to be represented here in the next Congress. It only showed that the Governor had such a contempt for the opinion of his constituents, that he would not permit them to judge for themselves, whether the law was for their interest or not. At the next meeting of the Legislature, the State will have a Chief Magistrate willing to carry the views of the people into effect.

It might seem out of place for him, at this time, to enter into any argument in favor of the apportionment law; but he could not refrain from noticing a few of the considerations which, it appeared to him, ought to recommend it to favorable notice. One of its most important advantages was the securing equality and uniformity in elections. It could not fail to be perceived that the greatest inequality had hitherto existed. Thus, a State which elected by general ticket, with one-seventh of the population of the great State of New York, outvoted that great State three times to one. If gentlemen would make the calculation, they would find that every citizen of New Jersey exercised twenty times the political power of a citizen of New York. He might go on with the illustration, and show that New Hampshire outvoted Pennsylvania, with three times her population. Gentlemen who would observe the signs of the times, would be convinced that this was an evil that was growing, and that would soon force every one of the States to adopt the general-ticket system.

He then pointed out the tendency of the general-ticket system to produce sectional divisions, dangerous even to the existence of the Union itself. The reason why the people of this country were the most obedient to law of any people on the face of the earth, was simply because they believed that they lived under a Government of their own creation, and in which, therefore, they could place confidence. But the modus operandi of the general-ticket system—the nomination of a ticket at some central point for which the people must vote, though the candidates were entirely unknown to them, or they need not vote at all—placed the possessors of the franchise at the mercy of a central oligarchy; and thus distrust and dissatisfaction were occasioned. There were many other considerations, equal in importance to those he had mentioned—yea, even much greater—which must recommend the scheme he advocated to the American people. But as the subject was fully discussed at the last session of Congress, and as all those questions had been long before the people, he should allude to a few only. The first to which he would allude was its importance in restoring the Democratic principle of Government, which was now entirely destroyed. The next was, its importance in preserving the influence of the small States from the vortex into which the adoption of the general-ticket system would ingulf them—a crisis to which they were fast hastening. Further its importance as a restoration of the voice of representatives, who were now entirely silenced by the general-ticket system. In addition to these, he enumerated other important points, and then appealed to the House to pursue a system of conciliation and compromise, which was found at the foundation of our Government.

He pursued his remarks at some length, and entreated the House to avoid the scenes which must be witnessed at the commencement of the next Congress, if some such measure were not agreed upon. He then replied to some legal objections which had been raised, and by eminent authority showed that this was not such an ex post facto law as the Constitution forbade. He quoted largely from Dallas's reports, the opinions of Mr. Justice Chase, and Chief Justice Marshall, and likewise from the report of the Committee of Elections, in which this question was fully discussed.

He concluded his remarks by expressing the hope that the bill would be allowed to pass, and thereby avoid much confusion which would ensue at the next meeting of Congress, and which would, he thought, inevitably result; from the fact that, however disposed the House might be to repeal the present law directing the States to district their territory, such a measure could not pass the Senate.

Mr. FILLMORE obtained the floor, and moved the previous question.

Mr. TURNEY moved that the bill be laid on the table.

Mr. JOHN CAMPBELL asked for the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

The question was taken on laying the bill on the table, and resulted—yeas 71, nays 115, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Allen, Babcock, Barnard, Birdseye, Blair, Boardman, Botts, Briggs, Bronson, Jeremiah Brown, Burnell, Caruthers, John C. Clark, Staley N. Williams, Wise, Wood, and Augustus Young—115.

The question recurring on the motion for the previous question,

Mr. MARK A. COOPER rose, and respectfully requested the gentleman from New York [Mr. FILLMORE] to withdraw the previous question for a few moments. Mr. C. said his friend from South Carolina [Mr. CAMPBELL] had assumed to take the Governor of Georgia to task here, for an official act performed. He (Mr. C.) would be happy to have an opportunity to put his friend from South Carolina right in this assumption, and to enable him to entertain some just views of State rights.

Mr. FILLMORE refused to withdraw the previous question; the call for which was sustained, and the main question ordered to be now put.

The bill was then ordered to its engrossment; and, having been read a third time,

Mr. FILLMORE called the previous question on the passage; which was sustained.

The yeas and nays were taken, and resulted—yeas 90, nays 91, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Arnold, Arrington, Atherton, Barton, Beeson, Bidlack, Borden, Bowne, Brewster, Aaron V. Brown, Burke, William Butler, William O. Butler, John Campbell, William B. Campbell, Thomas J. Williams, Winthrop, Wise, Yorke, Augustus Young, and John Young—91.

So the bill was rejected.

Mr. HOLMES then observed that he was one of those who believed that righteousness exalteth a nation. He would, therefore, move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole, to take up the French spoliation bill, and do justice.

Mr. MALLORY moved a reconsideration of the vote just taken, on rejecting the bill to suspend the operations of the apportionment act, and moved the previous question on the motion. Mr. M. however, withdrew the motion at the request of Mr. WISE, who promised to renew it, after making an explanation.

Mr. WISE said that he voted for the bill fixing the ratio of representation, because he believed that it was necessary, and ought to pass, and he did so, though he believed that the second section was a nullity, and would be set aside by the next Congress. Now this bill proposed to repeal the section of a law, which he believed to be a nullity; and for him to vote for it, would be to declare that he believed that section to be operative. With this explanation, he would renew the motion for the previous question.

The previous question was then seconded, and the main question ordered; when

Mr. JOHN CAMPBELL called for the yeas and nays on the main question; which were ordered, and resulted in yeas 93, nays 100, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Arnold, Arrington, Atherton, Barton, Beeson, Bidlack, Borden, Bowne, Brewster, Briggs, Aaron V. Brown, Charles Brown, Burke, William Butler, Wm. O. Butler, Patrick C. Caldwell, John Campbell, William B. Campbell, Casey, Clinton, Coles, Mark A. Cooper, Cowen, Cranston, Cross, Cushing, Daniel, Richard D. Davis, Dawson, Doan, Doig, Ferris, John G. Floyd, Charles A. NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Allen, Landaff W. Andrews, S. Andrews, Aycrigg, Babcock, Baker, Barnard, Birdseye, Blair, Boardman, Botts, Brockway, Bronson, Milton Brown, Jeremiah Brown, Burnell, Calhoun, Caruthers, Childs, Chittenden, John C. Clark, Staley N. Clarke, James Cooper, Cravens, Crawford, Garrett Davis, Deberry, John Edwards, John C. Edwards, Everett, Fessenden, Fillmore, Thomas F. Foster, Giddings, William O. Goode, Gordon, Graham, Granger, Green, Hall, Hays, Henry, Hopkins, Howard, Hudson, Hunt, Joseph R. Ingersoll, James Irvin, William W. Irwin, James, Isaac D. Jones, John P. Kennedy, Andrew Kennedy, King, Linn, Abraham McClellan, McKay, McKennan, Alfred Marshall, Mathiot, Mattocks, Maxwell, Maynard, Meriwether, Morgan, Morris, Morrow, Osborne, Owsley, Pope, Powell, Ramsey, Benjamin Randall, Alexander Randall, Randolph, Rayner, Ridgway, William Russell, James M. Williams, Winthrop, Wise, Augustus Young, and John Young—100.

So the motion for reconsideration was rejected.

Mr. GWIN said that he was temporarily out of the hall, on business, when his name was called. He was anxious to vote for a reconsideration of the vote rejecting the bill.

The SPEAKER said, if there was no objection, the gentleman could vote.

Mr. BRONSON objected.

CONTESTED ELECTION BILL.

The SPEAKER announced the bill to regulate the taking of testimony in cases of contested elections, and for other purposes, to be now in order.

Mr. SAUNDERS moved to lay the bill on the table.

The yeas and nays were called for, and ordered; and, being taken, resulted—yeas 86, nays 110, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Arrington, Atherton, Beeson, Bowne, Brewster, Aaron V. Brown, Charles Brown, Burke, William Butler, William O. Butler, Patrick C. Caldwell, Cary, Clinton, Coles, Mark A. Williams, Winthrop, Yorke, Augustus Young, and John Young—110.

So the motion to lay on the table was not carried.

Mr. HALSTED moved to amend the bill so as to make it precisely like the bill passed at the last session, and the amendment was agreed to.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed under the operation of the previous question, and it was read a third time; and the question recurred on its passage, on which Mr. FILLMORE moved the previous question.

Mr. WELLER called for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill, which he said had been hurried through in such profound silence, that they scarcely knew what it was. [Loud cries of "Oh, it's the bill which Captain Tyler pocketed at the close of the last session;" and counter cries of "Well, as there are not ten days of the session remaining, he may pocket it again."]

The yeas and nays being taken, resulted—yeas 105, nays 82, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Allen, Landaff W. Andrews, Sherlock J. Andrews, Arnold, Aycrigg, Babcock, Baker, Barnard, Birdseye, Blair, Boardman, Borden, Botts, Briggs, Brockway, Bronson, Milton Brown, Jeremiah Brown, Burnell, Calhoun, William B. Campbell, Thomas J. So the bill was passed.

Mr. FILLMORE then rose and moved that the House resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

After much confusion, and a variety of questions of order, the motion to go into committee was put, and carried; and Mr. FESSENDEN took the chair.

Mr. GWIN moved to take up Senate bill to refund the fine imposed on General Jackson at New Orleans.

Mr. FILLMORE proposed to take up the civil and diplomatic appropriation bill.

Mr. GWIN hoped the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means would permit the committee to consider this bill, in order that a vote might be taken upon it in the House. He did not desire to discuss it. He wanted action, and he hoped action would be had on the bill.

Mr. FILLMORE would not object if it did not lead to discussion; otherwise he must, as it was his duty to press the appropriation bills.

Mr. ADAMS said he wished to discuss the bill for the relief of Gen. Jackson.

Mr. FILLMORE rose to a point of order. Do not the appropriation bills have precedence of all others for consideration in Committee of the Whole.

The CHAIR decided that they had.

Mr. GWIN inquired whether a vote would not be taken upon his motion to take up first the bill to refund the fine imposed on General Jackson.

The CHAIR decided not.

Mr. CUSHING named the bill to execute the treaty of Washington.

Mr. WINTHROP named the light-house bill.

Mr. J. C. EDWARDS named the bill allowing certain drawbacks.

Mr. MEDILL named the Senate bill for the occupation of Oregon.

The CHAIR read the 75th rule of the House; according to which, general appropriation bills are to have preference over other bills, unless a majority of the committee should otherwise order.

The question was taken on the motion to proceed to the consideration of the civil and diplomatic appropriation bill, and it was carried—ayes 85, noes 52.

CIVIL AND DIPLOMATIC APPROPRIATION BILL.

The bill making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic service of the United States for the fiscal year, beginning June 30, 1843, to the 30th of June, 1844, was taken up and read.

Mr. G. DAVIS offered the following amendment as an additional clause to the appropriation for books, maps, &c., for the State Department:

For the payment of all claims which T. Allen has against the United States for printing 20 000 copies of the Compendium or Abridgement of the Sixth Census by counties and principal towns; together with the tables of apportionment, as prepared at the State Department for the use of Congress, the sum of $15,849 64; and for the payment of all claims which Blair & Rives have against the United States for printing 10,000 copies of the same document, $8,924 82.

Mr. G. DAVIS called for the reading of the report of the select committee on the subject of the printing of the Compendium of the Sixth Census, and it was read.

The amendment was agreed to nem. con.

When the clause making an appropriation for the surveyor general of Iowa was read—

Mr. DODGE of Iowa offered an amendment, providing that the said surveyor general shall reside within the district for which he is surveyor general, and discharge the duties of the said office.

Mr. D. stated that he offered the amendment which he had just sent to the Chair, under a solemn sense of duty to his constituents, and to the public service. He had no personal ill feeling towards the present incumbent to gratify. But, sir, (said Mr. D.) the absence of the present incumbent, General James Wilson, from his post, has been so frequent, and so long protracted, as to call aloud for remedy or redress. It has been not only the subject of animadversion in the public press of the Territory and of the country; but, sir, it has been brought to my attention, as Delegate, in numerous letters, from gentlemen of the highest respectability, residing in the town of Dubuque—where the office is by law located—and in that vicinity. One of these letters (said Mr. D.) I will send to the Chair, that an extract, which I have marked, may be read, for the information of the House. The extract is as follows:

DUBUQUE, IOWA TERRITORY,
December 13, A.D. 1842.

DEAR SIR: I venture to trouble you on a subject that has become one of general complaint. I refer to the law of Congress, establishing the surveyor general's office for Wisconsin and Iowa. There is no provision in that act, requiring the surveyor general to reside at the place where he is to keep his office; the consequence is, that the present incumbent, James Wilson, esq., resides with his family, about two thousand miles hence; and the consequence of that is, that out of the twenty months he has enjoyed the emoluments of that office, he has not been here six months, all counted. If this is not an outrage, then I know not what is. When Mr. Ellis and General Jones had the office, they were obliged to have their residence at this place. I have not the least doubt but that Congress intended that, by locating the office here, it also intended the incumbent should be located in the same place; but the ingenuity of some folks is a caution. Here is one specimen: by locating the office here, means that the office-holder may reside two thousand miles off. I think you would have no difficulty in getting an amendment to that law, so as to requir, the incumbent to reside here with his family, if he has any as well as keep his office here. You must be very careful in framing the amendment, or Yankee cunning will get the bitter of it. I am a Yankee myself, but I do abominate [illegible] tongued silver-headed office seekers, and broken down politicians, playing such games with Western good nature.

Mr. FILLMORE inquired who was the writer of the letter.

Mr. DODGE replied that he did not wish to give the name of his correspondent, his permission to do so not having been given in the letter; but he would tell the gentleman from New York, that he (Mr. D.) endorsed the statements contained in that letter. So far as they related to the surveyor general, and for what he said and done in reference to this matter, he was ready and willing, at any time, to hold himself personally or in any other way accountable to General Wilson, or any of his friends, here or elsewhere.

Mr. D. said he would also read to the House an editorial article which appeared in the "Miner's Express," of the 24th of November last, (a newspaper published in the town of Dubuque,) strongly condemnatory of the conduct of this public functionary, every word of which he believed was strictly true.

Mr. D. commenced to read; when

Mr. FILLMORE objected. He contended that it was not in order to introduce newspaper articles of this character. He knew but little of this surveyor general, or of the manner in which he had discharged the duties of his office; but he would say, that he thought he should no more be required to keep his family in the Territory, than should a member of Congress be required to bring his family to Washington with him.

Mr. DODGE said that the gentleman was arguing under a misapprehension. His amendment did not require the surveyor general to keep his family with him, but simply to reside in the district.

Mr. D. said that he was unwilling to take up the time of the House in the discussion of this subject; but if there was to be opposition to his amendment, he wished to show, by reference to the date of the annual report of this surveyor general, that it was not received until late in January, owing to his absence; when it should have been here, ready to be submitted to Congress at the commencement of the session.

[Here there was a general cry over the House, "Agreed! that's right. We will adopt your amendment."]

The question was then taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MERIWETHER moved to strike out the item "for compensation of the secretary to sign patents for public lands, $1,500."

Mr. MEDILL and Mr. WELLER opposed the motion to strike out.

Mr. BRONSON advocated the motion, and the transfer of the duties of that office to some existing clerk in the departments, rather than leaving them to be discharged by a secretary of executive appointment (at present Mr. Robert Tyler.)

Mr. TILLINGHAST, Mr. W. B. CAMPBELL, Mr. FILLMORE, Mr. WARD, Mr. EVERETT, Mr. HUNT, Mr. PROFFIT, and Mr. WISE, continued a conversation in relation to the propriety of making the change now proposed for some time

Mr. MERIWETHER addressed the committee in favor of his motion, and in reply to the remarks of those gentlemen who had opposed it.

Mr. G. DAVIS and Mr. ARNOLD followed in advocacy of the motion to strike out the appropriation.

Mr. ADAMS addressed the committee for some time, giving his testimony against bill 548, and also against the motion to strike out the appropriation for the President's secretary.

Mr. WELLER moved that the committee rise; which motion was rejected—ayes 61, noes 71.

After some remarks from Messrs. BRONSON, and COOPER of Georgia, the question was taken on the amendment; and it was rejected—ayes 41, noes 87?

On motion by Mr. WELLER, the committee then rose; and

The House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

SATURDAY, February 25, 1843.

On motion by Mr. EVANS, the reading of the journal was dispensed with.

Mr. WRIGHT, from the Committee on Commerce, reported back, without amendment, and with a recommendation that it do pass, the bill from the House, making an appropriation to test the practicability of establishing a system of electro-magnetic telegraphs for the United States.

Mr. HUNTINGTON, from the Committee on Commerce, reported back, without amendment, House bill entitled "An act amendatory of the act for the relief of sick and disabled seamen;" and

On motion by Mr. HUNTINGTON, the above bill was taken up as in committee of the whole, considered, and, there being no amendment, it was reported to the Senate; and, according to order, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. H., also, from the Committee on Commerce, reported back, without amendment, House bill entitled "An act for the better security of the lives of passengers on board of vessels propelled in whole or in part by steam," approved July 7th, 1838.

Mr. PHELPS, from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, made adverse reports (which were ordered to be printed) on the petition of the legal representatives of Chas. M. Thruston, an officer of the Revolution, praying commutation pay; and the petition of the heirs of William Williams, a captain in the army of the Revolution, praying for commutation pay; and the petition of the heirs of Brighton Payne, an officer of the Revolution, praying for the allowance of half pay.

Also, from the same committee, made an adverse report (which was ordered to be printed) on the bill from the House for the relief of Sylvia Underwood.

On motion by Mr. BAGBY,

Resolved, That the President be requested to communicate to the Senate, at the commencement of the next session of Congress, a statement showing the annual amount of the appropriations for the support of the recaptured Africans, from the commencement of such appropriations to the present time; also, the annual number of recaptured Africans who have had the benefit of such appropriations; also, the number of such recaptured Africans now in the Liberia colony; also, the manner and form, and by what agents, and at what expense, the money so appropriated has been applied to its object, and how accounted for; also, a copy of the accounts showing the expenditure of such money for the year 1842, if rendered for that year; and if not, then for the last year for which such accounts may have been rendered; and whether there is reason to believe any other than recaptured Africans receive any benefit from said appropriations.

Several adverse reports of standing committees, on private claims, were taken up, and concurred in.

The following resolution, introduced by Mr. BENTON on yesterday, was taken up and agreed to, viz:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested, if compatible with his sense of the public interest, to communicate to the Senate a copy of the despatch received from Mr. Everett, dated the 3d of February instant; also, a copy of the despatch of Lord Aberdeen of December, 1841, to the American Secretary of State; and a copy of the answer, if any, which was given by the American Secretary to that despatch.

The resolution submitted by Mr. EVANS on yesterday, providing that on and after Monday next the hour of meeting shall be 10 o'clock, and that the Senate take a recess on each day from 3 to 5 o'clock, was taken up for consideration.

Mr. BAYARD was opposed to the second branch of the resolution, providing for a recess; and called for a division of the question.

The question on the first branch of the resolution was adopted on yeas and nays—yeas 29, nays 2.

The question being on the second branch of the resolution, providing for a recess—

Mr. TAPPAN moved to strike out "5," and insert "4".

This proposition was agreed to.

The question recurring on the second branch of the resolution, Messrs. BAYARD and ARCHER opposed it, and Messrs. EVANS and BATES advocated its adoption. Then, the question being put, the second branch was rejected, on a count—ayes 13, noes 14.

On motion by Mr. CRITTENDEN, the Committee on Military Affairs was discharged from the further consideration of the resolutions of the Legislature of the State of Arkansas, on the subject of the military defences for the protection of the Arkansas frontier; the resolutions of the Legislature of Indiana, in favor of the passage of a law granting bounty land to the militia and rangers who served in the last war; the bill making provision for the payment of some of the Missouri militia; and of the petition of Alvin C. Goell, praying encouragement for an invention for the manufacture of fire-rockets.

Mr. LINN presented a petition from Martin Fenwick, praying confirmation of his title to a tract of land in Missouri; which was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Also, presented joint resolutions of the Legislature of Missouri, in relation to the fine imposed on General Jackson by Judge Hall at New Orleans, asserting that that fine was unjustly imposed; and recommending the passage of a law for its unconditional repayment, which were ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

On motion by Mr. EVANS, the previous orders of the day were postponed, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration, as in committee of the whole, of the bill for regulating the currency of foreign gold and silver coins in the United States.

Mr. EVANS moved to amend the bill, by striking out the fourth section, which, he hoped, would remove the objection heretofore urged against the bill by the honorable Senator from Missouri [Mr. BENTON.]

Mr. BENTON was understood to acquiesce in the passage of the bill, if it was amended as proposed; believing that it might be safely passed in that form.

The amendment was then agreed to; and there being no further amendment proposed, the bill was reported to the Senate, and was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. EVANS, the bill to compute at the custom-house, according to the Federal currency, the value of German and other foreign coins, was then taken up as in committee of the whole. The bill was amended, on the motion of Mr. EVANS. It was then reported to the Senate, and, according to order, read the third time, and passed.

On motion by Mr. TAPPAN, the Senate then proceeded to consider bills on the general orders.

The bill to authorize the making of permanent contracts for the transportation of the United States mail upon railroads, came up in order, as in committee of the whole; but, without being considered, was, on the motion of Mr. EVANS, laid on the table. Subsequently,

Mr. MERRICK moved that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the above bill. It was his desire to have an expression of the opinion of the Senate upon it. The Senate, however, without a division, refused to consider it.

The following bills from the House were then considered as in committee of the whole, reported to the Senate, and finally passed, viz:

An act for the relief of John Core.

An act for the relief of Thomas D. Gilson.

An act for the relief of John E. Hunt and others.

An act for the relief of Robert G. Ford.

An act for the relief of Wm. Fabre.

The bill from the House for the relief of George Randall, John C. Haskell, and Elisha H. Homes, was taken up as in committee of the whole, on amendments recommended by the Committee on Claims. The amendments having been agreed to, the bill was reported to the Senate, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

On motion by Mr. WOODBRIDGE, the previous orders of the day were postponed, and the Senate took up, as in committee of the whole, the bill reported from the Committee on the Library, proposing to contract for publishing the continuation of the old congressional debates, and for the publication of the future congressional debates.

Mr. W. explained the great importance, for the purpose of preserving a correct history of Congress, of having the printing of the old debates completed, which had been heretofore subscribed for; and especially for encouraging the reprinting and printing of the future debates.

Messrs. TAPPAN and BERRIEN made some remarks as to the proper manner of entering into the contract.

Mr. WRIGHT opposed the passage of the bill, and moved to lay it on the table.

This motion was tested by yeas and nays, and decided in the negative—yeas 18, nays 23.

Mr. SEVIER expressed a wish, if Congress was again to give encouragement to the publishing and printing of those debates, that full reports of both sides of the question would be published, and not be tinctured by party bias, as heretofore.

On motion by Mr. BAYARD, (for the purpose of proceeding to the consideration of the bankrupt bill,) the above bill was postponed till Monday.

Engrossed bill to continue in force the act for the final adjustment of private land claims in Missouri, approved the 9th of July, 1832, and the act supplemental thereto, approved the 2d March, 1833, was read the third time, and passed.

THE BANKRUPT ACT.

The unfinished business of yesterday was then resumed; being the further consideration, as in committee of the whole, of the House bill for the repeal of the bankrupt act, and the amendments proposed by the Judiciary Committee; the pending question being on Mr. WALKER's amendment, as follows:

"And be it further enacted, That, when any private incorporated banking company shall fail, upon presentment to said bank of any of its notes, checks, or bills, to pay and redeem the same in specie, said failure shall be regarded as an act of bankruptcy; and the holder of said note, check, or bill, so neglected to be paid as aforesaid, may, upon affidavit of the facts, sworn to by said individual and at least two disinterested witnesses, proceed against said company as bankrupts, as in other cases specified in this act: and the same proceedings shall be had as in other cases; except that no certificate of discharge shall be deemed necessary or proper to be given to any stockholder of said company, except in cases where such stockholders may be personally responsible for the debts of such company; and, in such case, said stockholders shall be discharged, upon the same terms and restrictions as in the other cases of final discharge authorized by this act."

Mr. CRITTENDEN thought it was useless to expend much time on this subject at so late a period of the session; and he therefore hoped the vote would be allowed to be taken on each amendment without debate.

Mr. TAPPAN inquired if it was in order to offer an amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi.

The CHAIR said it was not in order to move an amendment to an amendment of an amendment.

Mr. SMITH of Connecticut stated his objection not only to the existing act, but to any amendment retaining the retrospective provision of the law; because he considered any such provision an ex post facto law, which the Constitution inhibits.

Mr. CHOATE opposed the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi, on the ground that it would narrow down the question to one of naked repeal. Viewing it in this light, he proceeded, at considerable length, to add to the reasons urged yesterday by the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. BERRIEN,] his convictions that the law, as proposed to be amended by the Judiciary Committee, should be made a permanent commercial bankrupt system. He considered the good the law had already done, a pledge of the greater amount of good yet to be expected from its operation, now that the unavoidable evils accompanying its first effects had been exhausted. He said to his friends that, whatever others might do, it was not for them to repeal the work of their own hands; it was their place to wait, and let their impatient successors execute the work of demolition. If the existing law was to have no other effect than that of a great insolvent law, operating solely on retrospective cases, he admitted it would be an unconstitutional law. And if it was now repealed, before it had time to operate prospectively, it would be obnoxious to the imputation of having been nothing, in fact, but an unconstitutional law. On this ground, therefore, it was obvious that a repeal now would be an endorsement by Congress of the allegations of the enemies of the party in power, that the law was unconstitutional. He denounced the instability of legislation with which Congress would be chargeable, by the fact of not permitting a law, struggled for through forty years of solicitation, to remain a single year upon the statute-book. He maintained that, if there was a public opinion against the existing law, there was certainly none against the substitute now proposed by the Judiciary Committee; on the contrary, he insisted the modifications of that committee fully met not only the demands of the States which have expressed any sentiments on the subject, but the general wish of the community. He then commented upon the several provisions of the substitute proposed by the Judiciary Committee, justifying them as just policy, and perfectly in accordance with a constitutional power of establishing a permanent commercial system of bankruptcy.

He hoped the Senator from Mississippi would modify his amendment, so that when a State bank suspends specie payments, a commission shall issue; and then, if it shall be found to be insolvent, it shall be made amenable to the operations of the bankrupt law. If the Senator so modified his amendment, he (Mr. CHOATE) would vote for it. But whether the amendment was adopted or not, he prayed the Senator from Mississippi to unite with the friends of the substitute proposed by the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. SMITH of Connecticut declared he had heard nothing from the Senator which could induce him to change his opinion. He still denied that the Constitution delegated to Congress any power to pass retrospective laws, or to make laws which shall take away the property of one citizen, to vest it in another. He contended that the powers inferred from the Constitution, by those who had passed the present law, were two-fold—technical and popular; both of which they had turned entirely to the advantage of the debtor, and to the disadvantage of the creditor. So that even in the popular sense, it could not be constitutional.

Mr. HUNTINGTON explained the situation in which he was placed by the instructions of his State. He pointed out the course he had hitherto uniformly pursued in relation to the subject of a uniform system of bankruptcy. During that long period he pursued that course, because he was firmly persuaded a large majority of his constituents were in favor of a bankrupt law. But he now was equally well persuaded that the great mass of his constituents had entirely changed their opinions, and were in favor of a direct repeal of the law. In voting, therefore, in conformity with the wishes of his constituents, he did so because he felt satisfied of this change of opinion; not that he subscribed to the doctrine that, as a Senator, he was bound to obey the authoritative dictation of his Legislature. He felt satisfied that, in the resolutions of his Legislature, there was a full expression of the public sentiment of the State; and what he therefore admitted was, that he was bound to obey—not the instructions of the Legislature, but the public sentiment, of which the resolution of his State Legislature was, satisfactorily to his mind, the exponent. He also believed this change of public opinion was general throughout the country; and therefore he felt perfectly justifiable in discharging a duty which the wishes of his State had imposed upon him. Under these circumstances, he felt bound to vote for the repeal of the act.

Mr. WALKER proposed to modify his amendment by striking out from the second line the word "private," and also the word "checks," and substituting the word "drafts." He would be disposed to make some further modifications, were it not that he feared he would lose more votes on this side for his amendment, than he would gain on the other.

He would occupy but a very few moments in presenting the arguments which he desired to offer to the Senate in favor of the proposition for including banking corporations under the operation of the bankrupt law. They were now (if the amendments reported by the committee should prevail) about to make a commercial bankrupt law. Were not incorporated banks connected with the commerce of the country? Were not incorporated bankers (within the technical language of the law) traders? Why should they not, then, be included within the operation of the law, as well as any other traders or bankers? If the object of the bill was to give facilities to trade, and to enable the creditor to arrest the banker or the trader in his downward course—to stop him at the first point of bankruptcy—to seize upon his effects, and distribute them equally for the benefit of all his creditors,—why not apply the law to incorporated companies as well as to unincorporated? He had heard nothing that even amounted to a plausible reason against the expediency of such a provision. But they had been told that it was unconstitutional. He would ask, did not the Constitution confer upon Congress powers as broad, full, and comprehensive upon the subject of bankruptcy, (a term, by the way, derived from banks and bankers, and originally intended to apply to them,) as upon any other. If such were not the case, how was it that a State was enabled to exempt individuals by granting them charters of incorporation?

If individual bankers were within the meaning of the Constitution, by what authority was it that a State could interpose, and expunge that clause of the Constitution, by exempting them from its operation? If a State could exempt an individual banker, through the operation of a charter, why could it not extend a similar exemption to all cases, and, in fact, set aside every clause of the Constitution? The truth was, that the power to lay duties upon imports was not more explicitly conferred upon Congress, than the power to pass a general bankrupt law. If a State could interpose, through the medium of an act of incorporation, and render powerless a clause of the Constitution as far as regards the one, it could unquestionably do so as to the other. By the same rule which would exclude incorporated banking companies, incorporated companies of importing merchants would be excluded. And so, as regarded every other provision of the Constitution, the power of imposing direct internal taxes; for a State would only have to incorporate a certain number of individuals, and by the mere act of incorporation to exempt them from the taxing power of Congress. He was as much opposed as any one to extending the interpretation of the Constitution; but, when it did unquestionably delegate a power, he denied that it was within the power of any State, by an act of incorporation, or by any other mode, to exempt their citizens from its operation.

A single word as to its expediency. Was there any part of the country which professed to be in favor of insolvent banks, or of an inconvertible paper currency? Upon this point, at least, he believed there was no difference of opinion between the Democratic and the Whig parties. The latter professed to be in favor of specie-paying banks. And would they not be willing to separate the specie-paying from the non-specie-paying banks—the solvent from the insolvent? Would they not arrest the operation of a bank which refused to discharge the very functions for which it was created, by furnishing a convertible paper currency, and commenced deluging the country with a depreciated paper currency? If the Whig party, then, desire to terminate the disasters which had swept over the country, they would be willing to make this a law applicable to everybody, and operating with uniformity throughout every State of the Union. He desired to say much more upon this subject; but he was admonished to forbear, from the fact that only five legislative days remained of this session.

Mr. ALLEN considered the law condemned by the undivided voice of the country. The House of Representatives, in conformity to the will of the people, had passed a bill for the repeal of the act. The Judiciary Committee, in reporting back that bill, had thought proper to propose a substitute, when there were yet but five days of the session left for legislative action. An amendment had been offered by the Senator from Mississippi, for which he should vote; but even if it was appended to the amendment of the Judiciary Committee, he should vote against the amendment as amended; because he considered the only thing which could be done, with propriety, at so late a period of the session, was to pass the repeal bill of the House. The question was, then, repeal or no repeal. As for tinkering it up into a bankrupt system, within five days of the end of the session, it was all idle. Therefore, he would vote against the amendments of the committee, if for no other reason, because any amendment of the bill of the House would have the effect to continue that odious law on the statute book.

Mr. CONRAD asked if it was competent to offer an amendment to the amendment now pending.

The CHAIR intimated that it was not.

The yeas and nays, having been called for on Mr. WALKER's amendment, were ordered.

Mr. KING asked that the amendment, as modified, might be read.

It was accordingly read.

Mr. KING then said that he was favorable to the amendment reaching to private incorporations; but, as now modified, a collision with the States owning banks, or having stock in them, would be inevitable. He hoped, therefore, the Senator would restore the word "private;" or he or his colleague should be obliged to move that amendment.

Mr. WALKER, to remove the objection, agreed to modify his amendment, by adding, after the word "company," the words "of which a State is not proprietor."

Mr. CONRAD suggested that a further modification was necessary—"excepting cases in which a State shall be interested, or for the obligations of which a State shall be responsible."

Mr. WALKER objected to any further modification.

The yeas and nays were then taken on Mr. WALKER's amendment; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 18, nays 24, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Bagby, Bates, Benton, Buchanan, Choate, Crafts, Evans, King, Linn, McRoberts, Sturgeon, Tallmadge, Tappan, Walker, Williams, Woodbury, and Wright—18.

NAYS—Messrs. Archer, Barrow, Calhoun, Clayton, Conrad, Crittenden, Cuthbert, Dayton, Fulton, Graham, Henderson, Huntington, Kerr, McDuffie, Mangum, Merrick, Miller, Phelps, Rives, Sevier, Smith of Indiana, Sprague, White, and Wilcox—24.

When Mr. CUTHBERT'S name was called, he said he would vote "no"—simply declaring his determination not to vote for any bankrupt law whatever.

The question now being on the amendments of the Judiciary Committee,

Mr. CONRAD moved to strike out the words "common law," as there were some States which had no common-law system.

This proposition was adopted.

Mr. BENTON submitted an amendment, giving the district court of the District of Columbia the jurisdiction of bankrupt cases in the District. He would content himself with saying that he should vote against the Judiciary Committee's amendment, because no proper system can be arranged this session. The law now on the statute-book was unconstitutional; and, therefore, he would not sanction its being kept alive in any shape or form. It was nothing under God Almighty's heaven but a pure and simple compilation of insolvent debtors' acts from the reign of George the First to the present day, for the abolition of debts without the consent or authority of creditors. And no one act ever yet invented, in itself amounted to such a wholesale repudiation of debts as this law. He would pay no more attention to a discharge under any such act, than he would to a bit of waste paper. Mr. B. further stated his objections, not only to the existing law, but to the immature attempt to remodel it; contending that, being unconstitutional, the first thing proper to do was to repeal it.

Mr. BERRIEN asked if the Senator did not now depart from the grounds which he (Mr. BERRIEN) and the Senator [Mr. BENTON] insisted upon in 1824?

Mr. BENTON said he did, because he was then wrong. He had seen abundant reasons for changing the opinions he entertained at that period.

Mr. BERRIEN remarked that his opinions had undergone no change.

Mr. TALLMADGE had been in hopes that the amendments proposed by the Judiciary Committee would be sufficient to remove the objections of the Senator from Missouri. He was now sorry to find that the removal of the objections to a bankrupt law on the other side, though met in the spirit of concession by the committee, should now prove unavailing in mitigation of the hostility waged against the bankrupt law. In spite of every concession, it now appeared that nothing short of a total repeal would satisfy the other side. Mr. T., at some length, argued that no commercial country could do without a permanent system of bankruptcy. He argued the original sovereign power of the individual States to enact bankrupt laws; and that, on the adoption of the Constitution, that power was delegated to the General Government. The Government, he contended, had now the power as fully as it was ever owned by the separate States, or by Great Britain, with this only condition—that it shall be a system uniform in its operation throughout the States. He also maintained that Congress had the right, under the Constitution, to obliterate the obligation of contracts; and that a proposition was actually made in the convention, on the adoption of the Constitution, to restrain the Federal Government from exercising the power to pass a retroactive law, and to violate the obligations of existing contracts; but that that proposition was voted down, there being but one vote in favor of the proposition. The retroaction of the present bankrupt law was fully discussed before it was passed; but the law has had all its operation on past contracts, and can now apply only to prospective cases. He undertook to say that public opinion (and particularly in his own State) was now more strongly in its favor than it had ever been before the passage of the law. What would render it more mortifying to him than anything else was, that it should be repealed by the very Congress which enacted it. He would sooner cut off his right hand, than set his name to this repeal.

Mr. WOODBURY observed that he did not propose to enter, at this late hour, into a debate on the inexpediency or unconstitutionality of the present bankrupt law. But some reference having been made to the votes of Senators in 1828 on a former bill, he would therefore take this occasion to say that he then voted as he should now vote in substance, because he then, as now, believed, and then argued, that a law like this was not in conformity with the Constitution, or with sound public policy. The Senator from New York, [Mr. TALLMADGE,] who has just taken his seat, contends that the States, after the Revolution, possessed all the power on this subject which England possessed before. Granted. But that Senator seems to overlook that, though the States possessed and then conferred on the General Government the power they possessed over bankruptcy, they did not confer any over mere insolvencies. Before the Revolution, bankruptcies in England were matters as distinct from mere insolvencies, as arson was from larceny, or murder from piracy.

The objects operated on by bankrupt laws were merchants and bankers; those by mere insolvencies were farmers, and other classes not commercial.

The character of the remedies in case of bankruptcy was compulsory, and to be used by creditors; while, in that of insolvencies, it was voluntary, and to be used by debtors.

Hence, though the States, when they became sovereign and independent, could legislate for both, and separately or together; yet they confided to Congress merely the authority to legislate for bankruptcies, as these alone were connected with that business of commerce, the chief care over which had been intrusted to the General Government.

Mr. W. would keep his promise, and not enter into the discussion of the constitutional question, further than to add—that if England had, since 1789, given by law a broader meaning to the word bankrupt, or had since mixed up other classes than the mercantile in its operations, that circumstance did not change the meaning of the word bankruptcy, as then used in our Constitution. Nor did it impose on our people and States the duty to alter the Constitution, so as to enlarge the meaning of that word. Nor did it justify us in holding its meaning to be changed with us, without a change being made first in the Constitution itself, by the proper authorities.

To consume no further time, he would conclude, by merely reading to the Senate the resolution of instruction by the State of New Hampshire to himself and his colleague on this topic, and the reasons assigned for it. They were in Document No. 63, on our files at this session:

"Resolved, That the bankrupt bill, in the form in which the late act passed, was, in our opinion, both unconstitutional and inexpedient, and ought therefore to be annulled:

"Because such a bankrupt system as is authorized in the Constitution is one made for the benefit of creditors, and penal on defaulting debtors—no other having then been known or used: because most of the provisions of this bill are designed for the benefit of debtors, and are an insolvent system for their relief, rather than to aid creditors: because the act is penal against merchants, while it is voluntary only as it regards all other persons; and such legislation, however merciful and liberal in itself, can never come within the power above named as conferred on the General Government, but belongs and is reserved to the States, respectively: because, friendly as we are to honest debtors and honest creditors, we cannot countenance the General Government in exercising control over them, which has never been granted to it: and because we believe that the States not only possess all power over cases of mere insolvency, but can exercise it wiser, so as to suit better the wants and condition of the population of each State, respectively: because, to allow the General Government, as in this bankrupt bill, to interfere with cases not included in any bankrupt system known when the Constitution was adopted, tending to bring the trial of all contracts, and the jurisdiction of all debtors in the Union connected with insolvency, into the whirlpool of the Federal courts, is an alarming encroachment on State rights; because such an act, coupled with a like usurping power used, at the last session, to transfer from the States the trial of all burnings and murders like those of McLeod, to the same Federal courts, and to dictate to the State sovereignties, or order them to make single districts, under peril of disfranchisement, tends most rapidly to prostrate all State independence, as well as to build up a frightful, monopolising, overshadowing despotism at the centre, which neither our fathers contemplated nor we should tolerate: because this bill disregards the sanctity of all existing contracts and the vested rights of creditors, and, at one sweep, both strips the States of authority always heretofore exercised in insolvent cases, even under the old bankrupt law of 1801, and robs the whole class of creditors, female as well as male, orphans and minors as well as adults, of rights and privileges deemed till now inviolate, and secured by all the sacredness of private contracts and the strongest force of State legislation: and because the remnants of property owned by bankrupts are, by the provisions of this bill, mostly squandered in expenses, through the great distances, fees, and costs in the Federal courts, paying little or nothing in most cases to creditors' while scarcely any debtors are relieved, who, if honest, could not, without the act, compromise with those they owe; and, if dishonest, do not merit so easy and sudden an escape from their solemn obligations.

Mr. BENTON asked if these were from the Granite State.

Mr. WOODBURY replied yes.

Mr. BENTON. They are true granite.

The question was then taken on the Judiciary Committee's amendments as amended, and resulted in the negative—yeas 16, nays 30, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Barrow, Bates, Berrien, Choate, Clayton, Crafts, Dayton, Evans, Henderson, Kerr, Miller, Phelps, Porter, Tallmadge, White, and Woodbridge—16.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Archer, Bagby, Benton, Buchanan, Calhoun, Crittenden, Cuthbert, Fulton, Graham, Huntington, King, Linn, McDuffie, McRoberts, Mangum, Morchead, Rives, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Smith of Indiana, Sprague, Sturgeon, Tappan, Walker, Wilcox, Williams, Woodbury, Wright, and Young—30.

The question then coming up on the repeal bill of the House—

Mr. BENTON moved to strike out the proviso, which is in the following words:

Provided, That this act shall not affect any case or proceeding in bankruptcy commenced before the passage of this act, or any pains, penalties, or forfeitures incurred under the said act; but every such proceeding may be continued to its final consummation, in like manner as if this act had not been passed.

Mr. BERRIEN would not question the decision of the Senate on the Judiciary Committee's amendment; but he did hope the proviso in the House bill would not be stricken out. To all the class of cases protected by this proviso, its excision would be the most manifest injustice.

Mr. BENTON proposed the same proviso as a substitute, which he had offered upon a former occasion upon the Senate's bill, making the pending cases subject to constitutional restrictions, and requiring the consent of a majority in value and number of the creditors necessary for the discharge of the bankrupts. On moving this amendment, he urged the same arguments in its favor which he had used on the former occasion alluded to.

Mr. BUCHANAN said he had not intended to trouble the Senate with a single word on the bankrupt bill, at this late period of the session; but as he had determined to vote against the amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. BENTON,] and would differ from some of his most valued political friends on this question, he felt it to be a duty which he owed both to them and himself to make a very few observations on the subject. Should the amendment prevail, and the proviso be stricken from the bill, it would deprive all those bankrupts of the benefit of the law whose cases were now pending, and who had not yet obtained their certificates of discharge.

He should be extremely sorry if his constitutional opinions would deprive him of the power of voting in favor of this proviso. In what condition would both the bankrupts whose cases were now pending, and their creditors, be left, in case it should not be retained?

The first class of desperate insolvents or bankrupts, who stood ready and eager to take the benfit of the law immediately after its passage, had already passed through the mill, and had been discharged from their debts. There were many individuals who had been crushed to the earth, and whose circumstances had been rendered desperate, by the discharge of their debtors and the consequent loss of debts honestly due to them, under this unjust and impolitic law. It was such individuals who would chiefly suffer, should the amendment be adopted. They had struggled with misfortune as long as they could; and had finally, at the last hour, applied for the benefits of the bankrupt law. The proceedings in their cases were now in different stages of their progress; and he should consider it unequal, unfeeling, and unjust to deprive the courts of the power of bringing them to a conclusion. It would be an extreme case, indeed, which could justify Congress in declaring, after an individual had put himself to the trouble and the expense of instituting any proceedings under the faith of their own laws, that he should be arrested midway; and that, too, when he could not by possibility be restored to his former condition.

But again: There was one State of the Union (he referred to the State of Missouri) where the district judge had decided the bankrupt law to be unconstitutional, and had refused to discharge any of the applicants for the benefit of its provisions. Strike out this proviso; and then, whilst debtors in all the other States had been discharged under the provisions of the law, no debtor in Missouri had ever enjoyed, or could enjoy, its benefits.

Again: He asked what would become of the property of bankrupts now in the hands of their assignees, or under the custody of the law. This would present a scene of confusion worse confounded. Strike out the proviso, and no distribution of it could take place among their creditors; because the law under whose provisions it would have been made, had ceased to exist. This would lead to great injustice and endless litigation.

In view of these circumstances, if he even entertained serious doubts of the constitutionality of the bankrupt law, he would suffer these doubts to operate in favor of retaining the proviso, and would leave it to the Supreme Court to decide the constitutional question in the last resort. Nothing but a clear conviction that the law was a violation of the Constitution, could induce him to sanction all these evils.

Mr. B. said he was the only Senator of his party who had made a speech against the final passage of the present bankrupt law; and if he were disposed to glorify himself for the gift of propheey, he might refer to that speech, and it would be found that in every particular, with but one exception, his predictions had been verified. Much, however, as he was opposed to the passage of the law, he did not believe it to be unconstitutional. This would appear from a few sentences of that speech, delivered on the 24th July, 1841, which he would read to the Senate.

"Mr. B. said, as he had referred to the speech which he had made in the House of Representatives on this subject, nearly twenty years ago, he felt bound to acknowledge that, upon one point, he had fallen into a then prevailing error. Of this he had been fully convinced by the debate in the Senate at the last session. In 1822, it was his opinion that the constitutional power of Congress was confined to traders, or that class of persons which were embraced by the bankrupt laws of England, at the time of the adoption of the Federal Constitution. This, he now believed, was too narrow a construction. The Constitution declared that 'Congress shall have power to establish uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcies throughout the United States.' The subject of bankruptcies was thus placed generally under our control; and wherever bankruptcy existed—no matter what might have been the pursuits of the bankrupt, whether he had been a trader or not—our power extended over him. It also, in his opinion, embraced artificial as well as natural persons. Was it not absurd to say that an individual manufacturer on one side of the street, at Lowell, might be subjected to the compulsory operation of a bankrupt law, whilst two or three individual manufacturers on the other side of the same street, who had obtained a charter of incorporation from the Legislature of Massachusetts, could thus withdraw themselves, in their corporate capacity, from the power conferred upon Congress over bankruptcies?"

So that he had recanted, and that in good time, what he believed to have been his error when he first entered the House of Representatives. He and his friend from Missouri [Mr. BENTON] were, in this respect, placed in a similar predicament. They had both changed their old opinions; and he regretted that they were still on opposite sides.

He considered that it would be a very narrow construction indeed, to confine our power over the subject of bankruptcies, which had been conferred in the broadest and most general terms, to the passage of just such a bankrupt law as existed in England at the date of the Federal Constitution. All the lights of experience, and all the improvements in the science of legislation, must then be disregarded; and while the world was in a state of constant progression, we must make a dead stand at the point where we found the English bankrupt law half a century ago. Surely the framers of the Constitution never intended any such absurdity. For his own part, he firmly believed that no bankrupt law, based upon the English model, could ever exist for any length of time in this country. It would always destroy itself, after a brief experience. Such a law was not applicable to a country of the vast extent of our own, where the Federal judicial tribunals were at such remote distances from each other, and when it was acknowledged that Congress did not possess the power of conferring jurisdiction in cases of bankruptcy on the State courts. If they were ever to have a permanent and beneficial bankrupt system, they must look to other models than the English. Fortunately, under the decision of the Supreme Court, each State now possesses the unquestionable power of passing bankrupt laws which will relieve its own citizens from the obligation of debts contracted with other citizens of the same State subsequent to the passage of such laws. Nay, more: a discharge under a State bankrupt law is valid even against the citizens of other States, or foreigners, who may accept a dividend of the debtor's effects; and this will always be accepted in cases where any considerable dividend exists. Several of the States now have such bankrupt laws. But enough, and more than enough, of this.

The present law was said to be unconstitutional, because it was an insolvent, and not a bankrupt law; and that it applied not only to traders, but to all other persons. But it would be extremely difficult to draw any line of distinction between insolvency and bankruptcy. Both signified the inability of a debtor to pay his debts. This was the meaning of both terms, in the abstract. There was this difference between a bankrupt law and an insolvent law—that, whilst the latter discharged the person of the debtor only, the former discharged both the debtor and the debt. Bankruptcy was a general term: and even in England, although nominally none but traders were entitled to the benefit of the bankrupt laws; yet, in reality, these laws had been extended, long before the adoption of the Federal Constitution, to many, very many persons, who could not, with any propriety, be denominated traders. Different acts of Parliament, and the most liberal judicial construction of the term "traders," had extended their provisions to almost every class of the community. He might cite numerous instances to prove this assertion, if time would permit, and if they were not familiar to every Senator. The policy of England had always been to extend still further and further the operation of their bankrupt laws to new classes of individuals. Whilst, therefore, he would be utterly opposed to the passage of any such bankrupt law for this country, he could not regard such a law as a violation of the Constitution, merely because its benefits or its injuries were not confined to persons who might technically and appropriately be called traders. The power conferred upon Congress by the Constitution was not limited to any class of persons, but extended to the whole subject of bankruptcies; and wherever bankruptcy existed—whether among merchants, or farmers, or tradesmen—Congress might subject them to the operation of a bankrupt law.

But it had also been contended that this law was unconstitutional, because it embraced cases of voluntary bankruptcy. Now, it was perfectly well known to every person acquainted with the history and operation of the English bankrupt law, that voluntary bankruptcy had existed in that country in fact, though not in form, for more than a century before the act of 6th George IV; and this act did no more than to recognise a practice which had long prevailed. Insolvent debtors in England, before the passage of this act, were in the constant practice of concerting with some one of their creditors to commit an act of bankruptcy, who was thereupon to sue out a commission of bankruptcy. It was very true that, if this concert were established, the commission would be avoided. But, in the nature of things, it was almost impossible to prove the fact; and, at last, the statute of George IV expressly legalized such a proceeding. A debtor might now make a declaration of his insolvency in the prescribed form, and this was an act of bankruptcy; and it was expressly enacted "that the bankrupt, and any creditor, or other person, concerting such declaration, shall not invalidate the commission." Here, then, was voluntary bankruptcy, to the same extent which it now existed under our present law. The difference between them was in form, not in fact. In both cases, the bankruptcy was equally voluntary; and in both, the debtor chose his own time to make his application. He could not, then, say that our law was unconstitutional, because it recognised voluntary bankruptcy.

Neither could he agree with the Senator from Missouri, that the law was unconstitutional because it did not provide that, in order to procure his discharge, the bankrupt must obtain the consent of a majority of his creditors in number and value. He agreed entirely with him, that it would be unwise and inexpedient to pass a bankrupt law without such a provision; but that it would be unconstitutional, was altogether a different question. A bankrupt law was a law to discharge an insolvent debtor from his debts, on the condition that he fairly and honestly surrendered all his property for the benefit of his creditors. The mode and the manner of this discharge must necessarily be left to the discretion of Congress. These must necessarily vary, according to the varying opinions of the Legislature. In England, formerly, four-fifths in number and value of the creditors must have consented. It was now reduced to three-fifths; and the prevailing opinion, even there, now seemed to be, that it would promote the interest, both of the debtor and the creditor, not to require the assent of any portion of the creditors to the debtor's discharge. Under our old bankrupt law of 1800, two-thirds in number and value of the creditors were required to consent. The Senator from Missouri would now be satisfied with a majority. This was a mere incidental question, in passing any bankrupt law, which did not enter into its essence. And he could not say that such a law would not be a bankrupt law under the Constitution; although it might not require the consent of any portion of the bankrupt's creditors to obtain the debtor's discharge.

Whilst every feeling of his heart was in favor of relieving those unfortunate debtors whose property had already been removed from their own control, and placed in the hands of assignees, and who had incurred the trouble and expense of commencing proceedings, he was truly rejoiced that no constitutional barrier interposed to prevent him from performing an act of humanity and justice.

He would suggest another consideration: he, in common with his political friends, was anxious that this law should be repealed before the close of the present session; that it should no longer be a blot upon our statute-book; that it should no longer produce the injustice, iniquity, and fraud which had startled the minds of a vast majority of the American people, and caused them to demand its repeal. If the proviso from the present bill were stricken out, and it were sent back to the House thus amended, the probability was, that it would be lost altogether, and that the law would neither be amended nor repealed. Was it not wiser, then, for Senators to make the trifling concession of suffering those who had already applied for its benefits to obtain their discharge, than to leave the law in full force for another year?

Mr. BAGBY, believing the existing law unconstitutional, should vote against any continuance of the law whatever.

Mr. BERRIEN asked if the Senator from Missouri confined his motion in the first instance simply to striking out the proviso; or did it include the proposition to substitute his provisoes.

Mr. BENTON said his object was to offer his amendments as a substitute; but he was indifferent how the vote was taken.

Mr. CRITTENDEN hoped the naked question would be taken on striking out the proviso.

Mr. BERRIEN explained the predicament which would result from striking out the proviso.

Mr. SMITH of Connecticut remarked that, believing the law to be unconstitutional, he should vote against its continuance in any form.

The question was then taken on Mr. BENTON'S amendment, and decided in the negative: so the motion to strike out the proviso did not prevail.

Mr. TALLMADGE proposed an amendment to the bill, as an additional section, granting $1 on each case pending, as remuneration to the judges who will have to sit upon the cases now pending, and which will be continued till final discharge under this bill. This he considered but just.

The amendment was, however, rejected.

Mr. BERRIEN submitted an amendment, allowing the greater part in value of creditors to choose assignees in pending cases. Mr. B. said he was called upon to submit this amendment, in accordance with a desire of the mercantile interest of Baltimore. He considered such an amendment but just and proper to the immense interest involved.

The amendment, as suggested, was read; and the question coming up—

Mr. BUCHANAN said he would cheerfully vote for the proposition, if the Senator from Georgia would bring it up as a separate bill; but he could not vote to append it to this bill, because he believed it would have the effect to prevent the repeal of the law. It would have to go to the other House if amended, and could not be reached.

Mr. BERRIEN persisted in the amendment, believing that, if adopted, it could not have the effect apprehended by the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. CONRAD said he had received a communication, making an appeal to him of the same character. He, therefore, wished to record his vote in its favor, and demanded the yeas and nays.

Mr. ALLEN said he would with cheerfulness vote for the amendment; but, believing that the effect would be, if adopted, to continue the present law in operation, he would vote against it. If adopted, the bill would have to return to the other House.

The yeas and nays were then ordered on the amendment, and resulted in the negative—yeas 14, nays 35.

Mr. CONRAD offered another amendment, to strike out the words "be and is hereby," and insert after the words "forty-one," the words "shall, from and after the 4th day of April next, be repealed." He did not propose this amendment with a view of retarding the inevitable fate of the bill, nor in hopes that it would succeed. His object was to fulfil his duty in complying with the desire of his constituents. As this amendment was considered of great importance to his section of country, he should feel obliged to place his name on record in its favor. He was deprived, by an arrangement he had made with an absent Senator, (by pairing off with Mr. SIMMONS,) of voting against the repeal of the law. He hoped, however, the additional thirty days required by his constituents would be considered not an unreasonable request. Mr. C. then proceeded to point out the justice of this extension of the proviso, and dwelt with considerable energy on the instability of legislation which the repeal of the law by the same Congress which had enacted it must necessarily involve. On this amendment he called for the yeas and nays, which were ordered.

The question being then taken on Mr. CONRAD'S amendment by yeas and nays, resulted in the negative—yeas 13, nays 32.

The bill was then reported back to the Senate.

Mr. TALLMADGE renewed his amendment to allow $1 on each case pending, to the clerks of the courts; and on this he called for the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

The amendment was again rejected—yeas 14, nays 34.

Mr. TALLMADGE now moved to postpone the bill to the 1st Monday in December next; and, on this motion, he called for the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

This motion was negatived—yeas 14, nays 34.

The bill was then read a third time; and,

On the question "Shall this bill pass?"

Mr. BUCHANAN called for the yeas and nays which were ordered.

The bill was then passed in the form in which it came from the House, without any amendment; yeas 32, nays 13, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Archer, Bagby, Bayard, Buchanan, Calhoun, Crafts, Crittenden, Cuthbert, Dayton, Fulton, Graham, Huntington, King, Linn, McDuffie, McRoberts, Mangum, Merrick, Morehead, Phelps, Rives, Sevier, Sprague, Sturgeon, Tappan, Walker, Wilcox, Williams, Woodbury, Wright, and Young—32.

NAYS—Messrs. Barrow, Bates, Berrien, Choate, Clayton, Evans, Kerr, Miller, Porter, Smith of Indiana, Tallmadge, White, and Woodbridge—13.

A communication was read from the Treasury Department—laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

RETRENCHMENT.

Mr. MOREHEAD, from the Committee on Retrenchment, to which was referred the bill from the House, (No. 548,) reported the same back, with numerous amendments—one relieving all officers of the Government, who receive $1,200, and below, from the operations of the bill; and reducing all above that sum 12½ per cent.; another striking out so much of it as reduced the pay and mileage of members of Congress, and substituting a provision reducing their mileage and pay 12½ per cent.

The bill was accompanied by a special report; which was ordered to be printed.

The Senate then adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, February 25, 1843.

Mr. A. MARSHALL presented the petition of V. S. ROSE, and thirty-eight others, citizens of Islesboro', Maine, asking an increase of duties on lumber and wood.

Mr. PLUMER presented petitions, numerously signed by citizens of Pennsylvania, for the passage of a law prohibiting the transportation of the United States mail and opening of post offices on the Sabbath.

CHEROKEES.

Mr. J. L. WILLIAMS moved the reconsideration of a vote by which, some few days ago, the House committed to a Committee of the Whole a joint resolution, authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to pay such sums of money as had been awarded by the commissioners to claimants under the 17th article of the Cherokee treaty.

After a few remarks from Mr. FILLMORE, Mr. CAVE JOHNSON, Mr. GWIN, and others, the motion of reconsideration was agreed to, under the operation of the previous question.

Mr. J. L. WILLIAMS then submitted a substitute for the resolution, appended to which was a proviso, limiting the sum to be paid to $200,000.

After the disposal of various motions to lay on the table, &c., the amendment was adopted—the sum of $200,000 having been first reduced to $100,000, on the suggestion of Mr. FILLMORE. The resolution was then ordered to be engrossed; and the question recurred on the passage, which, under the operation of the previous question, was agreed to by a majority of 80 to 79.

Mr. J. L. WILLIAMS moved a reconsideration of the vote on the passage of the resolution; on which he moved the previous question.

Mr. GWIN rose, and inquired whether it was in order for him to give his views upon the resolution.

The SPEAKER said it was not.

Mr. C. H. WILLIAMS moved that the motion for reconsideration be laid on the table.

After some conversation, and no little noise,

Mr. J. L. WILLIAMS withdrew the motion to reconsider.

Mr. RIGGS renewed it.

Mr. TURNEY renewed the motion to lay the motion for reconsideration on the table.

Mr. GWIN demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered: and the motion to lay on the table was rejected—yeas 86, nays 107.

The question recurring on the motion for reconsideration,

Mr. GWIN called for the yeas and nays; which, having been ordered, resulted in—yeas 95, nays 86.

So the motion of reconsideration was carried.

Mr. WATTERSON submitted an amendment, which was agreed to, but the purport of which could not be obtained.

The question again recurred on the passage of the resolution.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON said that he was desirous of saying a word or two upon this subject, though he regretted to interfere, on account of those interested in the claims. A very large fund had been placed in the treasury for the use of the Cherokees, to be expended by the Government for their benefit. He was fearful that a very large portion of this fund had been already misapplied, and that the Government would be called upon to repay it. He understood the whole amount of money so misapplied exceeded half a million of dollars. There was a balance in the treasury amounting to about $300,000. Under the treaty with the Cherokees, a board of commissioners was now sitting in this city, for the purpose of adjudicating claims under some of the articles of the treaty. The object of this resolution was to direct the issuance of certificates by the board of commissioners upon the awards made by the board, and their payment at the treasury, without a review by the accounting officers.

To the adoption of this course there was, to his mind, very great objections—objections insurmountable. The fund was a trust fund, and, if misapplied by us, we should of course have to repay. We have directed its application by former appropriations. Suppose the adjudications should exceed the amount of money in the treasury, then the claimants must be paid pro rata; then the payment to those now having their claims settled to the full amount would be erroneous, and we should have to repay any sum so misapplied.

Besides, the duty of executing the treaty has now been devolved on the Executive Department. We have done our duty; we have made the appropriation; the board of commissioners is now sitting; and it is the province of the Executive to pay all those claims within the provisions of the treaty. Why should the House undertake to prescribe the kind of evidence which the President should require, in paying out this fund? In all other cases, after the adjudications by the board, they are submitted to the President; re-examined by the accounting officers; and, if within the provisions of the treaty, are paid. We had, the other day, a case of this kind. Under the Florida treaty, the courts of the Floridas had been directed to adjudicate claims. They did adjudicate; and when their adjudications were examined at the treasury, Mr. Crawford refused payment of a very large sum, because they were not within the provisions of the treaty; and the other day we were called on to pay the adjudications. The House refused, by a very large majority—only twenty or thirty voting for it.

If the present board should decide favorably upon claims not within the provisions of the treaty, and over which the board had no jurisdiction, that would be such a misapplication of the funds as would subject us to its repayment. He contended that it was the duty of the President, before payment was made, to see that the adjudications were within the provisions of the treaty.

But again: Suppose there was any fraud or corruption in the commissioners, (and he made the supposition without the slightest disrespect to the present board of commissioners,) and the commissioners should issue a million of certificates:—were they to be paid at the treasury, without any examination by the accounting officers of the treasury, or other officers of the Government? This course was unusual—so far as he knew; unprecedented. He could not feel himself justified in thus opening the doors of the treasury to certificates issued by any board of commissioners. He regretted very much the condition of the claimants, and wished that they had, or could, get their money; but he could not consent to set aside all the safeguards of the treasury, as regulated by law. All the guards provided for the protection of the treasury often proved insufficient; and this House ought not to interfere, or set them aside, without great deliberation; and, he hoped, would not do so in the present case.

The debate was further continued by Mr. JAS. COOPER and Mr. GWIN.

Mr. JOS. L. WILLIAMS then obtained the floor, and went into an explanation and defence of the objects of the resolution, and replied to the various objections urged against its passage. He concluded by moving the previous question.

Various gentlemen desired to explain; but the motion for the previous question was carried.

Mr. EVERETT moved that the resolution be laid upon the table.

The yeas and nays were ordered on this motion; and, being taken, resulted—yeas 87, nays 94, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Arrington, Atherton, Babcock, Baker, Barnard, Beeson, Birdseye, Bowne, Boyd, Brewster, Charles Brown, Burke, Burnell, William Butler, Calhoun, Casey, Staley N. White, Thomas W. Williams, Christopher H. Williams, Joseph L. Williams, Wood, A. Young, and John Young—94.

So the House refused to lay the resolution upon the table.

The question recurring on the passage of the resolution,

Mr. C. H. WILLIAMS called for the previous question; which was seconded, and the main question ordered.

Mr. GWIN having called for the yeas and nays on the main question, they were accordingly ordered; and, being taken, resulted in yeas 88, nays 84.

So the resolution was adopted.

Mr. JOHN CAMPBELL rose to a correction of the journal. His motion embraced three propositions: First, to correct the count taken on the final passage of the bill to suspend the operations of the second section of the apportionment bill, which was reported by the Clerk to be yeas 90, nays 91, instead of yeas 91, nays 91—which was the true count. The Clerk, Mr. C. said, was satisfied now that his report of the vote on the final passage of that bill was incorrect. His second proposition was, to add the vote of Mr. ANDREWS of Kentucky, who voted in the affirmative, and whose vote was not recorded. The third proposition was, to allow Mr. MOORE, who voted in the negative under a misapprehension, to correct his vote. Mr. ANDREWS having voted against the reconsideration, he went to him and asked him how it was he had given such a vote, when he had previously expressed his intention to vote for the bill. Mr. ANDREWS then informed him that he had voted for the bill on every question that was taken until the last; and he had then voted against the reconsideration, in consequence of the remarks of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. WISE.]

Mr. ANDREWS of Kentucky said that, in relation to his vote, he had no distinct recollection on the subject. He had referred to gentlemen around him for their recollections on the subject, and they had informed him that he did not vote on the passage of the bill; that he rose and addressed the Speaker, in order to have his name called; but, not being answered, he had sat down, remarking that he did not care much about it. Under these circumstances, he was unwilling to ask to have his name recorded. He voted against the reconsideration, on the ground that several gentlemen—and, among the rest, the gentleman from Virginia—had taunted them with having passed a law that was a nullity.

Mr. JOHN CAMPBELL said that, in justice to himself, he wished to ask the gentleman one question. When he went to him to ask him why he voted against the reconsideration, when he had promised to vote for the bill, did he not state that he had voted for it on every question that occurred previous to that vote? He asked this question, in order to put himself right.

Mr. ANDREWS of Kentucky said he would, with pleasure, put the gentleman right. When the gentleman came to him, he did state to him that he had been with him on every question till the vote on the reconsideration.

The SPEAKER said that the Clerk would correct the count of the vote that was taken, making it 91 to 91. The bill, therefore, was rejected. In relation to the vote of Mr ANDREWS of Kentucky, the Speaker could not direct it to be recorded, unless the gentleman himself desired it.

LAND TAXES.

Mr. REYNOLDS called up his motion to reconsider the vote laying on the table the bill to authorize the Legislature of Illinois to tax the lands sold by the United States within the limits of that State. Mr. R. requested to have the law on the subject read.

The SPEAKER said that it could not be done but by general consent; and the question was not debatable.

Mr. BRIGGS asked if it was in order to move to go into Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER said that it was not.

Mr. CASEY moved to lay the motion for reconsideration on the table; which motion was carried.

Mr. C. H. WILLIAMS hoped the House would, by general consent, take up the bill to divide the United States into two military districts. Objections were made. He moved a suspension of the rules for that purpose.

Mr. J. THOMPSON hoped the motion would be waived, to allow reports to be made from committees.

Mr. C. H. WILLIAMS did not withdraw his motion, but asked the previous question upon it.

The motion to suspend was negatived.

Mr. WISE asked permission to report the navy appropriation bill, with the Senate's amendments thereto; which were ordered to be printed.

Mr. J. THOMPSON again appealed to the House to allow reports to be received from committees, as the opportunities to make them would be very few before the termination of the session.

Mr. UNDERWOOD made an appeal in favor of the business of the District of Columbia.

Mr. BRIGGS moved that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. MALLORY obtained permission to present some papers, which were understood to relate to the exploring expedition.

The House then agreed to the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BRIGGS] to go into Committee of the Whole; and Mr. FESSENDEN took the chair.

THE CIVIL AND DIPLOMATIC APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed the consideration of the bill making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending the 30th day of June, 1844; and proceeded through all the items, without objection, until the Clerk arrived at those under the head of "Judiciary."

Mr. C. J. INGERSOLL moved to reduce the item appropriating $473,000 for defraying the expenses of the supreme, circuit, and district courts of the United States, &c., &c., by a deduction of $100,000.

He advocated his amendment, to curb the extravagance which had sprung up in that branch of the public expenditures; and observed that, since he was in Congress, some years ago, the expenses under this head had risen from $40,000 to upwards of $400,000 per annum. He pointed out various modes by which retrenchment might be effected—particularly the opening of the courts on certain days, and on those days transacting the business of the courts; instead of opening them every day in the year, and closing them again, without the discharge of any duties. The latter course would effect the saving of a large amount now paid to officers, jurors, witnesses, &c., for attendance on those days when the courts were opened pro forma only.

He alluded to the rejection of this item at the last session of Congress, and its introduction afterwards in a bill appropriating a sum for the Wyandot Indians—by which means it passed, in the confusion attendant on the close of a session, without the knowledge of many members on that floor, who would have opposed the appropriation if they had been aware that it was reintroduced in that unusual shape. He was himself one of those who were unconscious of the passage of that item of appropriation; and his first information of that fact was derived from the newspaper reports of their proceedings, on the following day.

He concluded by expressing a hope that the committee would reduce this item of appropriation, as they did at the last session.

Messrs. FILLMORE, ADAMS, TILLINGHAST, and BARNARD, having made some observations on the amendment—

Mr. McCLELLAN of New York said the committee would recollect that, in the month of March last, the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, by a series of resolutions, called upon the Secretary of the Treasury to make an examination into the expenses of the judiciary, which had of late grown up to an enormous amount. That examination was made by the Solicitor of the Treasury, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury; and his report was sent here on the 23d December last, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary for examination, and to report to the House in reference to those expenses. The chairman of the Judiciary Committee, however, had taken no action on that subject. The report of the Secretary of the Treasury recommended a fee-bill for the officers of the district and circuit courts of the United States; and yet this House had had no bill, nor even a report, from the Judiciary Committee, on that subject. Now, if there was any branch of this Government in which corruption existed, it was in the judiciary, so far as the officers of the courts were concerned. It would be recollected that, in the month of March, a year ago, he introduced a resolution calling for returns of fees, particularly in relation to the southern district of New York; but that resolution remained unanswered to this day, and not a particle of information had come in, in response to it. It was true that a report on one branch of this subject had been made to this House; but he was told that a portion of that report had been abstracted either from the office of the Clerk of this House, or from the office of Messrs. Gales & Seaton, their printers; it was that part of the report which contained the answer of the Secretary of the Treasury in relation to the fees of the officers of the different courts of the United States, and the amount of their receipts and emoluments. That document was ordered to be printed early in February, but it had not been printed to this day. Now, such were his views on this subject, that if any gentleman would move to reduce the item $200,000, he would vote for it, until they could have some action on the subject, by which they should be enabled to act intelligibly. He saw no reason why clerks should receive $5,000, $10,000, or $15,000, for mechanical services, when the judges received only $6,500.

Mr. BARNARD explained.

Messrs. TILLINGHAST and SALTONSTALL addressed the committee in extenuation of the charges made against the officers charged with the judicial expenditures.

Mr. GORDON spoke in favor of the reduction. He contended that, unless the appropriation was reduced $100,000, as proposed, there would not be any alteration in the exorbitant prices now charged in the fee-bills. True, the Solicitor of the Treasury had reported a plan for reducing the expenditures of the courts generally; but it must be manifest that there was not time to take it up, and act on it this session; and therefore to refuse to reduce, would be equivalent to giving the go-by to the subject.

The question was then taken on Mr. INGERSOLL's amendment, and it was agreed to.

Mr. MALLORY said he was instructed by the Committee on the Coast Survey to offer the following amendment:

And be it further enacted, That the sum of one hundred thousand dollars be appropriated, out of any money in the treasury not otherwise appropriated, for continuing the survey of the coast of the United States: Provided, That this, and all other appropriations hereafter to be made for this work, shall, until otherwise provided by law, be expended in accordance with a plan of reorganizing the mode of executing the survey, to be submitted to the President of the United States by a board of officers which shall be organized by him, to consist of the present superintendent, his two principal assistants, and the two naval officers now in charge of the hydrographical parties, and four from among the principal officers of the corps of topographical engineers; none of whom shall receive any additional compensation whatever for this service, and who shall sit as soon as organized. And the President of the United States shall adopt and carry into effect the plan of said board, as agreed upon by a majority of its members; and the plan of said board shall cause to be employed as many officers of the army and navy of the United States as will be compatible with the successful prosecution of the work; the officers of the navy to be employed on the hydrographical parts, and the officers of the army on the topographical parts of the work. And no officer of the army or navy shall hereafter receive any extra pay, out of this or any future appropriations, for surveys.

Mr. MALLORY said it would be perceived by the House that this amendment proposed a total reorganization of the work; and if it should be carried out in the spirit of that amendment, it would correct many of the abuses which some of them believed to exist, and would effect a saving of some $20,000 or $30,000, by dispensing with the services of numerous civil officers, believed not to be necessary, and substituting for them officers of the topographical corps and officers of the navy. The committee had left the plan of the survey to be decided on by a board of officers, and submitted to the President for his approval, as they had not been able to agree among themselves on any detailed plan. He had, to be sure, his own views as to how the work should be carried on; but as they did not meet the concurrence of a majority of the committee, he could not bring them before the House in the form of a report. As he had spoken at large on the subject, some days since, he felt no disposition to trespass on the time of the committee, but would leave the amendment in their hands, trusting that it would be adopted.

Mr. C. BROWN offered an amendment to the amendment, striking out $100,000, and inserting $40,000; together with a proviso, that the superintendence of the coast survey shall be transferred to the Navy Department, and that the surveys shall be carried on by officers of the navy and of the corps of topographical engineers.

Mr. BROWN said that, in offering this amendment as a substitute for that of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. MALLORY,] he must in a few words express his opposition to the latter. That amendment did not look to the practical reform which the House expected when this subject was last under discussion. He believed, that there was a decided disposition manifested in the House to get clear of the present head of the survey; yet the amendment of the gentleman brought him forward as the most prominent member of it. He thought the House decided, when the subject was up before, that the survey should be carried on by the officers of the General Government; and he wished it to be carried on in that way now. He did not wish to pay some hundred thousand dollars as extra pay for officers taken from private life, when there were so many in the navy and army perfectly competent to perform this service. This work had cost nearly a million of dollars by the employment of Mr. Hassler and his civil assistants alone, without taking into consideration the pay of the officers of the navy and army who were engaged in it. He believed that Mr. Hassler had retarded the work for years, and, from his knowledge of the man, he could safely say that he was physically and mentally incapable of carrying it on properly—incapable both by temper and by age. He was like a hen with chickens around her, who would suffer no one to meddle with them. He had seen enough of that department to be convinced that things were carried on in the most ridiculous manner in it. For instance, Mr. Hassler had a work shop here in Washington to repair his instruments; and when he was asked what he would do if any of his instruments got out of order while he was in New York or New Jersey surveying, answered that he would send them on to Washington. If any gentleman would read the letter addressed by the superintendent to Mr. Aycrigg, he would hardly (Mr. B. thought) pronounce him a sane man.

The following extract would show the whole character of the mind and temper of the man:

"I have only to regret: that you, in the situation of a member of the select committee of investigation upon the coast survey, (though your application is not made in that capacity, or with that authorization,) have suffered yourself to be misled by such reports, which may oblige me to make your and this letter public, which I think you might have a considerable interest to keep between us, by fairly and decidedly turn friendly to the work, as you stated at first, but which you have so much attacked, and to let me alone; who certainly have done nothing that could in any way in the world be taken ill in me, neither in the work, nor against you, unless you should think: that I have no right of self-defence, which belongs, by natural right to all, even the dumb creation, and I therefore shall not give up, having so plenty means for it on hand. Within two days, I hope to get your decision upon this point, because I am not sure of the use you mean to make of the information, which I herewith give to you, in the fullest candor, I am decidedly obliged to act, and so to act, that neither this country nor Europe can remain in doubt upon the subject of your questions; you cannot but see, that the subject you attack, (namely, the accuracy of the base line,) belongs to the scientific world, which is not limited by the boundary of the United States, even as settled by the last treaty; that mathematics furnishes means to ascertain truth, which even politics cannot, (for even the decision of large assemblies by plurality of votes, has been calculated by mathematicians—see "Condouet" Probabilite' des decisions par la pluralite des voix.)

Besides, please to observe, that every stroke you may think to do at the coast survey, by raising doubts upon its accuracy, and levilling it, may be also a stroke at some vessel, bearing, perhaps, a friend or relation of yours, whose groans will cry vengeance upon you, for having prevented, or discredited, the execution of an accurate survey of the coast, upon which you may be long in search of his corpse.

With best wishes, your obedient servant,

F. R. HASSLER.

The Government would find it more useful to employ Mr. Hassler in calculating, mathematically, the votes of Congress, than to conduct the survey. His friends say he knows more of mathematics than any man living; and he, in the above extract, hints that he can so calculate "the decision of large assemblies." This would be of great advantage, as it was now found very difficult to get the votes of members. If Mr. Hassler could calculate these, the members could go home when they please. Let him, then, be appointed calculator general of Congress; but he begged of them to take him away from the coast survey, if they wished it ever to be made of use to the country. But this was wandering from the subject.

Mr. B. said he had prepared some notes of the history of the work, but he would only refer to them now. The law of February 10, 1807, created the coast survey, put it in the hands of the President, and authorized him to use army and navy officers, navy vessels, astronomers, and other persons.

In August, 1816, Mr. Hassler was appointed superintendent. His agreement was to "make the principal triangulation and consequent calculations himself; to instruct the engineer and naval officers employed under him; and he wanted two officers of engineers, topographical or others, and some cadets of said corps, in number according to circumstances."

April 14, 1818, that part of the law of 1807 was repealed, which authorized the employment of other persons than those belonging to the army and navy. Up to this time, over $55,000 were expended in beginning the work and buying instruments, for which purpose Mr. Hassler was in England from August, 1811, to 1815.

June 10, 1832, the law of 1807 was revived, and Mr. Hassler was again appointed superintendent. The work has been going on ever since. The coast has been triangulated from Point Judith to Cape Henlopen, (say about 300 miles;) but only a part of the off-shore soundings have been taken. There are about 3,000 miles of seaboard to the United States. $790,000 have been expended already.

It is stated, in Captain Swift's pamphlet, that the survey of the coast was under the Treasury Department, because Mr. Hassler was already engaged under that department, making weights and measures. These are all made now.

When the coast survey was begun, the topographical corps existed but in name. In 1838, it was organized and enlarged, and is now an able and useful corps.

Last year, Congress established a hydrographical bureau in the Navy Department. There are numbers of naval officers capable of doing hydrographical duties under this bureau.

The coast survey is the most important topographical and hydrographical work in the country. We have a topographical and a hydrographical bureau, yet neither of them has any connexion with this great national work.

Mr. Hassler has just published from the opinion of the Marquis of La Place, (Chamber of Peers, session of 1816-'17,) upon the French survey, this valuable suggestion, viz: "Perhaps even the great number of geographical engineers which our present state of peace allows to employ in this work, to which it is painful to see them strangers, would render its execution more prompt, and less expensive."

The Florida war is now over; many works of internal improvement are suspended; there must be topographical officers enough for the coast survey.

The Russian Government has employed an able American engineer to perform an important scientific work; but that wise Government requires that all the assistants shall come from its corps of engineers, which is composed of army and navy officers.

If the coast survey is to be a useful public work, let the officers conduct it under their bureaus. The officers would then take a pride in this duty, and do it well, and do it cheap. The supervision of the bureaus would occasion system, fidelity, and entire responsibility.

More than $30,000 are now paid annually to citizens, for salaries, out of the coast survey appropriation. This could be saved, by employing officers. Make exclusive use of them, and half the present annual appropriation would suffice.

Can the Treasury Department manage the survey understandingly? The Secretary of the Treasury has already enough to do in the line of his duty; and, as far as the survey is concerned, a clerk in the Treasury Department is the secretary.

Can a citizen superintendent, of closet and scientific habits; or can a clerk in the Treasury Department, manage, with efficiency and economy, so many land and water parties, officers, men, vessels, and boats?

The Navy Department pays out of the navy appropriation the officers and men now lent to the Treasury for the survey. The Secretary of the Navy appears to have no control over the expenditures of this part of the naval appropriation. He does not even select the officers detailed for this duty, though he knows his own material best, and those who are most suitable. This navy duty has become treasury patronage, with commands, extra pay, &c.

The Treasury Department has charge of the vessels; they are bought by the coast survey appropriation; the off-shore soundings are only in part taken. There are not vessels enough, and of the right sort, to take these soundings and in the right way. Steamers are wanted. The survey appropriation cannot bear the expense; but if the Navy Department had charge of the hydrography, it could put suitable vessels on the coast squadron, and employ them on the coast survey, agreeably to the law of 1807.

Last year the vessels did no soundings until about the 1st of June, although the spring opened early. The treasury had not the means to equip the vessels until the appropriation bill passed Congress. But if the navy had charge of vessels, the few naval stores they wanted might have been furnished from the navy stores, or given from second-hand articles not on charge at the yards. Had good arrangements been made, the Delaware bay might readily have been finished last fall, and the chart of it got out at once.

Now, the topographical corps makes surveys for defences; the navy officers make charts along the coast; and the coast survey goes over the same place a third time. If the officers did this work, the army might get the military information, and the navy the hydrographical knowledge, which the interest of the country requires that each of these branches of the public defence should have; and this, at the expense of but one survey; for, at places where defences might be required, the survey could be done with the utmost minuteness.

The officers of the army and navy need not clash. The topographical corps (aided by junior navy officers willing to serve under that bureau—and the recent Florida war and the present coast survey system, show that navy officers are willing to serve, for the public good, under other departments than their own) would do the topography and furnish the shore line. The hydrographical officers would receive the shore line, take the soundings, and make the chart. The same principle is now at work, and works well. The navy officers now get the shore line from the citizens in the shore parties.

The President could direct the War and Navy Secretaries to make such rules, through the bureaus, as would obviate every difficulty.

Employing officers would secure for the public, system, economy, and despatch. The information obtained would be got by the right persons and kept in the right hands. Government would have complete command of the persons employed; and should the work ever be suspended, might, at pleasure, set them to work again on the same duty.

Under any aspect of the matter, Mr. B. said he could not see the propriety of continuing Mr. Hassler; or, indeed, of employing any civilians in the work. Mr. Hassler's assistants, he understood, were men of high character and qualifications, and might, if free from his paralyzing influence, carry on the work with more expedition; but, believing as he did, that their services could be dispensed with, he could not authorize their retention. The survey he wished to be prosecuted without delay; and all he wanted was, to have it under the most efficient management. If it was found that the officers of the navy and army were not competent, it could be remedied hereafter; but it was due to them to give them a fair trial, before they were condemned. Certainly they ought not to be disgraced and condemned in advance. It was an insult to them to suppose that Mr. Hassler was the only man in the country capable of superintending this work; and that they could not carry on the survey of our coast by triangulation. They had been for some time, and were now, surveying the lakes; and he believed their surveys would be equally correct with Mr. Hassler's. We had a bureau of hydrography of the navy, and a corps of topographical engineers, which were expressly created to perform this kind of service; while there was the military academy at West Point, which qualified the officers to perform it. The people would hardly believe that these officers (educated at the expense of the Government) were not capable of performing the services for which they were educated; and, if they thought so, they would be for abolishing that institution. They would say that these officers should be dismissed, and others appointed in their places, who were qualified.

There was no officer of the Government, except the President of the United States, who received so much from the treasury as Mr. Hassler. Mr. B. here read from the printed report of the evidence taken before the committee the following extract:

"Q. What sum is allowed to Mr. Hassler, annually, for expenses, exclusive of compensation?

A. Salary $3,000, and expenses $3,000.

Q. For what expenses is this $3,000 designed? Is it for personal expenses?

A. I suppose it is the expenses of living.

Q. Is he paid for other expenses when he goes into the field?

A. He is furnished with an instrument carriage and horses for the instruments and himself, and a baggage wagon besides, for instruments, at the public expense.

Q. Is it the same carriage which he is accustomed to use in Washington?

A. Yes.

Q. Are horses and men paid at the public expense for the carriage and wagon through the year?

A. Yes; four horses, one permanent driver, and one other man, who also assists about the office."

Besides all this, Mr. Hassler had recently moved into the coast-survey building, and thereby lived rent free. A majority of the committee would agree with him, that this officer was pressing like an incubus on the survey. He never could acknowledge that there was no other man in the country capable of carrying on this work. This might have been the case when he was first appointed, thirty years ago; but since that time they had a number of officers educated at the military academy, while many others in the civil walks of life had qualified themselves for scientific employments. He was sure that the officers of the army and navy were competent to perform this work. There was but little now for the topographical engineers to do; and he had no doubt that many of them, as well as officers of the navy, would be glad to be employed on the coast survey. Indeed, several officers of the navy had told him that they would like such employment, rather than be idle, as they then were.

From the rate the coast survey had thus far proceeded, it would take more than a hundred years to complete it. Certainly this was too slow. He hoped, therefore, a change would be made. In the language of the report of Mr. Aycrigg: "We should then have the survey conducted on a system of practical utility, and moving right end foremost."

Mr. EVERETT made some remarks in too low a tone to be heard by the reporter, but he was understood as opposing the amendment.

The committee then rose, and reported progress.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON offered a resolution for adoption.

Mr. WISE objected to its reception.

The resolution was as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire into the expediency of so modifying the 21st article of the rules and regulations for the government of the navy, prescribed by the act of 23d April, 1800, as to provide that the authority given by that article to a court martial to punish the crime of murder, when committed by any officer, seaman, or marine belonging to any public vessel of the United States, without the territorial jurisdiction of the same, shall not be exercised when the person charged with having committed such murder shall have arrived within the territorial jurisdiction of the United States, and can be arrested and held to answer by the civil courts; and that, in all such cases, the jurisdiction of the circuit court of the United States, for the circuit into which the person charged with such crime shall first be brought, or in which he shall be apprehended, shall have exclusive jurisdiction and cognisance of the offence.

Mr. PROFFIT offered a resolution in relation to the disregard of a resolution passed by the House, some twelve months ago, calling upon the Secretary of the Treasury for returns of officers who retain possession of public moneys, including forfeitures and penalties; but, as objection was made, it was not received. It was as follows:

Whereas the House of Representatives did, on the 29th June, 1842, adopt the following resolutions:

"Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to inform this House whether any collectors, or other officers of the customs, have retained and still hold any moneys received by them, from fines, penalties, and forfeitures, accruing since the 3d March, 1841; and if any such officer does retain moneys, the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed to furnish to this House the names of such officers, and the amount so retained.

"Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to inform this House whether any opinion of the Attorney General has been given on the subject of the right of retention, by officers of the customs, of moneys now accruing under the head of 'fines, penalties, and forfeitures;' and if any such opinion has been given, the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed to furnish this House with a copy of the same.

"Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to inform this House whether he has ordered any officer of the customs, retaining moneys accruing since the 3d March, 1841, under the head of 'fines, penalties, and forfeitures,' to pay said moneys into the treasury of the United States; and whether any officer of the customs has refused or neglected to pay over said moneys; if so, the Secretary of the Treasury is directed to furnish the names of such officers neglecting or refusing to obey his order."

And whereas nearly eight months have now elapsed, and no answer to these resolutions has been transmitted to this House; herefore,

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to inform this House why it is that these resolutions have not been answered.

Also, whether any correspondence has taken place between the Secretary of the Treasury and the First Comptroller, or any other officer, on the subject of answering these resolutions; and, if any correspondence has taken taken place, the Secretary of the Treasury is directed to transmit to this House a copy of the same.

Also, that the Secretary of the Treasury inform this House what are the causes of the great delay in answering resolutions of this House; and whether any reorganization of the Treasury Department is necessary, to insure a more efficient attention to the orders of Congress.

Mr. PROFFIT said that, if resolutions of the House—especially of the importance of these which had been passed nearly eight months—could thus remain neglected, it should not be his (Mr. Proffit's) fault. If Government officers can hold over public moneys, and thus silently be suffered to become defaulters, he (Mr. Proffit) would not be responsible for so gross neglect of public duty. Let those who refuse to call for information, or neglect to enforce the orders of this House, calling for information, bear the odium of any defalcation which may take place.

On the motion of Mr. EVERETT, 10,000 extra copies of the report of the Committee of Ways and Means, on the state of the finances, were ordered to be printed.

Mr. J. P. KENNEDY submitted a resolution directing the printing of the usual number of extra copies (10,000) of the annual commercial statement, so soon as it should be received from the Treasury Department.

Mr. FILLMORE moved to amend the resolution, by adding a like number of copies of the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, in answer to the resolution of the House adopted on the 23d instant.

Mr. J. L. WILLIAMS moved, as an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. Fillmore,] that 5,000 extra copies of the report of the select committee on retrenchment [Mr. Gilmer's] be printed.

The question was taken on the last motion, and the Speaker decided it to be lost.

Mr. J. L. WILLIAMS called for a count; but withdrew his call, at the request of many members, who apprehended that a count would show that no quorum was present.

The amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. Fillmore] was agreed to; and, after an ineffectual effort on the part of Mr. A. V. BROWN to have the resolution laid on the table, it was, as amended, adopted.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a number of executive communications; which were all laid on the table, or referred, and ordered to be printed.

A communication from the Treasury Department, in answer to a resolution of the 23d February, transmitting a statement of the outstanding appropriations on the 3d of March, 1841, and the available means of the treasury at the same period; also, the outstanding appropriations and available means estimated for the 3d March, 1843.

A communication from the Treasury Department, transmitting the report of J. W. P. Lewis, engineer, on the condition of the light-houses in the United States.

A communication from the Treasury Department, showing the official emoluments of the various officers of the customs during the past year.

A communication from the Treasury Department, supplementary to the report upon steamboat navigation in the Mississippi river, and on the Northern lakes.

A communication from the War Department, transmitting a statement of the contingent expenditures of that department.

A communication from the Post Office Department, exhibiting the number of persons employed in that department.

A communication from the War Department, in answer to the resolution of the House asking for the reasons for the reduction of General Gaines's pay. The communication states that the pay was reduced in consequence of the act of last session reducing the army, by which General Gaines, who is major general by brevet, has the command of only four regiments, and is, therefore, according to the regulations of the army, only entitled to the pay of brigadier general.

Mr. TOLAND asked leave to offer a resolution, (not read; and the purport, therefore, not known.)

Mr. WISE objected to the introduction of the resolution.

Mr. TOLAND persisting in his effort to get the resolution in,

Mr. WELLER moved an adjournment.

Tellers were called for on the motion, (Messrs. TOLAND and WELLER,) who reported ayes 54, noes 63.

So the House refused to adjourn—no quorum voting.

The SPEAKER suggested that the report of the Conference Committee on the army bill be now taken up and acted on.

Objection was made.

Mr. TOLAND renewed the effort to get in his resolution.

Mr. WISE again objected.

Mr. L. W. ANDREWS moved a call of the House.

Mr. JACOB THOMPSON moved that the House adjourn; on which motion tellers (Messrs. ANDREWS and A. V. BROWN) were appointed. They reported ayes 58, noes 55.

So the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
February 25, 1843.

To the Editor of the Globe:

In the Globe of yesterday, on the bill to suspend the operation of the second section of the act requiring the States to be divided into congressional districts, the remarks of Mr. CAMPBELL of South Carolina, and an explanation of mine on the same subject, are so reported as to make an erroneous impression. The following is the part of the report to which I allude:

"Mr. CAMPBELL said that in the State of Georgia, the elections came on previous to the time of the meeting of their Legislature; and though the Legislature on its meeting proceeded almost immediately to divide the State into congressional districts for the twenty-ninth Congress, yet the elections for the twenty-eighth Congress having already taken place, they had no power under the constitution to set them aside, and order new elections. The same state of things had happened in Missouri; but he was informed that a majority of the people of that State were in favor of the district system, and they would eventually adopt it.

"Mr. J. C. EDWARDS said that the gentleman was mistaken—a majority of the Legislature believed that the act of Congress was unconstitutional."

This language conveys the idea that I said "the gentleman was mistaken" in his information "that a majority of the people of that State (Missouri) were in favor of the district system, and they would eventually adopt it." It was not my intention to convey this idea. I said nothing in reference to the opinions of a majority of the people on this subject. The remark made by the gentleman from South Carolina, in allusion to the opinions of the people, and as to what they might eventually do on the subject of districting the State, did not catch my attention. I explained in reference to the action and opinion of the Legislature only; and what I said was this:

"The gentleman is mistaken as to the action of our Legislature. I have been recently informed that the Legislature of Missouri have refused to district that State. I believe a majority of the Legislature deem the act of Congress requiring them to district the State unconstitutional." I might have added, that a refusal to district the State was proof of this opinion; and that, even if they believed Congress had the power to district, yet they denied the power of Congress to compel the State Legislature to district for them.

I said nothing as to the opinion of the people of my State. I said nothing as to their future action on this subject. I knew nothing.

Very respectfully,
J. C. EDWARDS.

To the Editor of the Globe:

SIR: In the report of congressional proceedings of Thursday, February 23, contained in the Globe of Friday evening, February 24, it is said "Mr. TILLINGHAST offered, as an amendment to the amendment, $100,000 for Hell-gate, in New York."

This is an error. The amendment referred to was offered by Mr. ROOSEVELT of New York—not by me. I voted against it. The two amendments offered by me (with notice that, if they failed here, I should renew them on another occasion) were—one for the survey on Block Island, and one for removing obstructions in Providence river.

Very respectfully, yours,
J. L. TILLINGHAST.

February 25, 1843.

IN SENATE.

MONDAY, February 27, 1843.

Mr. EVANS, from the Committee on Finance, made a report (which was ordered to be printed) adverse to the passage of the bill for the relief of Samuel Hoffman.

Mr. WRIGHT presented a memorial from the counties of St. Lawrence and Franklin, New York, praying for the establishment of a post route. He remarked that he did not expect that any action could be had upon it this session; but, with a view that the papers might be preserved, he presented them, and moved that they be referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads. Agreed to.

On motion by Mr. EVANS, the previous orders were postponed, and the bill to permit the entry of merchandise in certain cases free of duty, was taken up, read the second time, and considered as in committee of the whole.

Mr. EVANS explained the propriety of the passage of this bill. He said that some persons had lately invented a valuable machine for the purpose of raising wrecks. Two vessels had already been raised by it in the river Delaware, by which a great improvement had been effected in the navigation of that river; those vessels having heretofore formed a kind of bar or obstruction there. The raising of those vessels was a very expensive and hazardous undertaking. In the two cases alluded to, some crockery, &c., had been saved from the wrecks alluded to. This bill proposed that those goods, and all goods saved in like manner, should be admitted free of duty, as an encouragement to the inventors to progress in such useful labors.

Mr. WOODBURY made some remarks in favor of the bill.

Mr. KING was fearful that the revenues were not sufficiently guarded by it.

Mr. EVANS replied, that its provisions were properly guarded. Those goods were to be admitted free, under such regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury.

There being no amendment proposed to the bill, it was reported to the Senate, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

House bills for the relief of Nancy Tompkins and of Conrad House were taken up as in committee of the whole, on adverse reports of the Committees on Claims and Naval Affairs, and indefinitely postponed.

Mr. TAPPAN presented a petition from citizens of Jefferson county, Ohio, asking Congress to interfere in the case of Mr. Kendall, and restore him to personal liberty.

Mr. TAPPAN remarked that a bill had been carefully prepared and reported by the Committee on Claims upon this very subject; and, unless it was taken up and acted upon at once, it could not be passed this session. Its provisions would not at all affect the demand of Stockton & Stokes, but merely suspended the imprisonment until one year after the Supreme Court shall have rendered final judgment. He, therefore, moved that the previous orders of the day be postponed, and that the bill be taken up.

The question being put, it was carried in the affirmative; and the bill was taken up, read the second time, and considered as in committee of the whole.

Mr. WRIGHT said the bill was merely a bill to amend the act relating to imprisonment for debt in the District of Columbia. The Committee on Claims, which reported the bill, were decidedly of the opinion that Congress should not interfere, by its legislation, with the judgment which had been rendered against Mr. Kendall, at this time—the case having been carried up to the Supreme Court on an appeal. The committee, in examining the case, found (which was new to all of them) by the laws which related to the imprisonment for debt in this District, at this time, that when a debtor was in charge on execution by any person, he may take the bounds for twelve months, and then, if he does not pay the debt, he is placed at once in close confinement. All that the bill proposed to do in the matter was to modify the insolvent law, so that the debtor could not be placed in close confinement pending an appeal, nor until one year after the Supreme Court shall have rendered a final judgment.

Mr. GRAHAM said, if the bill was passed, it would make the insolvent laws the same as they have been in North Carolina ever since the Revolution.

There being no amendment proposed, the bill was reported to the Senate, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

On motion by Mr. GRAHAM, the previous orders were postponed, and the bill from the House for the relief of James S. Calhoun was taken up, as in committee of the whole, on an amendment from the Committee on Claims. The amendment having been agreed to, the bill was reported to the Senate, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. BATES, from the Committee on Pensions, reported back, with sundry amendments, the bill from the House granting pensions to certain widows of revolutionary soldiers. The amendments were ordered to be printed.

Mr. TAPPAN, from the Committee on Pensions, made adverse reports on the petition of the widow of Joshua Raymond, a soldier of the Revolution, and the petition of Joseph Thompson and John Gould, for pensions; also, on the petitions of Mary Spence and Philip King, and the resolutions of the Legislature of Vermont in favor of the revival of the law granting a pension to the widows of revolutionary officers and soldiers who were married prior to 1794.

Mr. HENDERSON, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, reported back, without amendment, and with a recommendation that it do pass, the bill for the relief of Antoine Vasques and others."

Also, reported back, and adversely to its passage, House bill entitled "An act to confirm to Elizabeth Burris, her heirs and assigns, their title to a tract of land."

Mr. SEVIER, from the Committee on Pensions, made an adverse report on the petition of John Bosworth for a pension; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. S., also, reported back from the same committee, without amendment, the bill for the relief of Daniel Penhallow.

On the suggestion of Mr. KING, the Senate proceeded to consider the several bills on the calendar; when the following were taken up as in committee of the whole, considered, reported to the Senate, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, viz:

The bill for the relief of Richard Patton.

The bill to revive the act entitled "An act to enable claimants to land within the limits of Missouri and the Territory of Arkansas, to institute proceedings to try the validity of their claims," approved the 26th of May, 1824; and the act amending the same, and extending the provisions of said acts to claimants to land within the States of Louisiana and Mississippi.

[Mr. SEVIER made some remarks in favor of the above bill.]

The bill for the relief of Charles M. Keller.

The bill to repeal certain parts of the act entitled "An act respecting the organization of the army, and for other purposes," approved the 23d of August, 1842.

The bill for the relief of Joseph Bryan, Harrison Young, and Benjamin Young.

[This bill was amended, on the suggestion of Mr. BAGBY, so as to read for the heirs of Harrison Young.]

The bill declaring Robbinston, in the State of Maine, to be a port of delivery.

The bill to extend the Patent Office to Ninth street, came up as in committee of the whole.

Mr. KING was opposed to the erection of any new public buildings now.

Messrs. TAPPAN and KERR made some remarks on the necessity of continuing the construction of this building, to supply the wants of the Patent department.

Mr. KERR made several propositions to amend, which were agreed to.

The bill was then reported to the Senate, and ordered to be engrossed, as amended, for a third reading.

The bill of the Senate authorizing a survey and examination of the harbor of Memphis, Tennessee, came up for consideration; but was, on the motion of Mr. BAYARD, laid on the table,—a bill from the House for the same purpose being on the calendar.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE, from the Committee on Commerce, reported back, with an amendment, and with recommendation that it do pass, the bill for the protection of commerce on the Northwestern lakes.

The bill to apply certain alternate sections of the public domain towards the completion of works of internal improvement in the State of Michigan, and for other purposes, was taken up as in committee of the whole, on amendments of the Committee on Public Lands, proposing to strike out the 3d and 4th sections giving 500,000 acres to pay off the debts for the railroads and canals, and completing the same.

The bill was then read.

Mr. KING inquired the length of the road and canal along which the sections of land were to be granted.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE said the canal was 200 miles in length, and the railroad 160 miles.

Mr. KING objected that heretofore no grants had been made to States for similar purposes extending beyond two miles on each side of the roads or canals belonging to the State; but this bill proposed to give ten miles wide, for 360 miles in length, to the State of Michigan. This would be a precedent for other States to make the like demands.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE referred to the report of the Committee on the Public Lands as a justification for the bill. The same principle of granting alternate sections of land along the public works of Ohio, Illinois, and Indiana, was that upon which this bill was framed. He contended that the United States never lost a cent by these grants, because the price of the reserved alternate sections was always doubled by the improvements made by the States.

The bill was then reported to the Senate, and the amendments of the committee of the whole were concurred in.

Mr. McROBERTS asked how much land was granted to the State of Michigan by this bill?

Mr. WOODBRIDGE replied, one-half of each five alternate sections of land along the works.

Mr. McROBERTS referred to the grants hitherto made to Ohio; and, taking it for granted that the quantity donated by this bill would be found considerably beyond the amount given to Ohio, there was no other way of doing justice to all the new States but to adopt some settled principle. The donation now asked for Michigan would be a partial one, if granted. He was in favor of giving Michigan as much land as Ohio, but not more. Michigan, by this bill, would get a million of acres of land, while Arkansas gets none at all.

Mr. SMITH of Indiana maintained that the grant thus made to Michigan would be no loss whatever to the United States, as the General Government would receive just as much money for the alternate sections reserved, as for the whole if no improvements were made.

Mr. WALKER did not object to the grant of lands to the State of Michigan; but was utterly opposed to any such principle as that of granting lands, as the 3d and 4th sections had proposed, to the payment of the debts of the States. Since these two sections had been stricken out, he would now vote for the bill.

Mr. HUNTINGTON considered this bill an act of justice due to the State of Michigan, as well as the United States. He, therefore, hoped it would receive the sanction of the Senate.

Mr. GRAHAM asked whether the land granted was ten miles wide.

Mr. KING explained that the grant was five miles wide on each side of the works and alternate sections.

Mr. WRIGHT asked whether the bill referred to lands belonging to the United States only.

Mr. SMITH of Indiana explained, that where the land had been previously sold, other lands would be selected.

Mr. WRIGHT observed, that where alternate sections are already sold, the consideration of the increased price cannot be realized by the Government. He hoped, therefore, the grant would extend only to unsold lands.

Mr. ALLEN suggested that the amendment should be made to avoid that predicament; because it would otherwise be a grant to carry on these public works at the expense of the public treasury.

Mr. BERRIEN agreed that there was a difficulty, and suggested the propriety of passing over the bill informally, with a view of giving time for the friends of the bill to remove the objections.

The bill was accordingly passed over informally.

Mr. WALKER, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported a bill for the relief of John Grant; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

PUBLICATION OF THE DEBATES IN CONGRESS.

The Senate bill, No. 128, entitled "A bill for the publication of the debates and proceedings of Congress, in a continued series, and to authorize one or more contracts for that purpose," being called up, on the motion of Mr. BAYARD, at whose instance it had been laid on the table on Saturday—

Mr. WRIGHT objected, that, as the bill would necessarily induce debate, it would have the effect of obstructing all other bills on the calendar entitled to immediate action.

Mr. KING suggested the propriety of letting it lie over, if it was intended to pass any of the bills on the calendar, as serious objections entertained against this measure would necessarily lead to a protracted discussion.

Mr. BAYARD remarked, that the bill having been laid on the table on Saturday, upon his motion, he thought it incumbent on him to make the motion now to take it up.

Mr. KING moved to lay the bill on the table.

Mr. SEVIER requested the Senator would suspend his motion for a moment.

Mr. KING having assented,

Mr. SEVIER made a short explanation in reference to an impression he had, regarding the party character of the Register of Debates, published by Gales & Seaton; which he had been since assured by those gentlemen was a misconception on his part.

Mr. BENTON, as an instance that the Register of Debates contained but a one-sided report of congressional proceedings, referred to the lengthy discussions on the subject of the Bank of the United States, in which all the speeches in favor of the bank are given in full, and those in opposition cut short, or suppressed. He particularly pointed out one speech he had made himself, on which he had bestowed great labor and research, and which it took him two full hours to deliver, that Messrs. Gales & Seaton, in their publication of the proceedings in Congress, paid for by the Government as an impartial view of the debates, cut off to half a finger's length; and by which he (Mr. B.) was represented as if he had only spoken two minutes, instead of two hours, and then broken down; for the conclusion of the paragraph is, that he (Mr. B) "gave way." [Much laughter.]

Mr. WALKER also opposed any proceedings on this bill, necessarily involving the complete obstruction of bills on the calendar, upon which so many public and private interests were dependent. He thought it would be much better for the Senator from Delaware to consent to lay this bill on the table; and if this proposition were changed to a motion to take up his resolution for the employment of a corps of reporters, he would feel disposed to give him his support.

Mr. BAYARD, in substance, remarked that the resolution alluded to by the Senator from Mississippi would not reach to the object contemplated by this bill, which is retrospective, and proposes the collection and publication of the debates in Congress from the year 1789 to the end of this session; whereas the resolution with regard to employing a corps of reporters, is prospective, and looks to the correct and faithful publications of the proceedings in Congress hereafter.

With regard to the prospective measure contemplated by the resolution to which the Senator had alluded, all he had to say was, that, whenever it should be deemed expedient to take it up, he would be in favor of any efficient practical mode of attaining the object in view. That some such arrangement for insuring a full, fair, and impartial record of proceedings was indispensably necessary, must be manifest to every one who witnessed the debates in the Senate on all political subjects involving the opinions of the two great parties into which the country was divided. It was very well known that, in general, very full reports of the proceedings in the Senate were published in the Globe daily; and, upon ordinary subjects, not partaking of a political complexion, very fair and impartial reports they were. But the moment any subject of a party character was to be reported, there was an obvious deviation from this line of impartiality. Then, from some cause or other—it may be, not from any disposition of the reporters actually to do injustice, but as a necessary result of having to prepare their matter for a paper taking a very decided part in politics,—they seem to be, to say the least of it, careless how they represent the opinions of the party opposed to their friends, and take especial care to devote all their attention to the side which expresses sentiments most analogous to those of the readers of their paper. As an instance, he would refer to the late debate on General Jackson's fine, in which his own remarks were represented as the most washy-washy affair imaginable. He did not complain of this; for it was an inevitable consequence of leaving the matter without any control, entirely dependent upon the private enterprise of party papers. Nor should it be understood that he questioned the ability of the Globe reporters to make proper reports; for he had already admitted that, upon general subjects, the reports were exceedingly good. He would even do them the justice to say that, in the running proceedings, not having any bearing on party predilections, the reports were admirable.

Mr. BUCHANAN renewed the motion of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. KING] to lay the bill upon the table, and on this motion he called for the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

The question was then taken on the motion to lay the bill on the table, and resulted in the negative—yeas 19, nays 25, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Bagby, Benton, Buchanan, Calhoun, Cuthbert, Fulton, King, McRoberts, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Sturgeon, Tappan, Walker, Wilcox, Williams, Woodbury, Wright, and Young—19.

NAYS—Messrs. Archer, Barrow, Bates, Bayard, Berrien, Choate, Clayton, Crittenden, Dayton, Evans, Graham, Henderson, Huntington, Kerr, Mangum, Merrick, Miller, Morehead, Phelps, Porter, Smith of Indiana, Sprague, Tallmadge, White, and Woodbridge—25.

Mr. ALLEN said it was obviously impossible to pass this bill, without such an opposition as must lead to a most protracted debate. He put it to the Senators on the other side, whether they could stand justified before the country for obstructing the public business by this attempt to force through such a bill, subjecting the exhausted treasury of the Government to an expenditure of half a million of dollars, for no other necessary purpose but the reward of their partisan press? Could they plead any public necessity for this measure? What necessity could they plead, but the real one—that of sustaining the political organ of their party? What did the people care for this publication? What did they want with it? If members of Congress had occasion to refer to old debates, they could do so at any time in the library of Congress. They had the same materials there, that were to compose this publication. They had the Register of Debates from 1824 to 1837, and the Congressional Globe and Appendix from 1837 to this date. And he would here say that the Congressional Globe and Appendix, already published, and continuous in course of publication, contained the most extensive, accurate, and impartial reports ever before published, and a greater amount of matter than had ever been offered to the public at so small a charge. This was a publication open to every member of Congress to correct, and publish in the most authentic form, both his remarks in running debate, and speeches at large. The Appendix was devoted to speeches written out by members themselves; so that, if the reporters unintentionally make mistakes, these inaccuracies stand corrected in the Appendix. And as to information of the proceedings of Congress to be given to the people, did not this very publication effect more than Congress itself could effect? for it has already a most extensive circulation, and reaches to every part of the Union. What more could be effected by a contract of Government to publish it over again? There was obviously no necessity for incurring the expense of republishing the Congressional Globe and Appendix. So much for that part of the bill. Now, with regard to the other proposition—that of reprinting the old debates from 1789 to 1824, and purchasing 1,000 copies of the Register of Debates from 1824 to 1837—he would ask, how much money all this was to cost? He would venture to say that the expense could not fall short of half a million of dollars. It was easy to judge by experience. Mr. A. then referred, somewhat in detail, to the expenditures by Congress from time to time on similar publications—such as the Documentary History of the Revolution, the Register of Debates, &c. He assured the Senators on the other side it was not possible for them to pass this bill, without such an opposition as must necessarily involve a protracted discussion, which would obstruct all other business. He therefore hoped they would yield to a motion he should make—which was, to postpone the bill indefinitely; and on this motion he called for the yeas and nays, which were ordered.

Mr. McROBERTS reminded Senators that there were but five days of the session to complete the vast amount of business yet awaiting the action of the Senate. It must be quite obvious that, to accomplish all this necessary and important business, the whole of that time would be required, even without debate; and it was equally obvious that, if this bill was persisted in, it would be opposed and discussed to an indefinite extent, rendering it impossible to devote any attention to the general calendar. He therefore hoped they would allow the motion of postponement to prevail.

Mr. WOODBURY said there was one point of view which ought to satisfy gentlemen that this was no time to press such a bill as this. It was, that this proposition would have to be carried out on borrowed money. Now, he would ask, was there not an obvious impropriety, setting aside all considerations as to the inexpediency or imperfection of the plan proposed, to borrow money at six per cent. interest, for any such purpose as this?

Mr. WRIGHT adverted to the principle of distributing books to members of Congress at the public expense, which he had hoped the Senate had long since repudiated. This bill, he considered nothing more nor less than a proposition to resume that practice. Congress was to pay as much for 1,000 sets of these publications, as would enable the publishers to lay aside another thousand sets for future operations on Congress. The thousand sets first purchased by Congress were to lumber the rooms of the library till they became a nuisance, and then Congress was to be called upon to distribute them to its own members. When that thousand sets become thus exhausted, succeeding Congresses will think themselves unfairly dealt with, if they too are not to get sets of the same books. They will be told by the publishers that they have only to pass a resolution to purchase the reserved copies in their hands, and that is sure to be done. Thus the surplus copies of the publishers are sure to be ordered. What had it cost Congress, during the past two or three years, for books thus distributed? Not less, he believed, than between sixty and seventy thousand dollars.

He asked who was to be the author of the compilation of the Debates in Congress, from the year 1789, and who was to measure the extent of the work? Who could tell what matter is either published or suppressed in the compilation?

The stereotyped resolution in Congress is, that all such books as have hitherto been distributed to members of Congress, shall be procured for members who have not received any; and if any new books are ordered, they are to be included. Thus the whole mass is kept moving, increasing in expenses as it progresses.

As to the published Register of Debates by Gales and Seaton: he read from the debates of 1832 a paragraph sneering at the remarks of Mr. Hill in the Senate; and also another in relation to Mr. Benton in the same year, wherein it was stated in conclusion that the Senator then "gave way."

Mr. BENTON. Broke down, I suppose. [Laughter.]

Mr. WRIGHT continued. He referred again to allusions made to a speech of Mr. Hill on the subject of the Bank of the United States, which occupied between two and three hours; but is dismissed with a sneer at his practice of reading from copious notes prepared for his speeches. Mr. W. also referred to a speech made by himself in the House of Representatives on the tariff, in 1828, which had cost him a vast deal of labor and research, and which, in fact, embodied the only arguments of importance urged on his side of the question; yet he had been unable to find the slightest reference to that speech in Gales & Seaton's Register of Debates, although he had furnished the publishers with a corrected copy of it, in printed form, to be placed in its proper place.

If it should be the opinion of Congress that the debates from 1789 should be published, a revision ought to be made, and important questions of constitutional law should be selected in preference to unimportant subjects.

He produced the Congressional Globe and Appendix for the twenty-fourth Congress, which he took as an average of the size of the series, and computed that the proceedings of each Congress would make six volumes; so that the republication of the Congressional Globe and Appendix would make sixty volumes. In allusion to Gales & Seaton's Register of Debates proposed to be republished or purchased, and the number of volumes necessary to give the debates from 1789 to 1824, he calculated that the whole could not, even at a moderate estimate, be computed at less than 100 volumes; so that 1,000 sets would comprise 100,000 volumes; which, at the price proposed, ($5 per volume,) would amount to $500,000.

Alluding to the remarks of the Senator from Delaware, in reference to reports of proceedings—when the matter published amounted to ten or twelve columns daily, there were necessarily many inaccuracies, inevitable from the fact of the reporters not hearing distinctly what is said, or failing to catch the ideas intended to be conveyed; which showed that a republication of such reports, authenticated by the sanction of Congress, would present anything but a correct and faithful register of what was said and done. It was obvious, then, that it would be improper to become responsible for such republications.

But, independently of all considerations of detail, he would ask, was it, at this late period of the session, proper to persist in pressing forward a bill which must consume the time that ought to be devoted to the business of the session yet to be disposed of?

Mr. CALHOUN hoped the motion to postpone would prevail. He was utterly amazed to find, from the calculation of the Senator from New York, that this was a proposition to give half a million of dollars to one company of printers, and he supposed not less than a quarter of a million to another—making $750,000, in all, chargeable on the treasury.

He would ask the chairman of the Committee on Retrenchment what would be the aggregate amount deducted from the salaries of officers and persons in the public service, should the amendment to the reform bill of the House be adopted.

Mr. MOREHEAD replied, that the reduction of 12½ per cent. would effect a saving of something like $460,000. The House retrenchments would probably make the amount $150,000 more.

Mr. CALHOUN, on this information, continued his remarks—the purport of which was, to show the mockery of professing a zeal for retrenchment, in clippings from the salaries of public servants to the extent of four or five hundred thousand dollars, while this bill proposed to squander $750,000 among four printers.

Mr. ALLEN said that, when he first saw this bill, he felt considerable surprise at finding in it the proposition to include the publication of the Congressional Globe and Appendix in the vast job contemplated. This surprise led him to make some inquiry on the subject, and he was pleased to find—as, indeed, from what he knew of the editor of the Globe, he confidently anticipated—that he had nothing whatever to do with the proposition, nor had he any idea of its being in the bill, till brought to his notice by this debate. He (Mr. A.) had further learned from the editor of the Globe, that, so far from approving this proposition, he would not only repudiate any participation in such a proceeding, but utterly denounce the whole thing in the editorial columns of his paper.

What, then, he (Mr. A.) would ask, could have been the object of putting the Congressional Globe and Appendix in the bill at all, in conjunction with the Register of Debates and contract with Gales & Seaton for publishing the proceedings of Congress from 1789 to 1824, but to enlist both sides of this chamber in favor of a measure which was to result in the benefit of the organs of both parties? He was far from imputing such motives to any Senator, much less to the estimable and honorable individuals composing the Library Committee; for he felt well assured they originated outside this Capitol. But he would ask those who built upon such foundations, did they imagine that Democratic Senators could be brought to vote in silence upon this bill, because it contained a proposition to confer upon their party organ a profitable contract? If they did, they were grossly ignorant of the great principles which actuated the Democracy, of which they were the delegated exponents. Mr. ALLEN here denounced, with much energy, the proposition to include Blair & Rives in this monstrous job. He also dwelt upon the principles which should actuate all legislation, with a view of showing that, there being no necessity for these contracts, but that arising out of the cupidity of individual publishers. It was a gross outrage on the powers intrusted to Congress to legislate for any such purpose.

Mr. CALHOUN expressed his extreme gratification at the Senator's intimation that the editor of the Globe had so promptly denounced the introduction of his name into this bill. He hoped, therefore, in justice to that talented editor, that when in order, an amendment would be made to strike from the bill the names of Messrs. Blair & Rives.

The question was then taken on Mr. ALLEN's motion to postpone the bill indefinitely, and resulted in the negative—yeas 21, nays 22, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Bagby, Benton, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clayton, Cuthbert, Fulton, King, McDuffie, McRoberts, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Sturgeon, Tappan, Walker, Wilcox, Williams, Woodbury, Wright, and Young—21.

NAYS—Messrs. Archer, Barrow, Bates, Bayard, Berrien, Choate, Crittenden, Dayton, Evans, Graham, Henderson, Huntington, Kerr, Mangum, Merrick, Miller, Morehead, Porter, Smith of Indiana, Sprague, Tallmadge, and Woodbridge—22.

Mr. BUCHANAN would have been very glad, if, before this bill had been pressed upon the Senate, some report had been prepared, affording some information as to what this measure was to cost. He would tell the Senator from South Carolina what all this meant. It meant to give the two party papers of this city a good fat job, out of which they could clear $100,000 each; and also to give members of Congress $500 apiece, in the shape of books. That was the foundation upon which the whole thing was to rest.

The question at last resolved itself into this: Were Senators prepared, within five days of the close of the present Congress, to vote $100,000 to each of their party editors, $500 apiece to themselves, and to burden the treasury with a further debt of half a million of dollars? Mr. B. proceeded to comment at large upon the nature of the proposition, the details of the bill, and the consequences of not having yielded to the motion to postpone.

Mr. McROBERTS moved to recommit the bill, with instructions to submit a report, showing what number of volumes of the Register of Debates are already published, and for what years; and what number of volumes will be required to complete the work, together with the probable expense.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE said this amendment would fall short of the object proposed by the Senator from Illinois. The committee had no means of estimating the number of volumes which the work would require, and, consequently, the exact expense. The committee had done all that was in its power to do, by stipulating that, wherever possible, the work should be confined to one volume for each session, and each volume should contain 700 pages. He also stated the impression of the committee as to the necessity of the measure.

Mr. McROBERTS pointed out that portion of the first section of the bill in which the committee could make the amendment he desired. He was quite satisfied, that if the bill were recommitted, the Committee on the Library could obtain full information for the report required, by making the inquiry of Blair & Rives.

Mr. McDUFFIE was quite sure that no Senator could be more willing than he was to approve of a proposition to collect and publish all valuable debates in Congress, from the foundation of the Government, in a proper form, properly selected, and brought forward at a proper time. If a judicious selection of such debates were properly made, it would, he conceded, be most valuable. But he was opposed to the indiscriminate republication of everything reported; for that would involve the accumulation of such a quantity of trash, that he doubted if he would pay the cost of transporting one hundred volumes of it to his residence.

Mr. ARCHER remarked, that the gentlemen on the other side had misapprehended the course pursued by the gentlemen on his side. This was the last day of the session, but one, on which Senate bills could be sent to the other House. They had, therefore, abstained from debate, not because they could not justify the bill, but because they were unwilling either to spend time themselves, or to induce others to spend it. Gales & Seaton had been selected as contractors, because they alone possessed the necessary materials for compiling the work required. And as to expense, he considered the fears of the gentleman had greatly exaggerated all probability. If he could have been brought to view the matter in the light in which they viewed it, he would hesitate; but he had no such apprehensions. Nor would the cost, even at a reduced amount, become a charge on the treasury all at once. The publication would naturally extend through a number of years; and the probability was, that there would be little or no expenditure this year.

The question was then taken on Mr. McROBERT's amendment, and decided in the negative—yeas 22, nays 23, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Bagby, Benton, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clayton, Cuthbert, Fulton, King, McDuffie, McRoberts, Rives, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Sturgeon, Tappan, Walker, Wilcox, Williams, Woodbury, Wright, and Young—22.

NAYS—Messrs. Archer, Barrow, Bates, Bayard, Berrien, Choate, Conrad, Dayton, Evans, Graham, Henderson, Huntington, Kerr, Mangum, Merrick, Miller, Morehead, Porter, Smith of Indiana, Sprague, Tallmadge, White, and Woodbridge—23.

Mr. HENDERSON suggested that a satisfactory limitation to the expense might be effected by striking out that portion of the bill providing for the purchase of the debates from 1824 to 1837, of which copies are already extant; and limiting the number of volumes to be published from 1789 to 1824, to twelve volumes; and those from 1837 to the end of this session, to seven volumes.

Mr. KING was quite certain that Senators on both sides were unprepared to give this measure that deliberation which it required. If brought forward at a proper time, some plan might be matured by which a competent person could be employed, in whom both parties would have confidence, to prepare a proper digest, which would be intrinsically more valuable than the work now proposed to be published—at a cost of three or four hundred thousand dollars, at the very least.

Mr. HENDERSON, with a view of carrying out his suggestion, pointed out those parts of the bill which might be so altered as to insure his object of bringing the expense below $100,000.

Mr. WRIGHT made an explanation, correcting some misconceptions he had of the provisions of the bill when he spoke before. He had since examined it more attentively, and he found it even more exceptionable than he had supposed. He found that the publication required of Gales & Seaton, from 1789 to 1824, was to be "such as in the series already published;" that is, their Register of Debates, the impartiality of which he and the Senator from Missouri [Mr. BENTON] had already pointed out. Such faithful and impartial collections of debates he did not want to see paid for and authenticated by the General Government again.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE explained the views of the Committee on the Library, which had satisfied them that no other persons were possessed of the same valuable and necessary materials for the work, and that none could accomplish it so well.

The question next in order was an amendment moved by Mr. TAPPAN, to strike out Gales & Seaton and Blair & Rives, leaving the matter open to competition, by advertisement and proposals, on which the yeas and nays were called for, and ordered.

Mr. TAPPAN said his object in submitting the amendment was, to free the bill from all appearances or tendencies of a partisan character. If Gales & Seaton had the only materials for the publication, they could of course make the most advantageous proposals. But he felt satisfied there was as good a collection of materials in the Library of Congress, as any Gales & Seaton could possibly possess.

Mr. WOODBURY asked how many volumes already purchased and published were on hand.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE said, in part, Congress had been supplied; and with regard to those on hand, this bill did not apply.

Mr. WOODBURY said there was the more reason for recommitting the bill. It was a proposition to publish and purchase. Why purchase, if there are volumes on hand? He would tell the Senator from Virginia [Mr. ARCHER] that there are seven volumes by Blair & Rives, and thirteen by Gales & Seaton, on the hands of the publishers—which, at $5, are to cost $100,000; and that will be a charge directly on the treasury. One important effect of advertising for proposals to contract for the publication, would be, that, instead of having to pay $5 per volume, the Government would not pay more than $2 50.

Mr. BUCHANAN remarked, that, according to the computation of the Senator from New York, there would be $150,000 to be paid to Gales & Seaton, and $50,000 to Blair & Rives, on the 4th of March, for those portions of the publications required by this bill, which those gentlemen have on hand ready for delivery. For, if each of these proprietors have 1,000 copies of the printed works on hand, they can be delivered on that day, and both together get checks on the treasury amounting to $200,000.

Mr. ALLEN said he found, on examination, that the debates during the first session in which he had been in Congress formed four volumes of the standard size required by the bill; therefore, he took it for granted that he might assume, as a fair average for the whole term from 1789 to the present time, two volumes per session—not taking account of extra sessions; so that, the period being 54 years, 108 volumes would be required; which, at $5 each, would make, for 1,000 copies, $540,000.

This, then, was the new burden to be put upon an exhausted treasury; and for what? To enrich a couple of editors of partisan newspapers—the most monstrous proposition ever heard of under any Government. And this proposition comes from those who prate so much about retrenchment! But he saw, when the matter was placed in its true light, an evident shrinking—the gentlemen were not prepared to stand up to it. And he could tell them that, if their bitterest enemy were anxious to stimulate them to rush headlong upon their own destruction, a more effectual mode of doing it could not be effected than to urge them to pass this bill. But he and his friends had a higher duty to perform than that of letting the opposite party ruin itself; they had to do their duty to the country, and save it from the infliction of such a monstrous outrage.

Mr. WALKER, from the beginning, saw that the editor of the Globe had nothing to do with the introduction of his name into this bill. His denunciation of such use of his name was no more than he anticipated. The Globe never had been a participator in these book jobs. But he would be glad to know how much had been paid to Gales & Seaton on such jobs. He would venture to say that not less than from one to two hundred thousand dollars of the public money had been thus disposed of, for the promotion of party purposes.

He hoped that, by this time, the friends of this bill had seen enough to convince themselves that it could not be passed. After so many hours of vainly attempting it, it was surely time for them to abandon their purpose.

Mr. WOODBURY adverted to the fact that the statutes of New Hampshire were published in the best style—each volume containing 600 pages—at $1 75 per volume. Gentlemen did not seem to be aware of the magnitude of the undertaking. They were about contracting for 100,000 volumes—equal to the largest of the public libraries.

The question was then taken on Mr. TAPPAN's amendment, to leave the publication open to competition, and resulted in the negative—yeas 20, nays 22, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Bagby, Benton, Buchanan, Calhoun, Cuthbert, Fulton, King, McDuffie, McRoberts, Rives, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Sturgeon, Tappan, Walker, Williams, Woodbury, Wright, and Young—20.

NAYS—Messrs. Archer, Barrow, Bates, Bayard, Berrien, Choate, Dayton, Evans, Graham, Henderson, Huntington, Kerr, Mangum, Merrick, Miller, Morehead, Porter, Smith of Indiana, Sprague, Tallmadge, White, and Woodbridge—22.

Mr. HENDERSON then moved the several amendments he had proposed, by which the number of volumes from 1789 to 1824 would be limited to twelve; and the debates already published in the Register of Debates, from 1824 to 1837, would be left out; the number of volumes from 1837 to 1844 being limited to seven.

These amendments, and all alterations of the bill requisite in consequence of them, were adopted, without any division on the question.

By one of these amendments, the Congressional Globe and Appendix, and the names of Blair & Rives, were stricken out of the bill.

Mr. KING moved to strike out the words, "and purchase;" which was agreed to.

Mr. McROBERTS moved to strike out "1,000 copies," and insert "300 copies;" and on this mosion he called for the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. TAPPAN suggested that 100 would be more than were wanted for the use of the General Government.

Mr. McROBERTS accepted the suggestion, and made his motion to strike out 1,000, and insert 100.

The question was then taken, and decided in the negative—yeas 19, nays 21, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Bagby, Benton, Buchanan, Calhoun, Cuthbert, Fulton, King, McDuffie, McRoberts, Rives, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Sturgeon, Tappan, Walker, Williams, Woodbury, and Wright—19.

NAYS—Messrs. Archer, Barrow, Bates, Berrien, Choate, Conrad, Crittenden, Dayton, Evans, Graham, Henderson, Huntington, Kerr, Mangum, Merrick, Miller, Porter, Smith of Indiana, Tallmadge, White, and Woodbridge—21.

Mr. WRIGHT moved to amend the third section, by striking out the words "to be distributed in such manner as Congress shall hereafter direct;" on which he called for the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

The question on this amendment was taken, and resulted in the negative—yeas 19, nays 21, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Bagby, Benton, Buchanan, Calhoun, Cuthbert, Fulton, King, McDuffie, McRoberts, Rives, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Sturgeon, Tappan, Walker, Williams, Woodbury, and Wright—19.

NAYS—Messrs. Archer, Barrow, Bates, Berrien, Choate, Conrad, Crittenden, Dayton, Evans, Graham, Henderson, Kerr, Mangum, Merrick, Miller, Porter, Smith of Indiana, Tallmadge, White, and Woodbridge—21.

Mr. TAPPAN moved a proviso, that the distribution of such copies shall not be made by this nor any future Congress; on which the yeas and nays were called for, and ordered.

The question was then taken on this amendment, and decided in the affirmative—yeas 26, nays 11, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Archer, Bagby, Benton, Buchanan, Calhoun, Conrad, Crittenden, Cuthbert, Fulton, Graham, Henderson, King, McDuffie, McRoberts, Mangum, Rives, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Smith of Indiana, Sturgeon, Tappan, Walker, Williams, Woodbury, and Wright—26.

NAYS—Messrs. Bates, Berrien, Choate, Dayton, Evans, Kerr, Merrick, Miller, Tallmadge, White, and Woodbridge—11.

Mr. McROBERTS moved that the Senate do now adjourn. On this question he called for the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

The Senate refused to adjourn—ayes 14, noes 21.

Mr. ALLEN moved to insert a proviso, that, "before any contract or agreement made under the provisions of this bill, and entered into, shall be binding, such contract shall be reported to both Houses of Congress; and, unless approved of by them, shall not be valid." On this question he called for the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

The question was then taken on this amendment, and decided in the negative—yeas 19, nays 22, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Bagby, Benton, Buchanan, Calhoun, Cuthbert, Fulton, King, McDuffie, McRoberts, Rives, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Sturgeon, Tappan, Walker, Williams, Woodbury, and Wright—19.

NAYS—Messrs. Archer, Barrow, Bates, Bayard, Berrien, Choate, Conrad, Crittenden, Dayton, Evans, Graham, Henderson, Huntington, Kerr, Mangum, Merrick, Miller, Porter, Smith of Indiana, Tallmadge, White, and Woodbridge—22.

Some verbal amendments were made at the suggestion of Messrs. KING and HENDERSON, rendered necessary in consequence of the names of Blair & Rives having been stricken out.

Mr. WRIGHT moved to strike out the words "such as are contained in that portion of the series already published."

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. WRIGHT next moved to strike out the 4th section, which was that making the appropriation for carrying out the proposition.

On this motion he called for the yeas and nays, which were ordered, and resulted—yeas 19, nays 23, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Bagby, Benton, Buchanan, Calhoun, Cuthbert, Fulton, King, McDuffie, McRoberts, Rives, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Sturgeon, Tappan, Walker, Williams, Woodbury, and Wright—19.

NAYS—Messrs. Archer, Barrow, Bates, Bayard, Berrien, Choate, Clayton, Conrad, Crittenden, Dayton Evans, Graham, Henderson, Huntington, Kerr, Mangum, Merrick, Miller, Porter, Smith of Indiana, Tallmadge, White, and Woodbridge—23.

Mr. TAPPAN moved to strike out the words "Gales & Seaton," and insert "some suitable person willing to contract," &c. He asked the gentlemen opposite what confidence they would have in the impartiality of Blair & Rives, in selecting materials for such a publication? And if they would not be willing to intrust them, how could they ask the Democratic party to have confidence in the impartiality of Gales & Seaton.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE said, possibly the objection might have some weight, if the proposition was for Gales & Seaton to write speeches and debates for publication; but the contract was to be simply for republishing speeches and debates already published.

Mr. BUCHANAN had no disposition to cast any imputation on Gales & Seaton's integrity; nor did he imagine the Senator from Ohio had. By an arbitrary rule, just adopted at the instance of the Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. HENDERSON,] the debates from 1789 to 1824 were to be compressed into 12 volumes; and the power to select, compress, and cut down these debates, was to be given to Gales & Seaton. Now, if he (Mr. B.) was in the present majority, he would not—at least he thought he could not—persuade his friends to choose Blair & Rives for executing such a task. Such a man as Jared Sparks would be a proper person to make the compendium; for, notwithstanding all that had been said, he considered Jared Sparks an honest man. [The French map being mentioned.] Ay, notwithstanding the French map.

Mr. BENTON. That map killed him, sir.

Mr. CRITTENDEN pointed out a few reasons which induced him and his friends to prefer Gales & Seaton to any one that could be selected. They alone possessed the materials for the compilation.

Mr. BENTON remarked that he could find, in the Library of Congress, abundance of materials for the compilation; and, he would venture to say, far better than Gales & Seaton could possibly have.

Mr. CRITTENDEN had no doubt the Senator so believed; but he was equally certain he was mistaken. Mr. C. then passed a warm eulogium on Mr. Gales, and concluded by declaring he did not know a man so well qualified for the task in every particular.

Mr. BUCHANAN disclaimed any imputation inconsistent with the highest respect for Gales & Seaton. What he said, and intended to say, was, that no party editors should have the compilation; for, unless a person, so associated with party, were an angel, he could not divest himself of some prejudice likely to operate unconsciously. Without knowing it, he would necessarily find himself giving preference to the speeches of his own party, or overestimating their value, and underestimating those of the opposite party.

Mr. CRITTENDEN (if he understood the Senator) supposed he would hardly intrust this publication to any but an angel. Now, if the Senator can get an angel to turn editor, he was ready to give him the preference over Gales & Seaton; but, as the work must in reality be done by mortal man, and not by angels, he would sooner take Gales & Seaton than others, when all must have some political feeling in a country like this, and no one else had equal abilities and materials for performing the task.

Mr. BUCHANAN knew the Senator had a great deal of the milk of human kindness in his composition, but he did not suppose it would carry him so far as to say that Nicholas Biddle would be an impartial person to choose for selecting materials for the history of the United States Bank. And as to angels, he could hardly persuade himself that the Senator would prefer them to Gales & Seaton as editors of this work.

Mr. BENTON now produced and referred to numerous large volumes of newspapers from the Library of Congress, containing a continuous series of debates from 1789 to the late war; from which he showed that debates were reported in full, and in the handsomest style.

Mr. SEVIER asked the Senator to give way for a motion to adjourn.

Mr. BENTON said there was no occasion. He was quite fresh and vigorous, and had just waked up from the sofa, where he had recruited himself for this night's work. He meant first to prove that others could perform this task quite as well, if not better, than Gales & Seaton. The mechanics were bringing him in the folios as quick as they could, and had yet a cartload in reserve.

Mr. SEVIER moved an adjournment; and on this question called for the yeas and nays; which were ordered; and

The Senate refused to adjourn—yeas 19, nays 21.

Mr. BENTON then proceeded to turn over the debates in the folios of newspapers before him, commenting on them as he proceeded. While doing so, some laughter occurred; upon which he said this bill was not a subject for joking, it was too abominable for that—it was damnable. He could tell gentlemen it would and should be fought against, if every day and night, without intermission, till the 4th of March, was to be spent in the contest. It should go abroad in every direction, and to the most remote recesses of the Union, that the public business had been entirely superseded at the close of the last session of this expiring Congress, to enable gentlemen from whose hands the power they had so much abused was departing, to pension their partisan press. Mr. B. spoke with great energy and effect for more than half an hour, pointing out all the iniquities of this proposition.

The question was then taken on Mr. TAPPAN's amendment to strike out "Gales & Seaton" and insert a "suitable person," &c.; and decided in the negative—yeas 16, nays 19, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Bagby, Benton, Buchanan, Calhoun, Fulton, King, McRoberts, Sevier, Smith, of Connecticut, Tappan, Wilcox, Williams, Woodbury, Wright, and Young—16.

NAYS—Messrs. Archer, Barrow, Berrien, Clayton, Crittenden, Dayton, Evans, Graham, Henderson, Huntington, Kerr, Mangum, Miller, Morehead, Porter, Smith of Indiana, Sprague, Tallmadge, and Woodbridge—19.

Mr. ALLEN observed that the Senate having been eight hours in session, it was now time to adjourn. He, therefore, moved an adjournment, and called for the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

The Senate again refused to adjourn—yeas 16, nays 20, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Bagby, Benton, Buchanan, Calhoun, Fulton, King, McRoberts, Sevier, Smith, of Connecticut, Tappan, Wilcox, Williams, Woodbury, Wright, and Young—16.

NAYS—Messrs. Archer, Barrow, Bates, Berrien, Clayton, Crittenden, Dayton, Evans, Graham, Henderson, Huntington, Kerr, Mangum, Miller, Morehead, Porter, Smith of Indiana, Sprague, Tallmadge, and Woodbridge—20.

Mr. WOODBURY moved to strike out the words "$5 per volume," and insert "$3 per volume."

On this motion the yeas and nays were called for, and ordered; and resulted—yeas 16, nays 20, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Bagby, Benton, Buchanan, Calhoun, Fulton, King, McRoberts, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Tappan, Wilcox, Williams, Woodbury, Wright, and Young—16.

NAYS—Messrs. Archer, Barrow, Bates, Berrien, Clayton, Crittenden, Dayton, Evans, Graham, Henderson, Huntington, Kerr, Mangum, Miller, Morehead, Porter, Smith of Indiana, Sprague, Tallmadge, and Woodbridge—20.

Mr. WOODBURY next moved to amend the 4th section, by making the appropriation only extend to the present year, leaving each succeeding year to be appropriated for in the ordinary appropriation bills.

On this amendment the yeas and nays were called for, and ordered; and resulted—yeas 16, nays 20, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Bagby, Benton, Buchanan, Conrad, Fulton, King, McRoberts, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Tappan, Wilcox, Williams, Woodbury, Wright, and Young—16.

NAYS—Messrs. Archer, Barrow, Bates, Berrien, Clayton, Crittenden, Dayton, Evans, Graham, Henderson, Huntington, Kerr, Mangum, Miller, Morehead, Porter, Smith of Indiana, Sprague, Tallmadge, and Woodbridge—20.

Mr. BENTON said there was one part of the bill which admitted of amendment as long as a figure of it held together—he meant the proposition of paying for 1,000 copies. He had a great many amendments to offer on that point; and to give himself latitude enough, he would begin with a rise of 50 copies over the rejected number moved as a substitute by the Senator from Illinois; and so going on, 50 at a time, till he could get some of his amendments to stick. He did not doubt that the stars now beaming in on the windows, would give way to the rising sun before they were all got through. He would begin with 150 He therefore moved to strike out 1,000, and insert 150; and on this motion required the yeas and nays. It would be a good day's work to save the country half a million of dollars in one day; and it made him quite fresh and vigorous to think of it. He felt that he could hold out a couple of days and nights, without sleeping or eating, to effect so much good. His friends had been now nine hours battling the monster, and he would try his hand for nine hours more. The Senator from Kentucky had made a very accurate calculation the other day, that 40 or 50 bills might have been passed in the two hours which had been devoted to Sir Robert Peel's construction of the treaty; and, by the same rule, the nine hours lost in persevering with this bill, might have enabled the Senate to pass 300 bills awaiting the action of Congress. All this was to fasten on the treasury this great printing job for a partisan press.

The question was then taken on the motion to substitute 150 for 1,000, and decided in the negative—yeas 17, nays 20, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Bagby, Benton, Buchanan, Calhoun, Fulton, King, McRoberts, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Tappan, Walker, Wilcox, Williams, Woodbury, Wright, and Young—17.

NAYS—Messrs. Archer, Barrow, Bates, Berrien, Clayton, Crittenden, Dayton, Evans, Graham, Henderson, Huntington, Kerr, Mangum, Miller, Morehead, Porter, Smith of Indiana, Sprague, Tallmadge, and Woodbridge—20.

Mr WALKER moved to lay the the bill upon the table; and, on this motion, called for the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

The question was then taken on his motion, and decided in the negative—yeas 16, nays 21, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Bagby, Benton, Buchanan, Fulton, King, McRoberts, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Tappan, Walker, Wilcox, Williams, Woodbury, Wright, and Young—16.

NAQS—Messrs. Archer, Barrow, Bates, Berrien, Clayton, Conrad, Crittenden, Dayton, Evans, Graham, Henderson, Huntington, Kerr, Mangum, Miller, Morehead, Porter, Smith of Indiana, Sprague, Tallmadge, and Woodbridge—21.

Mr. BENTON next moved to strike out 1,000, and insert 900; and on this he called for the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

The question was then taken on the amendment, and resulted in the negative—yeas 16, nays 18, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Bagby, Benton, Buchanan, Fulton, King, McRoberts, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Tappan, Walker, Wilcox, Williams, Woodbury, Wright, and Young—16.

NAYS—Messrs. Barrow, Bates, Berrien, Clayton, Conrad, Crittenden, Dayton, Evans, Graham, Huntington, Kerr, Mangum, Morehead, Porter, Smith of Indiana, Sprague, Tallmadge, and Woodbridge—18.

Mr. BERRIEN moved to strike out 1,000, and insert 950.

Mr. KING could see no reason why either 1,000 or 950 copies should be specified. It was perfectly clear that the object was to subscribe for that number of copies not wanted, merely to put that much money in the pockets of the contractors. He had been present at the conclusion of many sessions, but had never seen anything so exceptionable as this. The books were not wanted—certainly not to the extent of even 950. The Senator is very adroit, but he cannot escape. [Mr. BENTON: he can't escape.] He had been desirous of divesting the bill of itspartisan character, but the proposition was rejected. He believed the people would cry out shame, as a Senator from New Jersey, the other day, on another subject, applied to the Senators on this side.

Mr. SMITH of Connecticut observed, that had the people of this country not been exceedingly credulous, the Whig party would not have had the opportunity this day to draw from the treasury half a million of dollars, to be given to their political friends; but what he rose for was, to adjure the Senate to turn their attention to the private bills for the relief of destitute and deserving claimants.

Mr. BENTON had listened with pleasure to the appeal of the Senator from Alabama, upon gentlemen on the other side to give the data upon which they claimed 1,000 or 950.

In the Arabian Nights Entertainments there were 1,001 stories; but no reason was rendered for that particular number, neither could gentlemen give a reason. He professed to be a reasonable man, and he wanted the reason in this case. As the proposition now stood, there was not the semblance of a reason why the number should be 950. The British Parliament introduced a sliding scale of duties—perhaps the Senator from Georgia would consent to a sliding vote upon this question.

Mr. BERRIEN stated that his object was to counteract a purpose that was avowed for delay. The Senator from Missouri had given notice that he would begin with 150; and, that failing, would rise progressively 50 at a time; and, therefore, he (Mr. B.) proposed a motion to substitute 950. He proceeded to argue that it was the opposite side which was obstructing the public business.

Mr. ALLEN complimented the Senator from Georgia upon the fair, frank, and manly manner in which he had placed the issue of responsibility. The question then was, How came this bill up? It was by the vote of a majority in this body—out of its order on the calendar—and by a motion to lay aside all previous orders to give it a preference. The Senate was asked to swallow this bill with all its enormities. But it should be resisted by motion after motion till twelve o'clock at night on the 3d of March. And one motion he would make would be to lay it on the table, with a view of taking up the retrenchment bill; and then, if gentlemen voted down that motion, let both parties go before the country with those two bills in their hands. And all the real necessity of this bill was to give a party printer an enormous job. The Senator said a good deal about the rights of the majority. All this was every good; but the majority had no right to disfranchise the minority.

Mr. WALKER called the attention of the Senate to the calendar of 13th February, to show that this bill was not reported to the Senate on that day. He asked, when was it reported to the Senate?

The CHAIR answered, on the 16th of February.

Mr. WALKER, in continuation, said the number of the bill was 128; and he found only five other bills of later numbers. How, then, did it happen that this bill should be taken up in preference to any previous bills on the calendar? Was it for a public necessity, or a private necessity? Was the emergency that of the country, or that of an individual? It was one of a grossly partisan character.

This was a question on which he was ready to go before the country, and vindicate the stand the Democracy had made. If this bill had been reached in its regular order, there might have been some little pretext for maintaining its place. Would any Senator deny that there were many bills on the calendar of vastly more interest than this bill to provide for a partisan printer?

Mr. WOODBURY asked, when had this subject been introduced, and how?

The CHAIR said, by resolution, on the 15th of February.

Mr. WOODBURY then asked what public interest required that all other business should be sacrificed for this bill.

Mr. SMITH of Connecticut pointed to the impropriety of the course now pursued by the friends of this bill, as the strongest proof that it was they who should bear the responsibility of the obstruction which this discussion had occasioned. He moved to postpone the bill, with a view of taking up the pension bill for the relief of the widows of the soldiers of the Revolution.

The motion was negatived.

The question then recurred on Mr. BERRIEN's motion to substitute 950 for 1,000.

Mr. BAGBY characterized the course pursued by the majority on this bill as the most extraordinary that he had ever witnessed on this floor. In all measures, two questions were to be considered: first, whether a proposition was necessary; and, next, whether there were means to carry it out. Here was a case wholly destitute of those requisites.

This bill ought to be called a bill for the relief of certain partisan editors; and, in justification of that title, gentlemen had refused to insert an amendment that this work should be confided to a "suitable person."

Mr. SMITH of Connecticut moved to postpone the bill till Wednesday, in order to take up the bill for the relief of the widows of revolutionary soldiers.

Mr. MOREHEAD asked whether the National Intelligencer was not the organ of the administrations of Mr. Jefferson, Mr. Madison, and Mr. Monroe?

Mr. BAGBY said he believed that, as long as the editors could make money out of the administrations alluded to, they were; but, the moment they found they could make more by the opposite party, they went over to it, and have so continued ever since.

Mr. MOREHEAD said he understood they were the organs—and the confidential organs—of the administration during the war; and that they stood by Mr. Madison on the bank question.

Mr. BAGBY asked this question: If the Senate was prepared to confide the history of Jefferson, Madison, Monroe, and Washington, to persons who had shown themselves opposed to the principles of these great men? Would it be proper to confide the parliamentary and constitutional history of the country to the opponents of the principles of Jefferson, Madison, Monroe, and Washington? He would not go to a prejudiced jury, nor to a prejudiced author, for an impartial verdict or a history. He wanted the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth. He did not ask for a Democratic author to compile such a work, and God forbid he should ask for a Whig author.

Mr. WRIGHT rose to say a few words in reference to a collateral issue made by the Senator from Georgia. It was, as to who and what party should bear the responsibility of delaying the public business. Gentlemen had talked of the rights of the majority; and he had also a few words to say in favor of the rights of the minority. That minority has a constituency at home, whose interests it is their duty to take care of. Now, by the vigorous resistance made by the minority to-day, the constituency of all had been saved $900,000. That was not a bad day's work. It was worth contending for. It is pressed as the most important bill on the calendar. Was not the minority entitled to form its own opinion on that point? There are but five bills on the calendar later than this. The present bill is 128. Of the other five, two have been passed. A third is a private bill; and the last is a proposition to give lands to the States for the deaf, dumb, and blind. And now, because a bill, which is narrowed down to a profitable job to partisan printers, is opposed, the minority is to be chargeable with obstructing the public business, by resisting it! This was an issue upon which he was perfectly ready and willing to go before the country.

Mr. HENDERSON said, if he could have foreseen what the minority now considered their duty and their right, he should have had no part in bringing forward this bill. It has become simply a question whether the majority can pass a bill. Are they to yield up their judgment, and become as if they were the minority? Could he have foreseen this delay of the public business on the calendar, he would much sooner have foregone the bill; but, when it now assumes the position, whether the majority is to surrender up its rights, he could not entertain the idea of making any sacrifice.

Mr. BAGBY moved an adjournment; on which motion he called for the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

The Senate refused to adjourn—yeas 16, nays 18, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Bagby, Benton, Buchanan, Calhoun, Fulton, King, McRoberts, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Walker, Wilcox, Williams, Woodbury, Wright, and Young—16.

NAYS—Messrs. Barrow, Bates, Berrien, Dayton, Evans, Graham, Henderson, Huntington, Kerr, Mangum, Miller, Morehead, Porter, Simmons, Smith of Indiana, Tallmadge, and Woodbridge—18.

The pending question was to postpone this bill till Wednesday, for the purpose of taking up the bill for extending the five year pension law for the widows of the revolutionary soldiers.

Mr. BUCHANAN stated that, upon every principle of duty and feeling, he felt bound to vote for this postponement, that the bill for the relief of the widows of the revolutionary soldiers might be taken up.

The question was then taken on the motion to postpone till Wednesday, and decided in the negative—yeas 16, nays 17, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Bagby, Benton, Buchanan, Calhoun, Fulton, King, McRoberts, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Walker, Wilcox, Williams, Woodbury, Wright, and Young—16.

NAYS—Messrs. Barrow, Bates, Berrien, Crittenden, Dayton,

Evans, Graham, Henderson, Kerr, Mangum, Miller, Morehead, Porter, Simmons, Smith of Indiana, Tallmadge, and Woodbridge—17.

Mr. SEVIER said he had hitherto abstained from taking part in the debate; and it was not his purpose now to consume much time, but merely to mark, as it was his habit to do, everything which occurred in the nature of a party movement. About this time two years ago, the Senate was engaged, according to its usual practice, in electing a printer; and the minority on that occasion being the party which now forms the majority, did not think it unbecoming to contend until a very late hour, and then, finding that their opposition was likely to be unsuccessful, to leave the Senate without a quorum. And he could mention some other instances where an example had been set by gentlemen opposite, (then in a minority,) which, if followed now, would enable the minority to contend successfully. He perceived, however, that his friends opposite had changed their views, and were now of the belief that it was the duty of the minority not only to stand their ground, but to submit to the will of the majority without resistance.

Yes, you cut and ran, but we have not followed your illustrious example; and, besides, we might, by following your example in another instance, save ourselves the trouble of offering resistance now. A contract was made, and bonds entered into with a public printer; and yet you did not scruple to break that contract, and give the printing to another; and now, when, according to the course of human events, you find your power almost at an end—when you find yourselves on your death-bed—when you are about breathing your last—already enveloped in your shrouds—I will not say, as was said by the former distinguished Senator from Kentucky, in reference to his political opponents—that you are about to enter the cart with ropes about your necks—you are disposed to bequeath a sort of legacy to these same printers, for whose benefit you broke the contract with Blair & Rives; and I confess they richly deserve such a bequest at your hands, for they have managed your cause with ability; they have given you power and responsibility for a time; they have made you what you are; and you would be an ungrateful set of fellows if you refused to reward them. I am surprised that you gave up the $200,000, and agreed to make the donation only $60,000. I would have gone to the whole extent, and not abated a dollar. Now, notwithstanding the notable examples you have set us, we do not intend to run away; we will sit in our places until the hand of the clock points to the hour of twelve; and we shall be sufficiently rewarded for holding out a few hours longer, if we shall succeed in preventing this job by (which you would be the better enabled to carry on the war against us) from being effected.

Mr. CRITTENDEN entertained a sincere regard for the Senator who had just sat down, and, knowing it was contrary to his usual habit, he felt at a loss to know why he had indulged in that course of personal asperity, calculated to effect nothing but angry feelings. What argument was there in such taunts as, "you are on the last gasp"—"going to your death"—and the Senator could hardly forbear saying, "like criminals in carts with ropes about your necks."

Mr. SEVIER interposed to state that what he had said was, that he would not apply to the Whigs the epithets of Mr. Clay to the Democratic party when going out of power, that they were like criminals going to their deaths with ropes about their necks.

Mr. CRITTENDEN asked, was it magnanimous to make even this allusion to a great man, now in private life, who had once been the grace and ornament of this hall.

Mr. SEVIER disclaimed any unparliamentary use of that Senator's language.

Mr. CRITTENDEN did not really know upon what grounds gentlemen assumed the despotic taunts which they were so liberal in throwing out against the party now in power. He rather thought they would find their anticipations groundless.

As to the course pursued by his friends when in the minority, he would ask, Was it not better to quit the hall, than to try to defeat the will of the majority by mere brute force?

Since it had come to a mere question of physical endurance, and the gentlemen opposite had fully proved their capacity for defeating the rights of the majority, he would, to put an end to such a contest, move to go into executive session.

Mr. TALLMADGE hoped not: his motto was—"Never say die."

The yeas and nays were then called for and ordered on the motion to go into executive session; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 18, nays 15, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Bagby, Benton, Buchanan, Calhoun, Crittenden, Fulton, Graham, King, McRoberts, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Walker, Wilcox, Williams, Woodbury, Wright, and Young—18.

NAYS—Messrs. Barrow, Bates, Berrien, Dayton, Evans, Henderson, Huntington, Kerr, Mangum, Miller, Porter, Simmons, Smith of Indiana, Tallmadge, and Woodbridge—15.

So the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business; and, having spent a short time therein, at 10 o'clock, p. m., adjourned—having been 12 hours in session, without intermission.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, February 27, 1843.

Mr. A. MARSHALL presented the petition of Albert Reed, and seventy seven others, citizens of Lincolnville, Maine, praying for an increase of duties on lumber and fish.

Mr. LOWELL presented the petition of John Balch, jun., and forty-nine other citizens of Prescott, Maine, praying Congress for an additional duty on sawed lumber, spars, piles, wood, bark, &c., from the British Provinces; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. HASTINGS presented the memorial of 37 farmers of Carroll county, Ohio, asking Congress to equalize the tariff, and in just reference to their staples of wool and hides.

Also, the memorial of 18 farmers of Columbiana county, Ohio, on the same subject.

Mr. H. DODGE presented the petition of Samuel Lane, of Milwaukie county, Territory of Wisconsin, asking Congress to refund to him a certain amount of money overpaid by him in the purchase of a tract of land in the Milwaukie land district.

Also, a petition from the town of Racine, Racine county, Territory of Wisconsin, asking Congress that a tri-weekly mail may be established from Racine to East Troy, in the county of Walworth, by the way of the town of Rochester.

Mr. BOYD presented the memorial of Dr. John B. Hubbard, and 43 other citizens of Mills's Point, Kentucky, in favor of relieving A. Kendall from all liability on account of a judgment obtained by Stockton and Stokes against said Kendall, for certain acts of his as Postmaster General: referred to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. TILLINGHAST asked leave to present a resolution from the Committee on the Library, authorizing the purchase of so many sets of the laws of the United States, not exceeding eighty, as may be necessary to replace those which have been lost, provided that the same can be purchased at a cost not exceeding five dollars a volume.

Objected to, and not received.

Mr. BRIGGS called up his motion, made some days since, to print 2,500 extra copies of the report of the Committee on the Post Office Department, and called for the previous question on the motion.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON desired, before the House voted, to see the papers which it was proposed to print.

The SPEAKER said they were not in the House, having been sent to the printer, on the order to print the ordinary number of copies.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON asked if he was not entitled to have the papers read, about which he was called to vote.

The SPEAKER said they could not be read, because they had gone to the printers.

The previous question having been seconded, and the main question ordered,

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON moved to lay the whole subject on the table; which motion was decided in the negative—yeas 72, nays 85.

The motion to print was then agreed to.

Some conversation then ensued between Messrs. HOPKINS, A. V. BROWN, and the SPEAKER, on the vote by which the bill of Mr. J. CAMPBELL, to suspend the districting section of the apportionment bill, was lost a few days ago, and to which Mr. CAMPBELL called the attention of the House on Saturday. It was not understood to lead to any action of the House.

On motion of Mr. GENTRY, the following bill was taken up, read a third time, and passed:

An act to perfect the titles to lands south of the Arkansas river, held under New Madrid locations, and pre-emption rights, under the act of 1814.

Mr. WISE presented a communication from Lieutenant Hunter, of the United States navy, in relation to his submerged propellers; which was ordered to be printed.

On motion of Mr. TRUMBULL, a resolution was agreed to, authorizing the Clerk of the House to continue the employment of Simon Brown, a messenger in his department, during the recess; his services being necessary, there being many thousand volumes of books to be despatched to the members of the present Congress.

Mr. TOLAND submitted a resolution to authorize the Select Committee on the case of Mr. Jonathan Roberts, the recently removed collector of Philadelphia, to sit during the sessions of the House.

Mr. W. W. IRWIN objected.

Mr. TOLAND moved a suspension of the rules; but the motion was not agreed to, (83 voting in the affirmative, and 65 in the negative,) the majority being less than two-thirds.

The House having resolved to terminate the debate on the civil and diplomatic appropriation bill at 3 o'clock to-day—

Mr. FILLMORE moved that the House resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. YORKE wished to offer a resolution of inquiry.

Objection was made.

Mr. ADAMS also desired to offer a resolution.

Objection was made.

Mr. HOUSTON wished to make a report from a standing committee.

Objection was made.

The question was taken on going into committee, and decided in the affirmative—ayes 102, noes not counted.

Before the Speaker left the chair,

Mr. ADAMS rose, and asked leave, by general consent, to offer a resolution providing that, whenever a vacancy shall occur on the bench of the Supreme Court, the vacancy shall be supplied by the appointment of a citizen from one of the non-slaveholding States; and all succeeding vacancies that may happen shall be supplied in like manner, until four-fifths of the judges shall be citizens of the non-slaveholding States; and concluding with a resolution directing the Committee on the Judiciary to bring in a bill forthwith to carry the above provisions into effect.

Mr. BOYD and others objected to the reception of the resolution.

Mr. ADAMS asked for the yeas and nays on its adoption.

The SPEAKER said they could only be taken by general consent.

CIVIL AND DIPLOMATIC BILL.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. FESSENDEN in the chair,) and took up the bill making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30th, 1844.

The pending question was upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. C. BROWN] to the proposed amendment of the Select Committee, to the item for the "survey of the United States, including compensation of superintendent and assistants, one hundred thousand dollars;" which amendment provides that hereafter the superintendence of the coast survey shall be placed in the hands of the Navy Department, and conducted by navy officers; and that the appropriation shall be $40,000, instead of $100,000.

Mr. EVERETT gave his views at length upon the subject.

Mr. RANDOLPH defended his colleague [Mr. AYCRIGG] for the course he had pursued in relation to the coast survey. Living, as they did, on the Atlantic coast, and witnessing, annually, wrecks strewed on their shores, and poor weather-beaten mariners crawling to land, and begging their way through the country, with bare heads and exposed feet, they were extremely anxious that the coast survey should be hurried on, that mariners might have the guidance of charts, and, by their aid, be enabled to avoid those points on which their vessels, with their cargoes and their hopes, were wrecked together. He next examined the mode of operation of Mr. Hassler, the superintendent of the coast survey, and the progress he had made, to show the necessity of resorting to a change, both of persons to execute the work, and of the system by which it was to be accomplished.

Mr. UNDERWOOD expressed a desire to offer some remarks on an amendment he intended to submit hereafter, and which he would be prevented from offering by the arrival of the hour of three o'clock.

The CHAIR decided that it would not be in order.

Mr. WISE expressed the hope that the committee would come to a vote upon the amendments. He hoped that which had been offered by his colleague, [Mr. MALLORY,] and which, after the fullest conference, had received the approval of four out of five of the select committee on the coast survey, would be adopted.

Mr. RANDOLPH offered an amendment, which the Chair decided to be out of order.

Mr. C. JOHNSON said it struck him that these coast surveys ought to be dismissed entirely. Some gentlemen seemed to think Mr. Hassler was the only man in the country capable of carrying on the coast survey.

Mr. J. R. INGERSOLL wished to know who said so.

Mr. AYCRIGG remarked that many members had said so. He heard Mr. Hassler say so himself.

Mr. J. R. INGERSOLL said that what he and other gentlemen who had defended Mr. Hassler contended, was, that by his attainments and experience he was the most capable and proper person in the country to carry on the survey. They did not, however, contend that Mr. Hassler was the only man who was capable of conducting it.

Mr. MALLORY remarked that the work was now unfinished; and to take it altogether out of the hands of those who had conducted it thus far, would be doing an injury. He thought that the work should be taken out of their hands, but not suddenly and abruptly, without securing to the Government the benefit of their experience.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON contended that, as the Select Committee proposed to organize the board of officers of the coast survey, Mr. Hassler and his assistants would constitute a majority, and, therefore, have control over the whole work.

Mr. MALLORY said he would explain that also. It was known that he entertained no very great respect for Mr. Hassler; yet it was due to him, as late superintendent of the survey, that he should be placed in a situation where he could explain his conduct and illustrate his views.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON said it was not necessary to give him a majority on the board in order to do that.

Mr. MALLORY said he would not have a majority. Two of Mr. Hassler's assistants differed from him materially. Mr. H., then, did not have a majority, but it was a fair board.

Mr. C. JOHNSON said the board ought to be constituted of army and navy officers—the best qualified being selected—and not by men whose interest it would be to carry on the survey in the most expensive way.

Mr. C. BROWN remarked that his amendment would bring about the object which the gentleman desired.

Mr. CALHOUN next obtained the floor, and read from a report of the Committee on Naval Affairs, made some years since, to show that the survey could not be advantageously carried on by navy officers.

The question was then taken on the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. C. BROWN,] reducing the appropriation from $100,000 to $45,000, and the amendment was negatived.

Mr. RANDOLPH offered an amendment appropriating $10,000 to reduce the field notes already taken to paper, in lieu of the $100,000 for carrying on the survey in future.

Mr. MALLORY opposed the amendment, and contended that it would confer on the superintendent more power than he now possessed. It would not effect the reform which it was intended to bring about, and the $10,000 would do nobody any good but Mr. Hassler.

The amendment was rejected.

The question recurred upon the amendment of the select committee, offered by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. MALLORY,] and published in the proceedings of Saturday.

It was agreed to without a division.

The clause appropriating $13,381 69 for the support of the pententiary in the District of Columbia having been read—

Mr. BOARDMAN offered an amendment, reducing the appropriation to $5,000. He knew of nothing peculiar in that institution to render so large an appropriation for its support necessary. The penitentiary in his State, as well as the penitentiaries in several other States, paid their own expenses; and the institution here, by proper management, might be made to do the same thing. He thought the adoption of the amendment would compel those who had the power to do so, to reorganize the institution.

Mr. FILLMORE said that he had been informed that contracts had been made for the services of the convicts, which had not yet expired; and this was the reason why the expenses could not yet be reduced. Though he believed it right to punish men for crimes, yet he could not go so far as to shut them up and starve them, which would be the case at this penitentiary if the amendment were adopted. If anything could be done to reorganize the institution, he would readily agree to it. He did not pretend to know much about this institution; but he had reason to believe that it had been improperly managed.

Mr. BOARDMAN answered that there was money enough to last till next July, so that the prisoners could not starve before the meeting of the next Congress. He believed that the reduction of the appropriation would compel the inspectors to appoint proper officers who would reform the institution.

Mr. MALLORY said that one of the reasons for the great cost of the penitentiary was the shortness of the time for which so many of the prisoners were sentenced. Many of them were sentenced for only twelve months, and were released before they could learn a trade, so as to be profitable to the Government.

Mr. UNDERWOOD said that the reason why so much money was annually paid out to keep these prisoners from starving, was the improper management of the institution. Most of the hands were employed in making shoes; and, instead of the superintendent's purchasing materials, and having the work done on the account of the institution, and sold at a profit, the hands were hired out to a man named Hoover, who was making a very profitable speculation of it. He had been furnished with a comparative statement, showing the prices paid by the master workmen of this city to their journeymen, and the prices paid by Hoover to the penitentiary for similar work; from which it appeared that the penitentiary received from 200 to 300 per cent. less than the prices paid by master workmen to their journeymen in this city. Now it was by keeping these hands working for comparatively nothing, for favorites, that the Government sunk annually some $15,000 on this institution. He believed that the reduction of the appropriation would compel the inspectors to put their work up to the prices of other manufacturers here, and by this means effect the reform that was so much needed. He did not, however, believe that the appropriation should be reduced so low as $5,000. A reduction to $10,000 would, in his opinion, be low enough.

Mr. SMITH of Virginia said that, if the practices complained of existed, it was not the fault of the superintendent. He had only to execute the duties of his office according to law. He knew that that officer had complained of the system, and said that, if he had the right to purchase materials, and have the work done and sold on account of the penitentiary, he could double his money. One of the reasons of the great cost of the penitentiary was that referred to by his colleague. The convicts could not learn a trade, so as to be profitable to the institution, in so short a time as twelve months. The evil complained of could not be corrected by reducing the amount of the appropriation. It was only by a change of the existing system of disposing of the work of the convicts, that a reform could be effected; and, from some inquiries he had made, he had ascertained that this had lately been done.

The question was then put on the amendment; and it was agreed to.

CANAL ACROSS THE ISTHMUS OF DARIEN.

Mr. UNDERWOOD offered an amendment, appropriating $5,000 for the employment of an agent to inquire into the progress and character of the work now going on to connect the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans by a canal across the Isthmus of Darien, and to ascertain upon what terms the same may be used by the citizens of the United States.

Mr. FILLMORE raised the point of order, that the amendment could not be received, inasmuch as it contemplated an appropriation for an object not recognised by law.

This question was discussed by Messrs. ADAMS, UNDERWOOD, FILLMORE, CUSHING, and C. J. INGERSOLL; and,

The CHAIR having decided the amendment to be out of order,

Mr. CUSHING appealed; when

The committee, on taking the question, overruled the decision of the Chair.

After a few words from Mr. FILLMORE and Mr. CUSHING,

Mr. UNDERWOOD made some remarks on the importance of this undertaking to the commerce of this country, but particularly to the valley of the Mississippi.

Mr. C. J. INGERSOLL also advocated the securing to the commerce of this country the advantages that were to be derived from facilities of transit across the Isthmus.

Mr. CUSHING proposed so to amend the amendment, as to embrace a railroad as well as, or in lieu of, a canal, in the contemplated means of crossing the Isthmus.

Mr. KING advocated the appointment of an agent to convey the American mail across the Isthmus—the Governments of England and of France now having agents for that purpose.

Mr. UNDERWOOD agreed to modify his amendment by the introduction of the word "communication," instead of "canal" or "railroad," or any other descriptive term, so that the objects of all gentlemen might be embraced; and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. J. P. KENNEDY submitted an amendment, to appropriate $4,000 to repave the public store of the city of Baltimore; which, after a few words from Mr. MERIWETHER and Mr. KENNEDY, was adopted.

Mr. SHIELDS submitted an amendment appropriating $5,000 for the repairing of the circuit and district court room of the United States at (as was understood) Mobile, where the honorable gentleman said the courts were held in a portion of the custom-house, which was set apart for that purpose.

Mr. KING moved to insert $50,000 for a custom-house at Savannah: rejected.

Mr. TILLINGHAST moved to insert $500 for a survey of Block island, according to a resolution of the House: rejected.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON moved to strike out the appropriation of $100,000 for the custom-house at Boston; and called for tellers.

The question was taken, and resulted—ayes 54, noes 58: no quorum.

A second count by tellers was had, and resulted—ayes 76, noes 66.

So the motion to strike out was agreed to.

Mr. WINTHROP moved to insert $50,000 for paying the contractors, under contracts made by the Government of the United States, for completing the Boston custom-house.

Mr. KING moved to amend the amendment, by adding $25,000 for the custom-house at Savannah.

The CHAIR ruled this amendment out of order.

The amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WINTHROP] was rejected.

Mr. MALLORY moved to insert $50,000 for the Boston custom-house.

Mr. PROFFIT moved to amend the amendment, by adding "for paying contracts made without authority of law:" rejected—ayes 36, noes not counted.

The question was taken on the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. MALLORY,] and resulted—ayes 71, noes 47. No quorum.

On again taking the question, the amendment was adopted—ayes 86, noes 40.

Mr. HOLMES moved to strike out $5,000 as the sum appropriated towards the repair of the Charleston custom-house and post office, and insert in lieu thereof, "seven thousand and ten dollars:" rejected.

Mr. McKAY offered an amendment, making an appropriation for the rebuilding of the custom-house at Wilmington, N. C., which was burnt by the great fire of 1840.

Mr. FILLMORE said the amendment, being for the creation of a new work, was not in order; and the Chair so decided.

Mr. TILLINGHAST offered an amendment appropriating $450 to make a survey of Block Island.

Mr. MERIWETHER moved to add thereto $35,000 for a custom-house at Savannah.

The CHAIR ruled both of these amendments out of order.

Mr. FILLMORE moved that the appropriation for making out registers of vessels, lists of crews, &c., be reduced from $10,000 to $4,000: agreed to.

A motion was made by some member (who was not seen) to strike out the appropriation of $150 for lighting Pennsylvania avenue: rejected without a division.

CITY WATCH.

On motion of Mr. FILLMORE, an amendment was adopted appropriating $300 for contingencies, fuel, lights, &c., for the city watch.

BOOKS.

The clause appropriating $47,162, for payment for books ordered by the resolution of the House of the 8th August, being read—

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON objected to the appropriation, on the ground that it was for an object not recognised by law.

The CHAIR decided that it was in order.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON moved to strike it out; which motion was rejected.

Mr. C. J. INGERSOLL offered an amendment appropriating $5,000 for a commercial agent to Europe: rejected.

DOCUMENTARY HISTORY.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON moved to strike out the clause appropriating $27,650 for the Documentary History of the United States: rejected.

Mr. MERIWETHER then offered an amendment to the section, providing that the work shall not be extended beyond the third volume: rejected.

COAST OF AFRICA.

Mr. JOHN P. KENNEDY offered an amendment appropriating $5,000 for the payment of a commercial agent, to reside at Liberia, or on the coast of Africa: rejected.

On motion by Mr. FILLMORE, an amendment was adopted appropriating $4800 for an index to the documents connected with the offices of the First Comptroller and First Auditor of the Treasury.

Mr. FILLMORE offered an amendment appropriating $10,000 for the payment of the agents employed to negotiate the late loans; which amendment was agreed to.

Mr. OSBORNE offered an amendment appropriating $10,000 for rebuilding the beacon at Black Rock, Connecticut.

Mr. O. asked leave to explain the objects of his amendment; but was called to order by several, and not allowed to proceed.

Mr. OSBORNE next asked to have a communication from the Treasury Department on the subject read.

Objected to by several.

The CHAIR directed the Clerk to read the communication; and, the Clerk having read a part of it—

Mr. PAYNE interrupted him, and asked the Chair if that paper could be read, after its being objected to.

The CHAIR said that he did not hear the objections.

Mr. PAYNE said that objections were made by several gentlemen on his side of the House. [A voice on the extreme right: "And by several on this side, also."] Mr. P. wished to know if objections were listened to from one section of the Union, and not the other.

The CHAIR. Not by the present incumbent of the chair.

Mr. PAYNE. Well, sir, how does it happen that objections have been received in a case similar to the present, while the objections now made were not received?

The CHAIR said that he permitted the paper to be read, observing that it would be read if no objections were made; and that he did not hear any objections.

Mr. PAYNE. Well; it seems, sir, that you did not wish to hear them.

Mr. GILMER said that the fact of the Chair's not hearing the objections was no reason why the reading should be allowed to go on. As soon as he was informed that objections were made, it was his duty to arrest the reading.

The CHAIR decided differently, and directed the Clerk to proceed with the reading of the paper; which was accordingly done.

Mr. TURNEY wanted to know the difference between this amendment of the gentleman from Connecticut, and the one of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. McKAY.] Both were to rebuild works that were destroyed. The one offered by the gentleman from North Carolina was decided to be out of order, while the one of the gentleman from Connecticut was decided to be in order.

The CHAIR said that the gentleman from Tennessee was not in order.

Mr. KING said that the very paper just read showed that the amendment was out of order; for it proposed to build a new work.

The CHAIR said that the gentleman from Georgia was not in order.

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. PROFFIT offered an amendment to provide that the surveys of light-houses shall be under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury.

The amendment was negatived.

Mr. POWELL offered an amendment appropriating $5,000 for the completion of the Potomac bridge; which was agreed to.

Some other amendments were proposed and negatived.

Mr. J. R. INGERSOLL offered an amendment to appropriate $500 for a consul at Beyrout; which was agreed to.

Mr. BOTTS submitted an amendment, to be inserted immediately after the items under the head of "foreign intercourse," providing that no part of any appropriation thereby made should be applied to the payment of the salary or outfit of any minister, chargé des affaires, or other foreign representative, who may be appointed to any post now vacant, or in which a vacancy shall exist during the present session of Congress, unless the appointments to fill such vacancy shall be made by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

The amendment was agreed to—76 voting in the affirmative, and 67 in the negative.

Mr. BOARDMAN offered an amendment to the items making appropriations for the Post Office Department, providing that no special or travelling agent of the Post Office shall receive more than $1,000 per annum, in addition to $2 a day for his travelling expenses. The amendment was agreed to.

Some other unimportant amendments were then made.

Mr. TILLINGHAST, by instruction of the Library Committee, offered an amendment, appropriating $20,000 for publishing an account of the discoveries of the exploring expedition, under the supervision of the Joint Committee on the Library.

This amendment was agreed to—ayes 91, noes not counted.

Mr. L. W. ANDREWS moved that the committee rise, (half past 4 o'clock:) rejected—ayes 67, noes 69.

Mr. C J. INGERSOLL offered an amendment, authorizing a quarter's extra pay to the clerks, officers, pages, &c., of the House.

The CHAIR ruled the amendment out of order.

The several amendments offered to the bill by the Committee on Public Buildings (with one exception) were adopted.

The amendment of the Committee on Public Buildings appropriating $30,000 for the erection of a new building to accommodate the War and Navy Departments, was ruled out of order.

Mr. BOARDMAN offered an amendment, appropriating $200 to two fire companies, near the Capitol and the President's House: rejected.

Mr. BRONSON offered a proviso, limiting the expenses of the courts of the United States, (particulars could not be gathered:) agreed to.

Mr. GILMER moved to reduce the appropriation for the Commissioner and other officers of the General Land Office, and their clerks, from $98,500 to $95,000; the effect of which will be to cut off the salaries of the Recorder and Solicitor of the General Land Office: agreed to—ayes 91, noes not counted.

At five minutes to 5, Mr. WELLER moved that the committee rise, and report the bill. The motion was agreed to, and the committee rose.

Amidst a general struggle, Mr. AYCRIGG obtained the floor, and offered an amendment to the bill (understood to be in relation to the coast survey.) He also called the previous question.

Mr. HUNTER rose and asked leave to offer a resolution of inquiry.

Leave having been given,

Mr. HUNTER offered a resolution requesting the Secretary of the Treasury to cause an examination to be made into the justice of the claim of Robert C. Jennings, Jas. Roddy, and others; and make a report to the next session of Congress.

The resolution was agreed to.

The following message was received from the President of the U. States, in reply to a resolution of the House of the 22d instant, communicating a report from the Secretary of State on the subject of the claim set up by the British Government to visit American vessels, together with the correspondence between Lord Aberdeen and Mr. Everett on the subject:

WASHINGTON, February 27, 1843.

To the House of Representatives:

In compliance with the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 22d instant, requesting me to communicate to the House "whatever correspondence or communication may have been received from the British Government respecting the President's construction of the late British treaty concluded at Washington, as it concerns an alleged right to visit American vessels," I herewith transmit a report made to me by the Secretary of State.

I have also thought proper to communicate copies of Lord Aberdeen's letter of 20th December, 1841, to Mr. Everett; Mr. Everett's letter of the 23d December, in reply thereto; and extracts from several letters of Mr. Everett to the Secretary of State.

I cannot forego the expression of my regret at the apparent purport of a part of Lord Aberdeen's despatch to Mr. Fox. I had cherished the hope that all possibility of misunderstanding as to the true construction of the 8th article of the treaty lately concluded between Great Britain and the United States, was precluded by the plain and well-weighed language in which it is expressed. The desire of both Governments is to put an end, as speedily as possible, to the slave-trade; and that desire, I need scarcely add, is as strongly and as sincerely felt by the United States as it can be by Great Britain. Yet it must not be forgotten that the trade, though now universally reprobated, was, up to a late period, prosecuted by all who chose to engage in it; and there were unfortunately but very few Christian powers whose subjects were not permitted, and even encouraged, to share in the profits of what was regarded as a perfectly legitimate commerce. It originated at a period long before the United States had become independent; and was carried on within our borders, in opposition to the most earnest remonstrances and expostulations of some of the colonies in which it was most actively prosecuted. Those engaged in it were as little liable to inquiry or interruption as any others. Its character, thus fixed by common consent and general practice, could only be changed by the positive assent of each and every nation, expressed either in the form of municipal law or conventional arrangement. The United States led the way in efforts to suppress it. They claimed no right to dictate to others, but they resolved, without waiting for the co-operation of other powers, to prohibit it to their own citizens, and to visit its perpetration by them with condign punishment. I may safely affirm that it never occurred to this Government that any new maritime right accrued to it from the position it had thus assumed in regard to the slave-trade. If, before our laws for its suppression, the flag of every nation might traverse the ocean unquestioned by our cruisers, this freedom was not, in our opinion, in the least abridged by our municipal legislation.

Any other doctrine, it is plain, would subject to an arbitrary and ever-varying system of maritime police, adopted at will by the great naval power for the time being, the trade of the world in any places or in any articles which such power might see fit to prohibit to its own subjects or citizens. A principle of this kind could scarcely be acknowledged, without subjecting commerce to the risk of constant and harassing vexations.

The attempt to justify such a pretension from the right to visit and detain ships upon reasonable suspicion of piracy, would deservedly be exposed to universal condemnation; since it would be an attempt to convert an established rule of maritime law, incorporated as a principle into the international code by the consent of all nations, into a rule and principle adopted by a single nation, and enforced only by its assumed authority. To seize and detain a ship upon suspicion of piracy, with probable cause and in good faith, affords no just ground either for complaint on the part of the nation whose flag she bears, or claim of indemnity on the part of the owner. The universal law sanctions, and the common good requires, the existence of such a rule. The right, under such circumstances, not only to visit and detain, but to search a ship, is a perfect right, and involves neither responsibility nor indemnity. But, with this single exception, no nation has, in time of peace, any authority to detain the ships of another upon the high seas, on any pretext whatever, beyond the limits of the territorial jurisdiction. And such, I am happy to find, is substantially the doctrine of Great Britain herself, in her most recent official declarations, and even in those now communicated to the House. These declarations may well lead us to doubt whether the apparent difference between the two Governments is not rather one of definition than of principle. Not only is the right of search, properly so called, disclaimed by Great Britain; but even that of mere visit and inquiry is asserted with qualifications inconsistent with the idea of a perfect right.

In the despatch of Lord Aberdeen to Mr. Everett, of the 20th of December, 1841, as also in that just received by the British minister in this country, made to Mr. Fox, his lordship declares that if, in spite of all the precaution which shall be used to prevent such occurrences, an American ship, by reason of any visit or detention by a British cruiser, "should suffer loss and injury, it would be followed by prompt and ample remuneration;" and in order to make more manifest her intentions in this respect, Lord Aberdeen, in the despatch of the 20th of December, makes known to Mr. Everett the nature of the instructions given to the British cruisers. These are such as, if faithfully observed, would enable the British Government to approximate the standard of a fair indemnity. That Government has, in several cases, fulfilled her promises in this particular, by making adequate reparation for damage done to our commerce. It seems obvious to remark, that a right which is only to be exercised under such restrictions and precautions, and risk, in case of any assignable damage, to be followed by the consequences of a trespass, can scarcely be considered anything more than a privilege asked for, and either conceded or withheld on the usual principles of international comity.

The principles laid down in Lord Aberdeen's despatches, and the assurances of indemnity therein held out, although the utmost reliance was placed on the good faith of the British Government, were not regarded by the Executive as a sufficient security against the abuses which Lord Aberdeen admitted might arise in even the most cautious and moderate exercise of their new maritime police; and, therefore, in my message at the opening of the last session, I set forth the views entertained by the Executive on this subject, and substantially affirmed both our inclination and ability to enforce our own laws, protect our flag from abuse, and acquit ourselves of all our duties and obligations on the high seas. In view of these assertions, the treaty of Washington was negotiated; and upon consultation with the British negotiator as to the quantum of force necessary to be employed, in order to attain these objects, the result to which the most deliberate estimate led was embodied in the 8th article of the treaty.

Such were my views at the time of negotiating that treaty, and such, in my opinion, is its plain and fair interpretation. I regarded the 8th article as removing all possible pretext, on the ground of mere necessity, to visit and detain our ships upon the African coast, because of any alleged abuse of our flag by slave-traders of other nations. We had taken upon ourselves the burden of preventing any such abuse, by stipulating to furnish an armed force regarded by both the high contracting parties as sufficient to accomplish that object.

Denying, as we did and do, all color of right to exercise any such general police over the flags of independent nations, we did not demand of Great Britain any formal renunciation of her pretension; still less had we the idea of yielding anything ourselves in that respect. We chose to make a practical settlement of the question. This we owed to what we had already done upon this subject. The honor of the country called for it; the honor of its flag demanded that it should not be used by others, to cover an iniquitous traffic. This Government, I am very sure, has both the inclination and the ability to do this; and, if need be, it will not content itself with a fleet of eighty guns; but, sooner than any foreign Government shall exercise the province of executing its laws and fulfilling its obligations—the highest of which is to protect its flag alike from abuse or insult—it would, I doubt not, put in requisition for that purpose its whole naval power. The purpose of this Government is faithfully to fulfil the treaty on its part; and it will not permit itself to doubt that Great Britain will comply with it on hers. In this way, peace will best be preserved, and the most amicable relations maintained between the two countries.

JOHN TYLER.

The Clerk had read but a small portion of the message, when the reading was arrested; and,

On motion of Mr. BOTTS,

The House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, February 28, 1843.

The PRESIDENT pro tem. laid before the Senate a communication from the Treasury Department, transmitting statements of contracts, of payments made for miscellaneous claims, and of expenditures from the marine hospital fund; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. WHITE, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported back, without amendment, and with a recommendation that it do pass, the bill from the House entitled "An act to repeal so much of an act making an appropriation for the temporary support of certain destitute Kickapoo Indians, as relates to the payment of clerks charged with their business as trustees."

Mr. SEVIER, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, made an adverse report (which was ordered to be printed) on the petition of Samuel Bingham.

On motion of Mr. S., the same committee was discharged from the further consideration of the petition of Benjamin Crawford, praying indemnity for losses sustained in consequence of having his trading establishment broken up by officers of the United States.

Mr. EVANS, from the Committee on Finance, reported back, without amendment, the bill from the House authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to refund to David Watkinson & Co. a part of the duties imposed on a certain quantity of tin and iron imported by them into the port of New York.

Also, reported back, with an amendment (which was ordered to be printed) the bill from the House for the re-issue of treasury notes, and for other purposes.

Mr. E. also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill from the House to prohibit any extra allowances to officers of the Government, reported the same back, with the opinion of the committee that the passage of the bill was unnecessary, extra allowances being now prohibited.

Mr. CRITTENDEN presented a memorial from Lexington, Kentucky, setting forth, that, in consequence of obstructions in the navigation of the Western rivers, great loss of life and property was sustained, and asking Congress to make some provision for the removal of such obstructions. The petition was ordered to lie on the table.

The following engrossed bills were read the third time, and passed, viz:

The bill for the relief of Richard Patten.

The bill to revive the act entitled "An act to enable claimants to land within the limits of Missouri and the Territory of Arkansas to institute proceedings to try the validity of their claims," approved the 26th of May, 1824; and the act amending the same, and extending the provisions of said acts to claimants to land within the States of Louisiana and Mississippi.

The bill for the relief of Charles M. Keller.

The bill to repeal certain parts of the act entitled "An act respecting the organization of the army, and for other purposes," approved the 23d of August, 1842.

The bill for the relief of Joseph Bryan, Harrison Young, and Benjamin Young.

The bill declaring Robbinston, in the State of Maine, to be a port of delivery.

The bill to extend the Patent Office to Ninth street.

The bill to permit the entry of merchandise recovered from shipwrecks, in certain cases, free from duty.

The bill to apply certain alternate sections of the public domain towards the completion of works of internal improvement in the State of Michigan, and for other purposes, was ordered to be engrossed, after being amended in several particulars, on the suggestion of Mr. SMITH of Indiana. This bill was subsequently passed.

The bill to amend the laws relating to imprisonment for debt in the District of Columbia, was read the third time, and passed.

The bill for the relief of Duncan L. Clinch was considered as in committee of the whole; and, there being no amendment proposed, it was reported to the Senate, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading. This bill was subsequently passed.

The bill to settle the title to Pea Patch island, was taken up as in committee of the whole.

Mr. CLAYTON said the bill was imperfect in several particulars; and he moved an amendment, giving power to the commission created by it to compel the attendance of, and to administer oaths to, witnesses; and limiting the reception of evidence by the commission to such as was admissible by the rules of law, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MILLER was understood to inquire whether the parties had consented to the terms of the bill.

Mr. CLAYTON replied in the affirmative.

Mr. WOODBURY remarked, that he would move to strike out that portion of the bill making appropriation to satisfy the award, unless it would interfere with the arrangement between the parties. It would be in time to make the appropriation when the award was fixed.

Mr. CLAYTON replied, that that provision of the bill was a part of the arrangement; and, unless it was retained, it would defeat the compromise.

Mr. MILLER moved an amendment, the purport of which was not heard; which was opposed by Messrs. CLAYTON and BAYARD, and finally disagreed to.

Mr. WOODBURY said he could not vote for the bill to pay an award which was not to be ascertained by an officer of the Government, who was responsible to the Government. The award should also be ascertained before the appropriation was made.

Mr. KING did not perceive that there could be any objection to making the conditional appropriation in the bill. The bill, he believed, was well guarded.

There being no further amendment proposed, the bill was reported to the Senate, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading. It was subsequently read the third time, and passed.

On motion by Mr. SEVIER, the Committee on Pensions was discharged from the further consideration of the petition of Joshua Reynolds, an officer of the Revolution, praying the revival of the pension act of July, 1838.

On motion by Mr. BATES, the Committee on Pensions was discharged from the further consideration of the petition of the widow of Joshua Conkey, praying for a pension; and from the petition of Azel Spalding, for compensation for his services as pension agent.

Mr. HENDERSON, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, reported back, without amendment and with a recommendation that they do pass, the following bills from the House, viz:

The bill for the relief of Hugh Riddle, of the State of New York.

The bill to revive an act entitled "An act for the relief of John Darlin."

The bill for the relief of Mary McGee and Susan Pierce, heirs at law of George Neilson.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE, from the Committee on Commerce, to which memorials and resolutions of State Legislatures upon the subject had been referred, reported a bill for the protection of commerce and the construction of harbors on the lakes; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. BERRIEN, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back, without amendment, the bill from the House relating to the taking of testimony in cases of contested elections, and for other purposes.

Mr. KERR, from the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office, reported back, without amendment, and with a recommendation that it do pass, House bill for the relief of Samuel K. Jennings.

Mr. DAYTON, from the Committee on the Public Buildings and Grounds, reported back, without amendment, House bill for the relief of John Skirving.

Mr. TAPPAN, from the Committee on the Library, reported back, without amendment, and with a recommendation that it do not pass, the bill for the preservation of the collection of natural curiosities furnished by the exploring squadron, and from other sources.

Mr. ARCHER, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, reported back, without amendment, and with a recommendation that it do pass, the House bill to provide the means of future intercourse between the United States and the Government of China.

On motion by Mr. MERRICK, the Senate took up, as in committee of the whole, the bill for the reduction of the rates of postage.

Mr. MERRICK explained that this bill, as it now stood, was founded on the idea that the bill to suppress the transportation of mailable matter by private expresses, and the bill to make permanent contracts with railroad companies for transporting the mail, would become laws at this session. Though one of the bills—that for the suppression of private expresses—had passed the Senate; yet, he had no hope that either could be got through the other House this session. If those bills had become laws, a great reduction could have been made in the rates of postage. The department could have encountered the great reduction proposed in this bill, if such had been the case; but, failing to accomplish their passage, the head of the department could not give his consent to the reduction proposed by this bill.

Mr. M. then proposed to amend the bill so as to provide that for all distances under 5 miles, there shall be a charge of 5 cents postage on letters; for all distances over 30 miles, and not exceeding 100 miles, 10 cents postage; for all over 100, and not exceeding 220 miles, 15 cents; for all over 220, and not exceeding 400 miles, 20 cents; and for all distances exceeding 400 miles, 25 cents postage. This, he said, was in accordance with the recommendation of the Postmaster General.

Mr. SIMMONS suggested that considerably more revenue would be obtained by the department, if the rate of postage for carrying letters for thirty and forty miles was fixed at 10 cents, instead of 15 cents.

Mr. MERRICK said he could not, at this late day of the session, undertake to accept, or consent to the adoption, of any proposition in lieu of the responsible recommendations of the head of the department. It was too late in the session to undertake to prepare a system of measures different from that proposed in the amendment he had submitted. Considerable improvement would be effected by the passage of the bill, by conforming the rates of postage to the Federal coin. If the amendment suggested by the Senator was adopted, it would effect too great a reduction. He hoped it would not pass.

Mr. WRIGHT remarked that the bill, instead of proposing reduction in the rates of postage for distances now chargeable with 12½ cents postage, actually increased it from 12½ to 15 cents. He asked the chairman of the Post Office Committee whether he would have any objection to fixing the distance at 150 instead of 100 miles as chargeable with 10 cents postage.

Mr. MERRICK said it was impossible to do otherwise than as was proposed by his amendment. It was true there was an increase on the letters heretofore chargeable with 12½ cents postage—the postage on such letters was increased to 15 cents; but those now chargeable with 18¾ cents would be hereafter subject to 15 cents postage only. There was a diminution of the postage in the aggregate, though there was an increase in this particular.

Mr. WRIGHT, after a few remarks, moved to strike out 100, and insert 150; the effect of which would be, if adopted, to make all letters carried that distance chargeable with 10 cents postage only.

After a few remarks by Messrs. MERRICK, KING, and WRIGHT, the question was taken on the amendment proposed by the latter Senator, and disagreed to.

The question was then taken on the amendment proposed by the chairman of the Post Office Committee, [Mr. MERRICK,] and it was agreed to.

Mr. MERRICK moved another amendment, (which was agreed to,) striking out three, and inserting one cent for drop letters.

There being no further amendment proposed to the bill, it was reported to the Senate, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading. This bill was subsequently read the third time and passed.

On motion by Mr. EVANS, the Senate then proceeded to consider, as in committee of the whole, the bill making appropriations for the fulfilment of treaty stipulations with the Indian tribes, and for the support of the Indian department for the half calendar year of 1843, and the fiscal year ending June 30, 1844.

Mr. EVANS moved to amend the bill, by reducing the appropriation for the fulfilment of the treaties with various tribes, for the fiscal year, from $757,675 to $749,065; which sum, he said, was amply sufficient.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. EVANS moved another amendment, which was understood to authorize the transfer of moneys, heretofore appropriated, from one head of appropriation to another. Mr. E. explained that this was rendered necessary to enable the department to settle the accounts of the disbursing officers. Those officers stood charged on the books of the department as defaulters, because they had, in the prosecution of the war in Florida, been compelled to take money appropriated to one specific object, and apply it to another object. They were not, in fact, indebted to the Government one cent; but if they should die, they would stand charged on the books of the department as defaulters. This amendment was, therefore, intended merely to give authority to the Secretary to transfer money from one head of appropriation to another, to enable the accounts of the officers to be closed up and balanced on the books.

Mr. WOODBURY remarked, that the only objection he had to this course was, that it was countenancing the application, by the disbursing officers, of more money to any object than was intended by Congress to be applied to such object. It was, in effect, giving the power of appropriation to the disbursing officers.

The amendment was agreed to; and the bill was reported to the Senate.

Mr. TAPPAN inquired whether there was any appropriation in the bill to satisfy the treaty stipulations with the Wyandot Indians.

Mr. EVANS replied, that there was no such appropriation in the bill, nor had any application been made for such an appropriation. It appeared, by the treaty with those Indians, that it was agreed that they should be paid, for their improvements on the land purchased from them, such an amount, on a fair valuation, as those improvements were worth. It was estimated at the department that the amount to satisfy the value of this property would not exceed $20,000. Appraisers were appointed to ascertain the value of the improvements; and, on an examination of some papers from the department, it appeared that the persons appointed to make the appraisements had returned appraisals to the amount of $125,000, instead of $20,000, as contemplated. The Commissioner of Indian Affairs had expressed his surprise at the valuation affixed to some of the property. Under the circumstances, he (Mr. E.) did not think it would be proper, without further investigation of the matter, to make any appropriation for the purpose.

Mr. TAPPAN remarked, that the Government had stipulated to pay whatever, on appraisement, the property was ascertained to be worth. He presumed the appraisers were some particular friends of the present Administration. If improper persons had been appointed as appraisers, and the appraisement was exorbitant, it was no fault of the other party to the agreement; and, whatever the amount of the valuation was, they were entitled to it by the stipulations of the treaty. It was no reason for withholding the appropriation from the Indians, because those appointed to protect the rights of the Government had returned an exorbitant valuation. All that was left the Government to do now, was, to make the appropriation. He therefore moved to amend the bill, by inserting the sum of $125,937 24, the amount of the appraisement.

Mr. WHITE of Indiana made some remarks, showing the exorbitant character of the valuation attached to some of the huts and fruit-trees by the appraisers.

Mr. EVANS remarked, that the land acquired from those Indians, he believed, amounted to only about 20,000 acres; and he considered the amount of the valuation five times as great as it should have been.

Mr. ALLEN expressed himself in favor of the amendment.

Mr. TAPPAN demanded the yeas and nays on the amendment, which were ordered; and the question being put on agreeing to it, it was decided in the negative—yeas 12, nays 18.

The bill was then reported to the Senate; and the amendments of the committee being concurred in, it was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading. Subsequently, the bill was read the third time, and passed.

On motion by Mr. EVANS, the Senate took up, as in committee of the whole, the bill making appropriation for certain fortifications for the half calendar year of 1843, and for the fiscal year ending on the 30th June, 1844.

Mr. EVANS said no amendment had been proposed to this bill; that it did not appropriate the estimates of the department by one half.

Mr. SEVIER, after a few remarks in favor of an appropriation to repair and rebuild Fort Gibson, which he said had been estimated for, moved $25,000 for that purpose.

Mr. EVANS opposed this amendment; and

Mr. CRITTENDEN suggested that the appropriation was not called for, as the Secretary had stated that, in his opinion, the means of defence on that frontier were ample, and that there was not the least danger of any difficulty there.

Mr. SEVIER replied, showing the importance of the appropriations. The Legislature of his State, believing it of much importance, had instructed his colleague and himself to make an effort to procure an appropriation to strengthen the defences on the Arkansas frontier. He asked, if no danger was apprehended on that frontier, why was it that a whole regiment of troops had been placed there, without adequate barracks to protect them?

The question was then taken on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Arkansas, and rejected—ayes 15, noes 16.

Mr. SEVIER then proposed an amendment, appropriating $15,000 for repairing and rebuilding Fort Gibson.

The question was put on this amendment, and it was adopted.

The bill was then reported to the Senate. The amendments of the committee of the whole were concurred in, and the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading. It was subsequently read the third time, and passed.

The bill for the relief of James S. Calhoun was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BATES moved to postpone the previous orders, for the purpose of taking up the bill reviving the act of July, 1838, granting pensions to widows of revolutionary officers and soldiers.

The question was put on the motion, and it was disagreed to.

The bill of the Senate to limit the use and to correct the abuse of the franking privilege, was taken up as in committee of the whole.

Mr. MERRICK explained the provisions of the bill; when

Mr. MOREHEAD moved to lay the bill on the table.

Mr. MERRICK demanded the yeas and nays, which were ordered; and, being taken, were—yeas 25, nays 10.

So the bill was laid upon the table.

The bill relating to the application of the two per cent. fund of Mississippi having been returned from the House, with an amendment, was, on motion by Mr. WALKER, taken up; and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill for the relief of Mary W. Thompson, the widow of the late Lieut. Col. Thompson, of the army of the United States, was taken up as in committee of the whole; and, having been amended on the motion of Mr. EVANS, was reported to the Senate, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading. It was, subsequently, read the third time, and passed.

On motion by Mr. EVANS, the bill making appropriations for the naval pensions for the half calendar year ending 30th June, 1843, and the fiscal year ending on 30th June, 1844, was taken up as in committee of the whole.

Mr. WILLIAMS moved to strike from the bill the clause appropriating some $16,000 for the payment of pensions to the widows and orphans under the act of the 3d of March, 1837. Mr. W. said this law was repealed in August, 1841, and he could not conceive by what right the Commissioner of Pensions still admitted cases under it. Congress had repealed the law; and if its act was thus disregarded, the only thing that it could do to make its act of repeal effectual, would be to withhold any appropriation for such pensions.

Mr. EVANS explained that the Committee of Ways and Means in the other House had called upon the Commissioner of Pensions to assign reasons why this appropriation was called for under an act which had been repealed by Congress. He informed the committee, that though the act of 1837 had been repealed, still rights which had been acquired under it prior to its repeal, could not be affected by such repeal. The department had so construed the matter, as to allow pensions to the time of the repeal to such persons as were entitled under the act of 1837. He said it merely involved a question of construction of law; and it was with Congress to determine whether the construction given by the Commissioner was the correct one.

Mr. WILLIAMS made some further remarks in opposition to the appropriation, which were not distinctly heard.

The question was then put on the amendment, and carried in the affirmative—ayes 16, noes not counted.

The bill was then reported to the Senate, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading. The bill was subsequently read the third time, and passed.

The bill for the relief of Nancy Poleresky was taken up as in committee of the whole, and, after a few words by Messrs. EVANS, KING, BATES, and McDUFFIE, as to whether there was not a new principle involved in its provisions, and there being no proposition to amend the bill, it was reported to the Senate, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading. The bill was subsequently read the third time, and passed.

Senate bill 55, for the relief of James Taylor, was taken up as in committee of the whole, on an adverse report of the Committee on Claims, and indefinitely postponed.

The following bills were then taken up as in committee of the whole, considered, reported to the Senate, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and were subsequently read the third time, and passed:

The bill for the relief of Daniel G. Skinner, of Alabama;

The bill for the relief of John R. Williams.

DISTRICT BANKS.

The bill to extend the charters of the District banks came up next in order, as in committee of the whole.

Mr. ALLEN moved that it be indefinitely postponed, and on that motion demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. MILLER said it was a matter of considerable interest to the District that the charters of these banks should be renewed.

Mr. ALLEN said this bill for many years in succession had given rise to considerable discussion, and he hoped it would not now be allowed to interfere with the business of the Senate.

Mr. MILLER observed that the charters would expire in July, 1844, and it was essential that they should know whether they were to have an extension of them. They would not be able to accommodate the public, if left in a state of uncertainty; and if they were admitted by gentlemen to be of any utility to the public at all, he hoped the bill would be at once acted upon.

Mr. TAPPAN said there were some provisions in the bill which they had not time to examine.

Mr. ALLEN contended that there was no necessity for rechartering these banks. He believed there were no petitions on the subject, and he did not believe it was desired by the public; if so, the bill could be passed at the next session.

Mr. ARCHER observed, that if the charters were certain to be renewed at the next session, he thought there could be no objection to renew them now. It would be a very advantageous thing for the community that they should have timely notice.

The question of indefinite postponement was decided in the negative—yeas 17, nays 26.

The bill was then taken up as in committee of the whole; when

Mr. KING moved to lay the bill on the table for the present, in order to proceed with other business. Upon this question the yeas and nays were ordered, and resulted—yeas 18, nays 28.

Mr. ALLEN then moved to amend the bill by adding the following proviso:

Provided, That the stockholders of each of said banks shall, from and after the taking effect of this act, be liable in their individual character and private property for all the issues made and other obligations contracted by said banks, respectively, in the same manner, and to the same extent in all respects, as are partners of unchartered copartnerships and firms for the obligations contracted by such copartnerships and firms.

Mr. A. proceeded to observe that the question of chartering banks was not a new one, and public opinion was almost unanimous upon the principle of making bank stockholders liable, severally, for the debts and liabilities of their banks. There had been sufficient opportunity during the early part of this session to bring forward this bill; but it had not been done, and it appeared evident to him that it was not intended that there should be any investigation into the affairs of these banks.

It was, he said, perfectly in accordance with one of the principles of bank tactics, to apply for a recharter at a time so near the end of the session as to make it impossible to enter into any investigation or debate upon the subject; and he put it to Senators, whether they were ready to say to the people, You shall trust these bank directors, although they refuse to be responsible. They refuse to have charters, unless they have with their charters the privilege of indiscriminate and illimitable plunder. The question had been frequently before the people, and he had never seen an assemblage of the sovereign people—the only power in this country which was incorruptible and undefiled—he had never seen such an assemblage in which (whatever their opinions upon other matters) there were not at least a hundred to one in favor of the proposition of individual liability. He desired the yeas and nays upon his motion.

Mr. MILLER hoped that this question was not to be again agitated. There had been no complaint made in reference to them; and he believed no reasonable objection could be urged against granting them an extension of their charters. He denied that the bill had been purposely kept back.

Mr. ALLEN asked why this bill should be pressed upon them now, when another long session was to intervene before the expiration of their charters. The welfare of the banks—the advantage, the interests of the banks,—these were the considerations which were to urge them forward; while popular opinion, rolling into this Capitol from every quarter, like a cataract, condemnatory of the principle of irresponsible banks, was to be totally disregarded. But he was told there were petitions in favor of rechartering these banks. Yes, petitions which had never been allowed to be read; petitions, of what nature no one knew. He would not go into the question of the general utility of banking. It was a momentous question—a question fraught with serious consequences to this country. He desired that it should come up at a time when a thorough and full discussion might be had upon it; and he could not consent to pass an act of this description, at a time when the public mind was so deeply drawn to an investigation of the great question of banking, until a thorough investigation of that subject could be had. The American mind would not submit much longer to be trifled with. There was a power in the people which they did not delegate; and that power would yet be manifested. They were disposed to suffer while evils were sufferable; but they had likewise a stern and resolute will to redeem themselves from bondage and oppression in every form.

Mr. CONRAD desired to know whether, upon the question of making individual stockholders responsible, it was in order to discuss the question of popular rights?

Mr. ALLEN contended that he was only following the practice which prevailed in that body.

Mr. MILLER regretted that the gentleman from Ohio had diverted his censures from the banks, and directed them against him. He intended that it should be shown to the public by whose instrumentality it was that the bill had been delayed. The gentleman had accused him of having brooded over this bill for a very long time; and yet the gentleman himself declared he was not prepared to act on the subject, but required a long session in which to discuss it. The gentleman had denounced all banks; did the people think with him? he would ask. No; the people stood by their contracts, and fulfilled them; it was the gentleman alone who was desirous of destroying them.

Mr. ALLEN said the Senator had set out with the assumption that it was his intention to cast a censure upon him for the performance of his duty. In this he was mistaken; but he must be permitted to speak, with the severity it deserved, of an attempt to obtain, for a period of ten years, a charter for these banks, without even the privilege of asking for the reasons upon which such an application was founded. He trusted Senators would join with him in giving a wholesome rebuke to those who were desirous of fastening upon the people of this District these banks, with all their imperfections on their heads, by their opposition to the passage of this bill.

Mr. WRIGHT appealed to the Senate, in consideration of the period of the session and the condition of the business, to permit this bill to be laid aside for the present, that the more pressing business might be proceeded with.

Mr. MILLER refused to accede to any postponement.

Mr. SIMMONS urged that the question should be taken upon the bill, without further debate.

Mr. BENTON observed that it had been the invariable custom to bring forward bills of this nature at so late a period of the session as to render it impossible to consider them maturely.

Mr. BARROW said, the course pursued by Senators on the other side, in relation to this bill, as well as to that which had been under consideration yesterday, convinced him that it was the duty of Senators on this [the Whig] side to let them know, once for all, that the business of the Senate would be proceeded with in the regular mode; and the responsibility of arresting the action of the Senate, if they persisted in doing so, would rest where it properly belonged.

Mr. WALKER. What, sir, has it come to this: that when a bill for chartering half a dozen banks at a time—and not merely for a single year, but for ten years—is under consideration, no amendment is to be offered, and no discussion permitted? I know the actual power, and the claim to power, on the part of the banks, is great indeed; but I certainly never expected to hear that, upon asking a charter from the representatives of the States and the people, when fair and proper amendments were offered, all discussion was to be suppressed, and the vote to be taken in silence. And I will say to the Senator from Louisiana, and others upon that side, that, if they have not been enlightened by the experience of the last five years—by the light which has been shed upon the subject of banking since the special session of 1841—they certainly stand alone among the mass of the people of the country. Within the last two or three years, we have had an experience upon this subject equal to the experience of centuries. Like the light which has been travelling from the more distant of the fixed stars, ever since the creation of the world, we are beginning to receive light upon this important subject.

One single word as regards the amendment. What is it? To render the stockholders individually responsible for the money they issue. They ask the privilege of making money, not by coining, but by stamping a money value upon paper. They ask the privilege of exercising this attribute of sovereignty, by making money out of that which has no intrinsic value, and for the redemption of which they are not responsible. What is the responsibility of these banks? A pretended amount of stock. But who knows how much stock is there in reality?—how much has been abstracted by losses, by peculation, and bank frauds? There may not be a dollar there. I do hope that an amendment of this kind, the justice of which is so plain and palpable, will be adopted.

The question upon the amendment was then taken, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Buchanan, Calhoun, Cuthbert, Henderson, King, McDuffie, McRoberts, Sturgeon, Tappan, Walker, Wilcox, Woodbury, Wright, and Young—16.

NAYS—Messrs. Archer, Barrow, Bayard, Berrien, Choate, Clayton, Conrad, Crafts, Crittenden, Dayton, Evans, Graham, Huntington, Kerr, Mangum, Miller, Morehead, Porter, Rives, Simmons, Smith of Indiana, Sprague, Tallmadge, White, and Woodbridge—25.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BUCHANAN said he had an amendment to offer, and he desired the yeas and nays upon it. He thought the great evil of the banking system was, that, although all the States had determined that a suspension of specie payments should be a forfeiture of the charter, yet there was no efficient machinery provided by law to carry that forfeiture into effect. His object was to make it the duty of the law officer of the Government to proceed against such bank, without waiting for a formal complaint or information. He desired a vote upon this amendment by yeas and nays; for he believed the unanimity of the Senate, upon this point, would produce a great deal of good.

Mr. BUCHANAN'S amendment was read as follows:

That, if any of the said banks shall hereafter suspend specie payments, or refuse to pay on demand any of their notes, deposites, or other obligations, in specie, it shall be the duty of the district attorney for the District of Columbia, ex officio, to file a bill before the proper court, whose duty it shall be, upon legal proof of the fact, to decree the forfeiture of the charter of said defaulting bank, and place it in a state of liquidation, and wind up its affairs according to the rules and practice of a court of chancery; first paying out of the assets of each of the said banks, respectively, all the holders of their notes in preference to all other demands against them, and to apportion the remaining assets pro rata among all the other creditors.'

Upon this amendment the yeas and nays were taken, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Archer, Bagby, Barrow, Bayard, Benton, Berrien, Buchanan, Cheate, Clayton, Conrad, Crafts, Crittenden, Cuthbert, Dayton, Evans, Graham, Henderson, Huntington, Kerr, King, McDuffie, McRoberts, Mangum, Miller, Porter, Smith of Indiana, Sturgeon, Tappan, Walker, White, Williams, Woodbury, Wright, and Young—36.

NAY—Mr. Morehead—1.

Mr. BENTON then rose and said, as the bill had just been amended so as to prevent the banks from issuing their own suspended paper, yet, as that amendment did not prevent them from issuing the suspended paper of other banks, he would move an amendment which would embrace the latter.

Mr. BENTON'S amendment was read, as follows:

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That neither of the banks shall circulate or receive, pay out, or in any way use, any paper currency which is not equivalent to gold and silver coin; and all contracts and transactions founded on such suspended or depreciated notes or bills of suspended banks, and every violation of this section, shall be a violation of the charter of the bank, and a forfeiture thereof.

Mr. CRITTENDEN proposed a modification of the amendment, so as to make it read as follows:

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That neither of the banks shall circulate the notes or bills of suspended banks; and every violation of this section shall be a violation of the charter of the bank, and a forfeiture thereof.

Upon this question the yeas and nays were—

YEAS—Messrs. Archer, Barrow, Bates, Bayard, Conrad, Crafts, Crittenden, Dayton, Evans, Graham, Kerr, Mangum, Miller, Morehead, Porter, Simmons, Smith of Indiana, Sprague, Tallmadge, and Woodbridge—20.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Bagby, Benton, Buchanan, Cuthbert, McRoberts, Sturgeon, Tappan, Walker, Woodbury, and Wright—11.

The amendment as amended was concurred in; and upon the question of the engrossment of the bill, and ordering it for a third reading,

Mr. WRIGHT rose and called upon the chairman of the committee by whom the bill had been reported, to state how far the directors of these banks had complied with the provision of their former charters, which required that all loans to any president, cashier, or director, or any officer of the bank, to a greater amount than $10,000, should be regularly reduced at the rate of 25 per cent. annually.

Mr. MILLER replied that he knew nothing about it.

Mr. WRIGHT. Then all I have to say is, if we are called on to recharter these banks for a period of ten years, while the chairman of the committee who brought the bill before the Senate, and pressed its immediate passage, to the exclusion of all other business, and who has taken the whole session to investigate the matter, does not know whether a provision so important as this has been complied with, it is time for the Senate to hesitate; for I consider this one of the most material provisions for the purpose of reducing these institutions to a state of soundness.

Mr. BENTON then moved the following:

And be it further enacted, That the act for continuing the charters of said banks shall be null and void in every case in which any one of said banks shall not have complied with the terms, conditions, and provisions of the acts by which they have been heretofore continued.

Upon this amendment, the yeas and nays were taken, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Bagby, Benton, Cuthbert, King, Sturgeon, Tappan, Walker, Woodbury, Wright, and Young—11.

NAYS—Messrs. Archer, Barrow, Bates, Berrien, Crafts, Crittenden, Dayton, Evans, Graham, Huntington, Kerr, Mangum, Miller, Morehead, Porter, Simmons, Smith of Indiana, Sprague, Tallmadge, and Woodbridge—20.

So the amendment was rejected.

Upon the question of the engrossment of the bill, the yeas and nays were as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Archer, Barrow, Bates, Bayard, Berrien, Crafts, Crittenden, Dayton, Evans, Graham, Huntington, Kerr, Mangum, Miller, Morehead, Porter. Sevier, Simmons, Smith of Indiana, Sprague, Tallmadge, and Woodbridge—22.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Bagby, Benton, Cuthbert, McRoberts, Sturgeon, Tappan, Walker, Woodbury, Wright, and Young—11.

The bill was accordingly ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time.

The bill for the relief of James S. Calhoun, having been returned from the House with an amendment to the amendment of the Senate, was taken up for consideration—the question being on concurring with the amendment of the House.

Mr. KING inquired what was the effect of the amendment.

Mr. GRAHAM said the effect of the amendment of the House was to restore the bill to what it was when it came from the House.

Mr. KING was entirely opposed to it; and he moved that the Senate insist on its amendment, and ask for a committee of conference.

Messrs. WRIGHT and WOODBURY were opposed to having any appropriating clause in the bill. They maintained that there was great impropriety in trusting any officer to make an award for consequential damages, as was proposed by this amendment of the House. It was right that Congress should see the award first, before appropriating money for it.

Some further debate was had on the bill, between Messrs. BERRIEN, KING, WRIGHT, and GRAHAM, on the impropriety of making a specific appropriation in this bill, when the Committee on Claims were unanimously opposed to it.

The Senate finally disagreed to the amendment of the House, and insisted on its own amendment; and,

On motion by Mr. BERRIEN, a committee of conference of three, on the part of the Senate, was authorized to be appointed by the Chair, to take into consideration the disagreeing votes of the two Houses.

The bill to amend the insolvent acts of the District of Columbia, having been returned from the House with an amendment, exempting females from the operation of the imprisonment portion of the insolvent law, was taken up, and the amendment was concurred in by the Senate.

Several House bills were read twice, and appropriately referred.

Mr. TAPPAN made some remarks on the propriety of first disposing of Senate bills to which no objection would arise. His suggestion, however, was not yielded to.

On motion by Mr. BERRIEN, the Committee on the Judiciary was discharged from the further consideration of House bill directing the running of the northern line of the reserve of the half-breed Sac and Fox tribe of Indians, by the treaty of the 4th of August, 1824.

Mr. B. also made a report from the Committee on the Judiciary, touching the title of the First Municipality of New Orleans to a lot of land in that city: ordered to be printed.

Senate bill granting a pension to David Welch, and the bill for the relief of Robert P. Lewis, were taken up as in committee of the whole, considered, reported to the Senate, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

CUMBERLAND ROAD BILL.

The bill making appropriations to continue the Cumberland road was called, in its order on the calendar, at five o'clock in the evening.

Mr. SMITH of Indiana said he had not charge of the bill; but he was very anxious that the bill should be passed. This was the first time it had been called, and it was impossible to get it taken up out of its order. He exceedingly regretted that the period was so late. This was the last day at which bills of the Senate could be sent to the House; and it was suggested that the House had adjourned. He said that the rules might be suspended to-morrow, to send the bill to the House, if it could be passed. He assured Senators that the appropriations for the road would be pressed until the work was completed.

Several Senators suggested that, at this late period, it would be useless to proceed with the bill, as it would lead to debate, and defeat the whole calendar; and could not be acted upon in the House, if it were passed.

The bill, on motion, was then laid on the table.

House bill, making appropriations to carry into effect the Ashburton treaty, was read twice, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

On motion by Mr. BAYARD, the Senate then proceeded to the consideration of the special orders.

Senate bill, providing for the publication of the debates and proceedings of Congress, (about which there was so much discussion on yesterday,) being the first on the list of the special orders, was, on the motion of Mr. WOODBRIDGE, passed over informally. He presumed the Senate had no disposition to continue the discussion upon it. It might, therefore, be considered as having been consigned to the tomb of the Capulets.

The bill to refund to Massachusetts the balance due her for disbursements during the late war with Great Britain, came up, as in committee of the whole, on an adverse report of the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. CRITTENDEN moved to amend the bill, by reducing the amount of appropriation in it from $272,716 to $227,176 48.

Mr. C. then explained the propriety of the amendment; and trusted, after its adoption, no objection would be made to the bill. The bill merely allowed to Massachusetts, on the same principle that allowances had been made to other States for like services.

Mr. BENTON said no allowance had been made to other States on the principle involved in this bill.

Mr. TAPPAN made some remarks against the bill; in the course of which, he alluded to the refusal of Massachusetts, during the war, when our soil was invaded, to permit her militia to muster into the service of the United States. He maintained that (with the exception of the claims for compensating the heirs of the traitor Hull for the surrender of our soil and our army) there never was a more iniquitous claim before Congress. It was as absurd and wicked as the Hull claim.

Mr. CRITTENDEN made an appeal to gentlemen not to recur to them, but to permit the little aberrations from the straight line of duty of the old Bay State to be buried in oblivion. He admitted that she acted improperly; [but her course was attributable rather to the heat of party than to a want of patriotism. He maintained that other States had been paid upon the very principles of this bill, for the services of their militia; and instanced the State of Connecticut.

Mr. WRIGHT made some remarks against the bill. He recurred to the scenes which agitated the country at the time Massachusetts refused to permit her militia to be mustered into the service of the United States; after a review of which, he said he could not vote that State a dollar.

Mr. BATES defended his State from the aspersions which had been cast upon it. He contended that Massachusetts was entitled to the balance provided for in the bill, unless the law-makers intended to become the law-breakers. He contended that Connecticut and Rhode Island had been paid for disbursements made during the war, on the very principle which was involved in this bill; and, unless it was intended to make Massachusetts an exception, she should be allowed the balance due her forthwith.

Mr. ALLEN spoke at some length against the bill, urging that, if it was passed, it would be justifying and rewarding a revolt against the Union by a part of the Union—a revolt, too, in favor of a foreign enemy; for all who, in times of such peril, refused to fight for their country, took sides with the enemies of their country. Such was, in effect, the course of Massachusetts during the war. He hoped the bill would not pass.

Mr. WOODBURY appealed to the Senators on the opposite side not to press this bill, to the exclusion of so many important bills on the calendar. If they persisted in such course, he had an amendment to propose to it, to pay the claims of New Hampshire.

Some conversational debate took place here, between Messrs. EVANS, WOODBURY, CRITTENDEN, and BATES, as to the claims of New Hampshire, and as to the understanding, in the early part of the night, that, if this bill gave rise to debate, it would be laid over. The matter was terminated, however, by the bill being reported to the Senate. The amendment of the committee of the whole was concurred in, and the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

On motion by Mr. ARCHER, the Senate, at half past 8 o'clock, proceeded to the consideration of executive business; and, after some time spent therein, adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, February 28, 1843.

Mr. H. DODGE presented a petition from the inhabitants of the town of Rochester and vicinity, Racine county, Territory of Wisconsin, asking Congress to establish a tri-weekly mail from the town of Racine, passing Rochester, to the town of East Troy, in Walworth county.

Also, presented the petition of the inhabitants of East Troy, Walworth county, Territory of Wisconsin, asking Congress to establish a tri-weekly mail from the town of Racine, by the town of Rochester, to the town of East Troy, to intersect the Milwaukie and Janesville route.

Mr. PAYNE presented the petition of sundry citizens of Alabama, asking the establishment of a mail route from Linden, Alabama, to Almuche, in Marion county Mississippi: referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD of Maine offered the following resolution; which was adopted:

Resolved, That, during the remainder of the present session, the House will meet at 10 o'clock, a. m.

The following bills from the Senate were severally read twice, and referred:

The bill regulating the currency of foreign gold and silver coins in the United States.

The bill to continue in force the act for the final adjustment of private land claims in Missouri, approved 9th July, 1832; and the act supplemental thereto, approved 2d March, 1833.

The bill fixing the value of certain foreign money in accounts and computation at the custom-houses.

The bill to revive the act entitled "An act to enable claimants to land within the limits of Missouri, and the Territory of Arkansas, to institute proceedings to try the validity of their claims," approved 26th May, 1824; and an act amending the same, and extending the provisions of said act to claimants to land within the States of Louisiana and Mississippi: referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

The bill to apply certain alternate sections of the public domain towards the completion of works of internal improvement in the State of Michigan, and for other purposes: referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

The bill amending the laws regulating imprisonment for debt in the District of Columbia: referred to the District Committee.

The bill to extend the Patent Office to 9th street: referred to the Committee on the Public Buildings.

The bill for the relief of Joseph Bryan, H. Young, and Benjamin Young: referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The bill for the relief of Richard Patten: referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The bill to repeal certain parts of an act entitled "An act respecting the organization of the army, and for other purposes," passed 23d August, 1842: referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The bill declaring Robbinston, in the State of Maine, to be a port of delivery: referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The bill to permit the entry of merchandise recovered from shipwreck, in certain cases, free of duty: referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

The bill for the relief of Charles M. Keller: referred to the Committee on Patents.

The bill from the Senate entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to establish the northern boundary line of the State of Ohio, and to provide for the admission of the State of Michigan into the Union, upon the conditions therein expressed,' approved June 15th, 1836"—

Having been read a second time, Mr. HOWARD moved that it be referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. DODGE of Wisconsin resisted the motion. He moved that the reference be to the Committee on Territories. Mr. D. stated that, although the title of the bill did not imply, and the House might not know, it was, nevertheless, a bill relating to the disputed boundary between the Territory of Wisconsin and the State of Michigan; and, as such, there was no propriety in its going to the Committee on the Public Lands. It should most unquestionably go either to the Committee on the Judiciary, or that of Territories. He (Mr. D.) preferred the latter.

The question was then taken on Mr. HOWARD's motion, and it was rejected.

It then recurred on the motion of Mr. DODGE, and the bill was referred to the Committee on the Territories.

The House bill for the relief of James S. Calhoun, returned from the Senate with an amendment, was read, and, together with the Senate's amendment, referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. BARTON, from the Committee of Claims, reported a resolution directing the Secretary of War to report to the House, at the next session of Congress, certain information in regard to the services of such of the Florida militia as have not been paid for the same: adopted.

Mr. BURKE presented certain resolutions of the Legislature of New Hampshire; which were laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. COWEN, from the Committee of Claims, presented a resolution referring the claim of Joseph Nock to the Secretary of the Treasury, to consider and report thereon.

COMMERCIAL AGENT IN AFRICA.

Mr. JOHN P. KENNEDY, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom had been referred, at the last session, the memorial of the general convention of the friends of African colonization, made a report, accompanied by a joint resolution, providing for the appointment of a commercial agent to reside on the coast of Africa.

The resolution having been read and referred,

Mr. KENNEDY moved the printing of the report, and the engraving of the accompanying map.

Mr. ADAMS wished to inquire of the chairman of the Committee on Commerce whether the committee had been informed that any question had been made or settled by the Government whether these colonies, so called, were colonies of the United States.

Mr. JOHN P. KENNEDY replied that the proposition submitted in this report presented an inquiry into this question—what were the relations of these colonies to the Government of the United States? The committee had expressed no opinion on the subject, but proposed to refer it to the Secretary of State, to report to the House what the relations of these colonies were, and what they ought to be, to the United States.

Mr. ADAMS expressed a wish to have an extra number of copies of the report printed; and he was happy to hear that the question was to be discussed in the Congress of the United States.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON objected to the printing of the map, on the ground of the abuses that had heretofore existed in this description of work; but, on being assured by Mr. KENNEDY that the cost would not be over one hundred dollars, withdrew his objection, with the understanding that the motion should be so modified as to direct the engraving, provided it could be done for that sum.

Mr. KENNEDY having accordingly modified his motion,

Mr. BUTLER of South Carolina moved to lay it on the table; which motion was rejected.

The question on printing was then taken and carried.

Mr. KENNEDY then gave notice of his intention to move the printing of three thousand extra copies.

Mr. RAYNER, from the Committee on Commerce, reported a bill for the relief of Ferguson & Read; which was twice read, and referred.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Connecticut, from the same committee, reported a bill to establish a port of delivery at the city of Lafayette, Louisiana; which was read three times, and passed.

ARMY BILL.

Mr. ALLEN, from the Committee of Conference, appointed on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the army bill, reported that the joint committee had agreed to recommend to the House to recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate, and that said amendments be adopted.

GUN CARRIAGES.

Mr. B. RANDALL submitted a resolution, that the Secretary of the Navy report to the House, at the next session, a statement showing the improvement in gun-carriages made by Lieutenant J. G. Van Brunt: adopted.

MARINE HOSPITALS.

Mr. SHERLOCK J. ANDREWS, from the Committee on Commerce, reported a bill making an appropriation for the construction of marine hospitals on the Western waters: read twice, and referred.

LAW AGENT IN FLORIDA.

Mr. CHAPMAN, from the Committee on Public Lands, reported a bill providing for the appointment of a law agent in Florida: which was read twice, and referred.

On motion by Mr. BRONSON,

The Committee of the Whole was discharged from the further consideration of the bill from the Senate, in relation to the two per cent. fund of the State of Mississippi; and the same having been taken up in the House, was ordered to be engrossed, and then read the third time and passed.

Mr. JACOB THOMPSON, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom had been referred the bill from the Senate in relation to donations of lands to certain persons in Arkansas, and the Senate bill for the relief of John Hutchins, reported them severally without amendment.

Mr. HOWARD, from the same committee, to which had been referred the bill from the Senate supplementary to the act entitled "An act to settle titles to lands in Arkansas," reported the same without amendment.

Mr. MORROW, from the Committee on Public Lands, moved to discharge the Committee of the Whole from the further consideration of the bill to provide for the sale of certain lands in the States of Ohio and Michigan, ceded by the Wyandot Indians; and the same being taken up in the House, was ordered to be engrossed, and then read the third time and passed.

Mr. BRIGGS, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, reported a joint resolution to authorize the Postmaster General to settle and allow certain accounts of J. and P. Voorhees.

It was read three times, and passed.

Mr. BARNARD, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the petition of the western judicial district of Virginia, and the petition of the members of the bar in said district, praying an increase of salary of their district judge, reported that the committee had agreed to recommend an increase of $200, and instructed him to move the same as an amendment to the bill now pending before the House, to regulate and fix the salaries of district judges, when said bill should be before the House for its action.

He also moved that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of various papers; which was agreed to.

Mr. SAUNDERS, from the same committee, reported Senate bill for the relief of certain inhabitants of Florida, with a substitute for the entire bill.

On the motion of Mr. ADAMS, the bill was laid on the table.

Mr. C. J. INGERSOLL, from the same committee, reported, without amendment, a Senate bill, the title of which was not heard.

Mr. M. BROWN, from the same committee, reported a bill to change the times of holding the circuit and district courts for the district of East Tennessee; which was read three times, and passed.

Mr. CROSS, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, reported a bill for the relief of the legal representatives of John Baker, deceased; which was read twice, and committed.

Mr. DEBERRY, from the Committee on Agriculture, made several unfavorable reports; amongst others, one on the memorial of M. R. Bartlett.

Mr. MOORE, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, reported a Senate bill; and, on his motion, the committee was discharged from the further consideration of various papers.

Mr. J. R. INGERSOLL, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported Senate bill for the relief of the West Feliciana Railroad Company; which, on his motion, was laid on the table.

On motion of Mr. M. BROWN, the Committee on the Judiciary was discharged from the further consideration of the memorial of the Legislature of the Territory of Iowa, for an increase of the jurisdiction of justices of the peace in actions of debt, to a sum not exceeding $100.

Mr. PENDLETON, from the Military Committee, asked the House to take up the bill to divide the United States into two military districts.

Mr. J. COOPER objected to its being taken up out of order.

Mr. C. H. WILLIAMS hoped the House would discharge the Committee of the Whole from that bill; it involved no principle, being simply an act of justice; and he promised, if the House would take it up, that he would move the previous question.

Some conversation ensued, and ultimately Mr. C. H. WILLIAMS moved a suspension of the rules; but, on a division taken by tellers, the vote was 88 in the affirmative, and 47 in the negative—the motion was therefore lost; the majority being less than two-thirds.

Mr. BURNELL, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported a bill for the relief of Lewis C. Sartori; which was read twice, and committed to the Committee of the Whole. He also moved that the same committee be discharged from the case of Purser Wm. Speiden; which was agreed to.

Mr. ADAMS, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, by direction of the committee, asked to be discharged from the further consideration of certain resolutions of the Legislature of Alabama, in favor of the annexation of Texas to this Union.

He also, as an individual member of the committee, desired to offer a resolution on that subject.

Mr. WISE objected to the reception of the resolution, and it was not received.

Mr. TALIAFERRO, from the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions, reported a bill for the relief of Mary Ann Linton; which was read twice, and committed.

He also obtained the discharge of the committee from a large mass of papers.

Mr. McKENNAN, from the Committee on Roads and Canals, reported a bill to authorize the Secretary of War to direct experiments to be made to test the practicability and utility of J. W. Kirk's Mississippi boat-fender, and making an appropriation of $1,000 for that purpose.

It was read twice, and Mr. McKENNAN moved that it be put upon its passage, instead of being committed.

Mr. W. SMITH objected.

Mr. McKENNAN moved a suspension of the rules.

Mr. SMITH of Virginia strenuously objected to the motion, and said, if the course pursued by many gentlemen was persisted in, we should have expenditures for experiments of every humbug that could be thought of.

Mr. ADAMS moved to lay the motion to suspend the rules on the table, and asked for the yeas and nays; which were ordered, on a count by tellers.

Mr. McKENNAN then said he did not desire to consume the time of the House, and would, therefore, withdraw his motion to suspend the rules, and move that the matter be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SLEENROD, from the Committee on Roads and Canals, reported a bill for the completion of the Cumberland road east of the State of Ohio; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. BOARDMAN, from the Committee on Public Buildings, reported a bill to provide for the erection of two buildings for the accommodation of the War and Navy Departments: read twice, and referred to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. YORKE offered a resolution, which was adopted, calling upon the Secretary of the Navy to report to Congress the number of persons who were attached to the Florida squadron, according to the plan of Lieut. McLaughlin, from 9th October, 1841, to 9th October, 1842.

THE ARMY BILL.

Mr. ALLEN moved that the report of the Conference Committee on the army bill be taken up, and passed upon.

The motion was agreed to, and the report of the committee read.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON inquired what was the effect of the conference.

Mr. ALLEN replied that the House committee had receded from the disagreement of the House to the Senate amendment, adding ten cadets to be taken at large.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON hoped that the House would not agree with the committee in their recommendation to recede. He was for bringing down this academy.

Mr. ALLEN explained the reasons which had induced the Committee of Conference to agree to add ten cadets to be taken at large. They viewed it as a matter of common justice to those army and navy officers whose sons would be excluded by the fact that they did not happen to reside permanently in any one congressional district.

Mr. STANLY hoped that the report would be agreed to, and the power given to the President to appoint the ten additional cadets.

Mr. ADAMS urged, as a reason for adopting the report of the conference committee, that, in case of its rejection, the whole army bill might be lost.

Mr. EVERETT advocated, and Mr. CALHOUN opposed, the report of the conference committee.

Mr. FILLMORE moved the previous question; which was sustained; and the conference report agreed to by the House—ayes 88, noes 52.

Mr. L. W. ANDREWS, from the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions, made an adverse report.

Mr. TILLINGHAST, from the Committee on the Library, reported a resolution authorizing the Clerk of the House to purchase for the Library of Congress so many sets of the Laws of the United States as might be necessary to complete the sets now in the Library.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON said that this resolution involved a large and useless appropriation, and therefore he moved that it be referred to the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER decided that it would not be necessary for the resolution to go to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON moved that the resolution be laid on the table.

This motion was agreed to—ayes 77, noes not counted.

IMPRISONMENT FOR DEBT.

Mr. UNDERWOOD, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, reported, without amendment, the bill from the Senate amending the laws regulating imprisonment for debt in the District of Columbia.

The bill was taken up and read.

Mr. HOLMES offered an amendment, providing that no female shall be imprisoned on mesne or final process.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON suggested to the gentleman from South Carolina that this amendment involved the necessity of sending the bill back to the Senate, and it might be thus lost. He thought the gentleman had better reserve his amendment for the House bill to abolish imprisonment for debt.

Mr. HOPKINS had no idea that the bill named by the gentleman from Tennessee could be reached at this period of the session. He thought the gentleman from South Carolina had better persist in his amendment, and on it he would move the previous question.

The amendment was then, under the operation of the previous question, agreed to.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON suggested to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. UNDERWOOD] to call up his bill to abolish imprisonment for debt in the District of Columbia.

Mr. UNDERWOOD accordingly moved to take up that bill.

Mr. FILLMORE appealed to the gentleman to let the general appropriation bill, on which the previous question had been moved, be passed, and sent to the Senate.

Mr. UNDERWOOD renewed his motion to take up the bill to abolish imprisonment for debt in the District of Columbia; but

Mr. FILLMORE insisting on giving the preference to the general appropriation bill, that bill, being the first business in order, was taken up; and the previous question being seconded, and the main question ordered,

The first question was stated by the Chair to be the amendment made by the gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. AYCRIGG.]

[The amendment, in substance, provides that the further prosecution of the coast survey shall be discontinued; and that $10,000 be appropriated to enable Mr. Hassler and his assistants to reduce to paper the notes now on hand, which were taken in the field during the last summer; and that a report should be made to Congress at the next session, containing a plan for carrying on the work in future.]

Mr. WISE objected that the amendment was not in order; but,

The SPEAKER overruling the objection,

Mr. AYCRIGG called for the yeas and nays, which were ordered; and, on taking the question, resulted in yeas 75, nays 107; thus rejecting the amendment.

The Clerk then read all the amendments which had been made in Committee of the Whole; which were concurred in, with some exceptions, which were reserved for the action of the House.

The first amendment to which exception was made, was the item appropriating $3,000 for a commissioner to the Sandwich Islands.

Mr. RAYNER made the objection, and called for the yeas and nays thereon; but they were not ordered. He then called for tellers, and they were ordered, and Messrs. READ and JAMES were appointed. The amendment was concurred in—86 voting in the affirmative, and 38 in the negative.

The next amendment to which objection was made, was that making an appropriation for an agent to make inquiries respecting the communication between the Atlantic and the Pacific oceans by the Isthmus of Darien.

Mr. FILLMORE called for tellers, and Messrs. LINN and MEDILL were appointed, and reported 25 in the affirmative, and 100 in the negative; so the amendment was not concurred in.

The next amendment to which objection had been made, was the proviso introduced by Mr. BOTTS, to prevent the payment of any sum appropriated by items under the head of "foreign intercourse," for salaries or outfits of any minister, chargé des affaires, or other foreign representatives, appointed to any post now vacant, or that may become vacant during the present session of Congress, unless such appointment shall be made by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

Mr. W. SMITH called for tellers.

Mr. McCLELLAN of New York called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

The amendment was rejected—yeas 60, nays 101, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Landaff W. Andrews, Arnold, Babcock, Birdseye, Blair, Boardman, Bronson, Milton Brown, William B. Campbell, Thomas J. Campbell, Caruthers, Casey, Chittenden, James Cooper, Cowen, Cranston, Cravens, Crawford, G. Davis, John Edwards, Fessenden, Fillmore, Gamble, P. G. Goode, Graham, Howard, Hudson, J. R. Ingersoll, James, John P. Kennedy, King, Linn, McKennan, Samson Mason, Mattocks, Maxwell, Maynard, Meriwether, Mitchell, Moore, Morgan, Osborne, Owsley, Pearce, Pendleton, Powell, Rayner, Ridgway, Slade, Stanly, Stratton, John T. Stuart, Summers, Toland, Underwood, Van Rensselaer, Wallace, Washington, Joseph L. Williams, and John Young—60.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Allen, Sherlock J. Andrews, Arrington, Barton, Beeson, Bidlack, Borden, Bowne, Brewster, Aaron V. Brown, C. Brown, Burke, Burnell, Wm. Butler, Patrick C. Caldwell, Calhoun, Cary, Chapman, Coles, Mark A. Cooper, Cross, Cushing, Daniel, Richard D. Davis, Dean, Deberry, Doig, John C. Edwards, Ferris, John G. Floyd, Chas. A. Floyd, Fornance, Gates, Gerry, Giddings, Gilmer, William O. Goode, Gordon, Granger, Gwin, Hall, Harris, Henry, Holmes, Hopkins, Houck, Houston, Hubard, Hunter, Charles J. Ingersoll, William W. Irwin, Cave Johnson, John W. Jones, Isaac D. Jones, Littlefield, Lowell, Abraham McClellan, Robert McClellan, McKay, McKeon, Mallory, Marchand, Alfred Marshall, John Thomson Mason, Medill, Morrow, Newhard, Parmenter, Pickens, Plumer, Pope, Proffit, Read, Reading, Rencher, Reynolds, Riggs, Rodney, Wm. Russell, James M. Russell, Saltonstall, Sanford, Saunders, Sewell, Shaw, Shepperd, Shields, Wm. Smith, Snyder, Steenrod, Stokely, Sumter, Jacob Thompson, Tomlinson, Trotti, Turney, Van Buren, Ward, Westbrook, Winthrop, Wise, and Wood—101.

The several amendments adopted in Committee of the Whole on the recommendation of the Committee on Public Buildings, were then adopted.

All of the amendments having been passed upon, the bill was ordered to its engrossment.

It was then read a third time, and passed.

Mr. C. H. WILLIAMS called up his motion to discharge the Committee of the Whole from the further consideration of the bill to divide the United States into two military districts. It was put, and agreed to, (as the reporter understood, amid the general noise in the hall.

Several gentlemen gave notice of their intention to submit motions to take up particular bills in Committee of the Whole.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a number of executive communications, viz:

A message from the President of the United States, transmitting certain correspondence between the Department of State and the Spanish minister to this Government: referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

A communication from the Navy Department, transmitting statistics in relation to the expenditures of that department for stationery and job printing: laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

A communication from the Treasury Department, stating the number and compensation of officers of the customs: laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

A communication from the Treasury Department, in answer to the resolution of the 6th of August, calling for a statement of the accounts of navy officers: laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

A communication from the Treasury Department, in answer to the call for information in relation to the pay, &c., of the commissioners of the loan: laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

A communication from the Treasury Department, transmitting, in accordance with acts of Congress, a list and statement of unsettled accounts in that department: laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

AMOS KENDALL.

The SPEAKER asked leave to submit the resolutions of the State of Maine, in favor of a release of Amos Kendall, late Postmaster General of the United States, from the judgment given against him by the court of the District of Columbia.

The resolutions were laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

PRE-EMPTION RIGHTS.

Mr. CHAPMAN asked the favor of the House to take up and pass the bill "explanatory of an act granting pre-emption rights to certain settlers on the public lands."

The bill was read through; and having been ordered to its engrossment, was read a third time, and passed.

On motion by Mr. CUSHING, the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, (Mr. SUMMERS of Virginia in the chair.)

Mr. CUSHING then moved to take up the bill to carry into effect the treaty of Washington.

Mr. BRIGGS moved to take up the Post Office bill.

Mr. KENNEDY of Maryland moved to take up the warehousing bill.

Mr. WINTHROP moved to take up the light-house bill.

The question was first taken on Mr. CUSHING's motion, and it was carried.

TREATY OF WASHINGTON.

So the committee agreed to take up the bill providing for carrying into effect the treaty of Washington; and, the bill having been read,

Mr. McKEON said he was aware that this was about the last chance that the House had to send bills to the Senate, and that the time of the House ought not to be unnecessarily taken up. His intention, therefore, was to express to the committee, in the most concise manner, his objections to the treaty, and his reasons for voting against carrying it into effect.

His first objection to the treaty made during the last summer, was, that while it was contemplated throughout the whole country that it should be the settlement of all the important questions of dispute between the two countries, yet that treaty left open and unsettled the most important of them. If gentlemen would refer to the State papers laid on the table yesterday, and which had not yet met the public eye, they would find that Mr. Everett was informed by the British minister that Lord Ashburton would go to the United States prepared to settle all the questions of dispute between us and Great Britain. He would not enumerate all the unsettled questions, but it was well known that several yet remained open. Unfortunately, that treaty left open an important question, which one of its articles (the 8th) was supposed to settle; and it would be remembered that this (one of the most serious objections to that treaty) had become realized by the construction the British Government has put on it. He referred to the claim of the right of visitation set up by Great Britain, and which had always been opposed in the United States.

If gentlemen would refer to the last despatch of the President of the United States, they would find that this question remains as it did years ago; and from the want of information to Congress on the subject, one would suppose that no correspondence in relation to it had taken place. It seemed that this 8th article of the treaty had been inserted without a particle of explanation; and this became the more remarkable, as this question had, since 1815, been seriously agitated, not only in the United States, but in Europe. The British archives were crowded with documents from the different powers of Europe, endeavoring to effect arrangements with Great Britain on the subject. The House might be surprised at his now raising objections to this treaty, considering that it had become the law of the land. But on this he started no new doctrine; he only made the same objections as were made by the republicans of that day to Jay's treaty. Like that celebrated treaty, this one had been condemned by the voice of the whole country. And here he must be permitted to express the hope that this treaty would not be called the treaty of Washington. He hoped the name of Washington, who had so emphatically warned his countrymen against entangling alliances with foreign powers, would not be associated with this treaty; but that

CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

PUBLISHED BY BLAIR AND RIVES, AT ONE DOLLAR PER SESSION, IN ADVANCE.

27TH CONG.....3D SESS. WEDNESDAY, MARCH 8, 1843. VOLUME 12 .. NO. 24.

it should be either called the Ashburton treaty, or called after the American negotiator, who had proved himself, on this occasion, as well as during the last war, a British advocate.

Since the last war, the British Government had been assiduously endeavoring to extend their naval power, and to acquire the right to superintend the police of the seas. The first pretext they seized on to extend this power, was that of the suppression of the slave-trade. Here Mr. M. adverted to the negotiations of the British Government at the congress of Vienna—the quintuple treaty—and the treaty with France on the subject; and read various passages from the correspondence between the French and British Governments, as well as the correspondence of our Secretaries of State, (Mr. Van Buren and Mr. Forsyth,) commenting on them as he proceeded.

He further quoted the language of Sir Robert Peel, in the British Parliament, to show the extent of British assumption on this subject; and next, the opinion of Lord Stowell on the law of nations, as applicable thereto. He likewise quoted from the writings of Governor Cass, while minister of the United States to France, to show the American view of the question; and concluded with some remarks strongly in opposition to the insulting claim set up by Great Britain, and in exposure of her tyrannical proceedings in China, Affghanistan, and other portions of the world; while she was avowedly the champion of humanity, and when undertaking to be the high sheriff of the seas, and to visit and search American ships.

Mr. CUSHING rose to present, very briefly, his views of the controversy which had sprung up between the Governments of Great Britain and the United States, respecting the construction of the 8th article of the treaty of Washington; and he thanked Heaven that, as a member of the Congress of the United States, he could rise to sustain and defend the construction of that treaty as given by the Chief Magistrate of this Union, in opposition to that of the Prime Minister of an adversary foreign nation, and in maintenance of the honor and interests of the United States. He then proceeded to divest the question of extraneous interpretations, and applied to it the law of nations, as laid down by Lord Stowell; and went on to assert that this assumed right of search was first asserted in a despatch of the Duke of Wellington, addressed to the Prince Talleyrand.

On the despatch of Lord Aberdeen, in October, 1841; on his despatch of the 20th December, 1841; on his recent despatch, laid before the House on yesterday; and on the speech of Sir Robert Peel, which he took to be a prepared exposition of the views of the British Government—he assumed that all pretext for any right of search was removed, with the exception of what was conceded by the treaty. He would remark, (and called the attention of the committee to the fact,) that the negotiations and the legislation of England with regard to the right of search went hand in hand. There were two remarkable facts, to which he would call the attention of the country, in the progress of the parallel system of negotiation and legislation pursued by England. The first was the act of Parliament in 1839, giving to British cruisers unlimited authority to detain and search all vessels suspected in any manner of being engaged in the slave-trade. Alongside of this act of Parliament he placed the quintuple treaty, a copy of which he had made, and should embody in his speech when it should be written out at length. Both the act of Parliament and the quintuple treaty contained the same provisions, totidem verbis.

Now, he would call the attention of the country to the fact, that, let Sir Robert Peel contend for any construction he pleased of the treaty of Washington, a step was thereby made on the part of the United States, in advance of all other powers, on the subject of the reciprocal right of search. The United States, instead of agreeing to a reciprocal right of search, had substituted for it concerted cruising. He contended that the point which was gained by the United States in the treaty of Washington had had the effect of rolling back English negotiations in Europe. Had not the treaty of Washington been adopted—had the United States conceded the idea of a reciprocal right of search, the practical effect would have been, that the reciprocal right of search would have become interpolated in the law of nations. The United States prevented that consummation. What, he asked, remained? In the message of the President, one view of the treaty was assumed, and in the speech of Sir Robert Peel another. Sir Robert Peel conceded all that was asked in regard to the belligerent right of search, and also as regards the conventional or reciprocal right of search; but said there was a right to visit, distinct from the right of search, which he declared would be assumed and exercised.

Now, the question he proposed to inquire into was this: Was there such a thing as the right to visit, distinct from the right of search? In all the books on international law—books written generally upon the continent of Europe—the right was always expressed in these terms, "droit de visite." This was the only expression on the subject. Now, there was a right of visiting ships, exercised under the sanatory laws of our country; also, a right to visit, exercised under our revenue laws. But these were municipal rights of visit—not the right to visit upon the unappropriated parts of the ocean, covering a large space of the globe.

Sir R. Peel assumed that a cruiser had the right to visit vessels on the high seas, to see if the flag it puts out is the right flag. Now, suppose, according to this doctrine, a British cruiser should meet a vessel bearing the flag of the United States. The commander goes on board and challenges the flag. The master exhibits the ship's register and other papers, showing the nationality of his vessel. If the flag may be assumed to be not authentic, why may not the papers? May not the authenticity of the papers be called in question with as much propriety as the authenticity of the flag? If the boarding officer may go behind the flag, why not also behind the papers, to the ship's crew and cargo? Where, then, he asked, was the distinction between the right to visit and the belligerent right of search? He could find none. Either the assumed right of visitation was a nullity, or it was the right of search under another name. He, therefore, denied the construction put upon the treaty by Sir R. Peel, and affirmed that of the President of the United States.

On comparing the letters of Lord Aberdeen and the message of the President, what would be found? Did Lord Aberdeen claim the right of visitation in either of those letters? Lord Aberdeen disavowed the right to visit an American vessel. What, then, did he claim the right to do? This, it must be remembered, was a question of universal maritime right. Once admit the right to visit our vessels, and it would subject us to burdens ten-fold greater than the reciprocal right of search. The right to visit and inquire, would be made to cover every object for the attainment of which the American flag could be unfurled. Lord Aberdeen claimed the right of a British cruiser, when he saw a vessel which he had reason to believe was a British vessel, and which he would, therefore, have the right to seize, to enter upon and detain it. But how? Not as an American vessel. He could not touch her as an American. He would enter her as a Portuguese, a French, a Spanish, a pirate, or some other vessel, which he would be authorized to seize. If it proves to be an American vessel which he has entered, then he has committed an aggression, and owes reparation for it. Was this a right of search, or of visitation? No; it was a responsibility—a perilous responsibility.

These were views on which he was prepared to live or die, in peace or in war. He would concede to no Government the right to visit or search our ships; and if an admiralty order should be issued in England for that purpose, it would be an aggression, and he should be for coming to an understanding on the subject.

He was of the opinion that we had cause to regret that we had entered into any sentimental legislation. The only delicate point in this matter was, a question in the law of nations which might arise upon the piracy act of Congress. It was a false step, he considered, on our part, to enact the piracy law with regard to the slave-trade; and here, whilst he forbore, on account of the delicacy of the subject, from further alluding to it, he must do justice to the ability of his colleague, [Mr. ADAMS,] whose good advice, had it been followed, would have enabled us to avoid the difficulties under which we now labored.

After a few further remarks, he concluded by moving that the committee rise, with a view to the adoption of a resolution to take the bill out of committee.

The motion was agreed to; and the committee rose.

Mr. YORKE then offered a resolution, that all debate in Committee of the Whole on the above bill should cease in half an hour, and that the committee should then proceed to vote on the amendments pending, and such amendments as might be offered; after which, to report the bill to the House. Mr. Y. having called for the previous question on the above resolution,

Mr. ANDREWS of Kentucky moved to lay it on the table: rejected—ayes 35, noes not counted.

Under the operation of the previous question, the resolution was then adopted.

The House then again went into Committee of the Whole, (Mr. SUMMERS in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the same bill.

Mr. ADAMS got the floor, and observed that he merely rose to say that, in the short time allowed for debate on this question, he would forego the few remarks he intended to make on the subject, and would yield to other gentlemen who desired to participate in the discussion.

Mr. EVERETT next obtained the floor, and said that he did not intend to take up the whole half hour allotted to the discussion of this bill. He had but few remarks to make before offering an amendment, which he proposed to submit to the House, and should condense them as much as possible. He first wished to say that he thought the treaty an extremely good one, for the very simple reason—that it settled difficulties, in themselves of no minor consequence. Secondly, to say that he should vote for the appropriation to pay Maine and Massachusetts the sums awarded them, but with the hope that his native State of Massachusetts would not receive a dollar of it. He hoped she would not take it—not because it was not within the treaty-making power, but because if these two States were willing to rest under the imputation of having sold their country, he could hereafter make no manner of complaint of the "thirty pieces of silver." He was not one of those who believed that the country belonged to Maine; and, therefore, he refrained from voting on the resolution of the House affirming that proposition, and that the rights of Maine to the country would be maintained at all hazards. He believed, under all the circumstances, that we got a pretty good bargain in making this treaty. He came now to the right of visitation, about which so much had been said; and this, he took it, was not a British, but an American question. When presented as a British question, every man in the House rose in opposition to it; but when presented as an American question—as the claim of the United States against the whole world—he hoped it would meet with a more favorable reception. With this brief preface, he begged leave to offer his amendment, exhibiting his views of all that could be said on the subject. Mr. E. then submitted the following:

And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the commander of each of said vessels of said naval force to visit all vessels found on the coast of Africa, or within one hundred leagues thereof, which he shall have reason to suspect to be American, and to be engaged in the slave-trade, for the sole purpose of ascertaining whether such vessel be American; and if found not to be American, such commander shall give to the captain of the vessel so visited a certificate stating the name of his vessel, the name and rank of the commander, the date of the visit, and the time of detention of the vessel visited—a memorandum of which visit, with the reason therefor shall be placed on his log-book; and report the same to the Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. E. continued, that this bill proposed to send a fleet of 80 guns to the coast of Africa, for the purpose of suppressing the slave-trade. Now, he contended that the duties required of the commander of this squadron, by the amendment he had just offered, was absolutely necessary to enable them to render the least beneficial service. For what purpose were these vessels to be sent there? Not to interfere with the vessels of other nations, but with American vessels. You have, said Mr. E., by your laws, declared the slave-trade piracy; and your vessels, therefore, are to act against pirates, and to ascertain whether the vessels they find on that coast are pirates or not. Your object is to suppress this class of piracy; and how can you do it, unless you have the right of visit? If you deny that right, you must take the ground that the flag protects the ship: and if you find Turkish colors on a ship that has the name of the "Sarah Ann, of New York," on her stern, you have no right to visit her. But take the other ground; and if the commander of one of your vessels finds the name of the Sarah Ann, of New York—or of Baltimore, if you please—on a pirate, no flag will protect her.

Everybody knew that at this day the flag was no evidence of the character of the vessel. Vessels engaged in the slave-trade would know very well where the American cruisers and British cruisers were; and when they came in sight of the former, would hoist some other flag, and hoist the American flag when they came in sight of the latter. It would be perfectly idle and a waste of money to send our squadron to the coast of Africa, unless they were directed to visit all vessels under the American flag, and assert the right of visit as an American right. It was said that the right of search was found in the law of nations as a belligerent right; and that, not being in a state of war, this right did not exist. What were the laws of nations? Had they derived their force from the contentions of nations, or had they derived it from the general consent of nations in amity? But, granting it to be a belligerent right only: the United States had declared war against piracy, and could exercise this right while they were carrying on that war. How did vessels of war act in cases of piracy? Had they not the right to board vessels suspected to be piratical? and was not the United States at war with those who were pirates? But again: Was the House aware of the fact, that this right had been uniformly exercised by our ships of war? Our squadrons on the coast of Africa, engaged in suppressing the slave-trade, had always exercised this right; and so had our cruisers in the West Indies while searching for pirates. He would maintain the right to visit these vessels at all hazards, otherwise our own seas would be covered with pirates. If we refused this right, what would be thought of us in Europe? All Europe was engaged in the suppression of the slave-trade; and could we say to the British that they should not board our vessels for the purpose of ascertaining, not whether they were American, but whether they were British? All distinction was lost in the assertion that there was any analogy between the right of visitation and the right of search. The right of visit was not only essential to the protection and preservation of a lawful commerce, as well as the suppression of the slave-trade, but we could not stand before the world without conceding it.

Mr. ALLEN rose to reply to some observations made by the gentleman from Vermont, which he deemed a reflection on the States of Massachusetts and Maine; and, after speaking a few minutes, the Chairman announced that the time limited for the debate on this bill had expired.

Mr. CUSHING then moved to fill up the blank in the bill with the sum of $217,728.

Mr. BRIGGS moved a modification, so as to specify the proportion of that sum to be paid to each of the States of Massachusetts and Maine.

Mr. CUSHING accepted the modification.

Mr. MERIWETHER moved to strike out the section providing for the maintenance of the squadron on the African coast.

The motion was negatived.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON moved to strike out the section appropriating $300,000 to Maine and Massachusetts.

The motion was lost.

Mr. EVERETT's amendment being in order—

Mr. A. V. BROWN asked for tellers, and Messrs. TILLINGHAST and ROOSEVELT were appointed. The amendment was negatived: 22 voting in the affirmative, and 105 in the negative.

The committee then rose and reported the bill to the House; and the amendment of the committee was concurred in. The bill was then ordered to be engrossed; and, on the question of its passage,

Mr. L. W. ANDREWS called for the yeas and nays; which being ordered, resulted—yeas 137, nays 40, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Allen, Sherlock J. Andrews, Arnold, Arrington, Aycrigg, Baker, Barnard, Bidlack, Birdseye, Blair, Boardman, Borden, Botts, Bowne, Briggs, Bronson, William Butler, William O. The bill was therefore passed.

Mr. ALLEN of Maine moved a reconsideration of the vote by which the bill was passed, and the previous question on the motion.

The previous question was sustained, and the reconsideration put, and lost.

Mr. L. W. ANDREWS moved the House adjourn.

Mr. BRIGGS inquired whether this was not the last day bills could be sent to the Senate.

The SPEAKER replied that it was, unless the House should suspend its rules.

Mr. McKENNAN asked for the yeas and nays on the motion to adjourn; but they were not ordered.

Tellers (Messrs. BRIGGS and WELLER) were ordered on the motion, who reported—ayes 95, noes not counted.

So the House, at a quarter past 5 o'clock, adjourned.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, March 1, 1843.

Mr. YOUNG, from the Committee on Roads and Canals, reported back to the Senate the bill No. 47, heretofore referred to that committee, granting an additional quantity of land to the State of Illinois, to aid in the completion of the Illinois and Michigan Canal, with a recommendation by the committee in favor of its passage.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That, in addition to the lands heretofore granted to the State of Illinois, for the purpose of assisting in the construction of the Illinois and Michigan Canal, there is hereby granted to the said State the further quantity of four hundred and seventy-eight thousand five hundred and seventy-eight acres, to aid in the completion of the said work. The said lands to be selected by an agent or agents to be appointed by the Governor of the said State, in sections, half sections, quarter sections, and half quarter sections, from any of the unreserved lands belonging to the United States within the limits of the said State: Provided, That such selection shall be made under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States, and shall not extend to any lands to which the right of pre-emption may attach under the existing laws of Congress.

Mr. BATES, from the Committee on Pensions, made reports (which were ordered to be printed) adverse to the passage of the following House bills, viz.:

The bill for the relief of John Everly;

The bill for the relief of Elizabeth Dawkins; and

The bill for the relief of John P. Schuyler.

Mr. SMITH of Indiana, from the Committee on Public Lands, reported back, without amendment, and with a recommendation that it do pass, the bill from the House providing for the sale of certain lands in the States of Ohio and Michigan, ceded by the Wyandot tribe of Indians, and for other purposes.

Mr. S., from the same committee, to which was referred the bill from the House entitled "An act explanatory of an act supplemental to an act entitled 'An act granting pre-emption rights to settlers on the public lands,' approved June 22, 1838," reported the same back without amendment. Mr. S., said there were other bills on the file containing precisely the same matter. The committee, therefore, had not thought it necessary to recommend the passage of this bill. He hoped the other bills alluded to would be taken up and passed.

The resolution which was submitted on yesterday by Mr. WALKER, calling upon the Secretary of the Treasury to communicate to the Senate, at the next session of Congress, the whole operations of the landed system, was taken up and agreed to.

Mr. SEVIER, from the Committee on Pensions, reported back, without amendment, and with a recommendation that it do pass, the bill from the House for the relief of Ruth Mathiot.

Mr. WOODBURY, from the Committee on Claims, reported back, without amendment, the bill from the House for the relief of the legal representatives of Robert A. Kelly.

On motion by Mr. BUCHANAN, the Senate proceeded to consider the House bills on the calendar; when House bill entitled "An act for the relief of Lloyd J. Bryan," was taken up, as in committee of the whole, on an adverse report of the Committee on Naval Affairs; and it was indefinitely postponed.

The following House bills were then considered as in committee of the whole, and finally passed, viz:

An act for the relief of Robert Ramsay.

An act to amend an act entitled "An act to establish the northern boundary line of the State of Ohio, and to provide for the admission of the State of Michigan into the Union upon the conditions therein expressed."

An act for the relief of John Javins.

An act for the relief of John Hicks.

House bill entitled "An act for the relief of the legal representatives of Major General Baron De Kalb, deceased," was taken up, as in committee of the whole.

Mr. BENTON made some remarks against its passage.

Mr. PHELPS stated that the bill had been rejected by the Senate at the last session; but it was again passed by the House this session, and was referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims. That committee did not know what other course to take, than to report the bill back to the Senate, and submit it to its decision. He (Mr. P.) was individually opposed to the claim. He moved that it be indefinitely postponed.

The question was put on this motion, and it was carried in the affirmative.

House bill entitled "An act for the relief of the heirs, or the assignees of the heirs, of Isaac Todd and James McGill," was taken up as in committee of the whole, on an amendment from the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. TAPPAN moved that the bill be laid on the table; but withdrew the motion at the suggestion of Mr. SMITH of Indiana, who made some remarks on the principle involved in it. He maintained that it would be to the interest of all parties to pass the bill as proposed to be amended.

Messrs. KING and TAPPAN made some remarks in opposition, and Messrs. PORTER, HENDERSON, and BATES in favor of the bill; when

Mr. TAPPAN renewed his motion to lay the bill on the table, and on that demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

The question was then taken and decided in the negative—yeas 13, nays 24.

The bill was still further debated by Messrs. YOUNG, BENTON, HENDERSON, TAPPAN, KING, McROBERTS, and McDUFFIE in opposition to, and by Messrs. SMITH of Indiana, WOODBRIDGE, and LINN, in favor of, its passage.

The amendment was then agreed to, and the bill was reported to the Senate; and the question now being, "Shall the bill be engrossed for a third reading?"

Mr. McROBERTS demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

The question was then put, and decided in the affirmative, yeas 21, nays 13.

Mr. BERRIEN, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back, without amendment, and with a recommendation that it do pass, the bill from the House to change the time of holding the circuit and district courts for the eastern district of Tennessee.

On motion of Mr. B., the above bill was taken up as in committee of the whole, for consideration; when

Mr. TAPPAN moved to amend the bill by adding an additional section, repealing the act approved 9th June, 1842, amendatory of the act of 10th March, 1838, changing the time of holding the circuit and district courts for the district of Ohio.

Mr. BERRIEN said this proposition was before the Judiciary Committee, and that committee was unable as yet to concur in the repeal of that law. He trusted, however, that this bill would not be encumbered with a debatable question, which the Senator from Ohio desired.

Mr. TAPPAN remarked that the bill for this purpose had not been referred to the Judiciary Committee, and that he felt it to be his duty, under instruction from the Legislature of his State, to press the repeal of the law alluded to.

Mr. BERRIEN said the resolutions to which the Senator from Ohio had alluded, in favor of the repeal of that law, were referred to the Judiciary Committee; and the committee were not enabled to concur on the propriety of its repeal. He hoped the amendment would not be pressed.

Mr. ALLEN made some remarks in favor of the amendment. The necessity which caused the change of the place for holding the courts in Ohio, did not now exist; for the bankrupt law, which superinduced that necessity, had been repealed. The Legislature of his State had instructed their Senators to vote for the repeal of the law. He hoped it would be repealed. He demanded the yeas and nays on the amendment, which were ordered; and the question being put on its adoption, it was decided in the negative—yeas 16, nays 21.

The bill was then reported to the Senate, read the third time according to order, and passed.

Mr. EVANS, from the Committee on Finance, reported back, with an amendment, the bill from the House making appropriation for the completion of the public buildings in Florida.

Mr. CRITTENDEN, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported a bill for the relief of the widow of Captain Zantzinger; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. EVANS moved that the Senate take a recess, from 3 to 5 o'clock.

Messrs. BENTON and WOODBURY opposed it.

The question being put on the motion, it was decided in the negative—ayes 18, noes 24.

The bill for the relief of Robert P. Lewis, and the bill granting a pension to David Welch, were read the third time, and passed.

DISTRICT BANKS.

The bill to extend the charters of the District banks for ten years from July, 1844, came up for a third reading.

Mr. TAPPAN demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. ALLEN moved to lay the bill on the table, on the ground that, if passed to day, it could not go to the House, under the rule.

Mr. WRIGHT hoped Senators would not waste time upon the bill, as it could not go to the House, without a suspension of the joint rules, unless by the unanimous consent of the Senate. That being the case, he could assure Senators on the other side that any resolution to suspend the joint rule in which this bill was included, would be objected to.

Mr. ALLEN now submitted a question of order, whether the bill could be read the third time to-day.

The CHAIR said it could be read the third time and passed to-day; but could not be sent to the other House, unless by a suspension of the joint rule prohibiting the transmission, within three days of the end of the session, of original bills from one House to the other.

Mr. ALLEN, such being the decision of the Chair, withdrew his question of order, and moved to lay the bill on the table, and on that motion demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

The question was then taken on that motion, and decided in the negative—yeas 16, nays 27, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Bagby, Benton, Buchanan, Calhoun, Linn, McRoberts, Smith of Connecticut, Sturgeon, Tappan, Walker, Wilcox, Williams, Woodbury, Wright, and Young—16.

NAYS—Messrs. Archer, Barrow, Bates, Bayard, Berrien, Choate, Clayton, Conrad, Crafts, Crittenden, Dayton, Evans, Graham, Henderson, Huntington, Kerr, Miller, Morehead, Phelps, Porter, Rives, Simmons, Smith of Indiana, Sprague Tallmadge, White, and Woodbridge—27.

Mr. BENTON adverted to the improper course pursued, in bringing forward bills of this character during the last days of the session. The bill (Senators were aware) could not go to the other House. It was, therefore, a useless waste of time to pass bills to no purpose.

The question now being, Shall the bill pass?

Mr. BENTON demanded the yeas and nays, which were ordered; and the question being put, it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 26, nays 17, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Barrow, Bates, Bayard, Berrien, Choate, Clayton, Conrad, Crafts, Crittenden, Dayton, Graham, Henderson, Huntington, Kerr, Mangum, Miller, Morehead, Phelps, Porter, Rives, Sevier, Simmons, Smith of Indiana, Sprague, Tallmadge, and Woodbridge—26.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Bagby, Benton, Buchanan, Calhoun, King, Linn, McDuffie, McRoberts, Smith of Connecticut, Sturgeon, Tappan, Walker, Williams, Woodbury, Wright, and Young—17.

House bill entitled "An act for the relief of Susan Brum," was taken up as in committee of the whole, on an adverse report of the Committee on Naval Affairs, and indefinitely postponed.

The bill entitled "An act to refund to Massachusetts the balance due her for disbursements during the late war with Great Britain," came up on its third reading. It was read the third time.

Mr. WRIGHT demanded the yeas and nays on the question, Shall the bill pass? which were ordered.

Mr. WALKER made some remarks against the passage of the bill.

The question was then put, and the bill was passed by the following vote—yeas 27, nays 19, viz:

YEAS—Messrs. Barrow, Bates, Bayard, Berrien, Choate, Clayton, Conrad, Crafts, Crittenden, Dayton, Evans, Graham, Henderson, Huntington, Kerr, Mangum, Miller, Morehead, Phelps, Porter, Simmons, Smith of Indiana, Sprague, Tallmadge, White, Williams, and Woodbridge—27.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Bagby, Benton, Buchanan, Calhoun, Fulton, King, Linn, McDuffie, McRoberts, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Sturgeon, Tappan, Walker, Wilcox, Woodbury, Wright, and Young—19.

Mr. EVANS moved to suspend the joint rules, so as to permit the above bill, the District bank bill, and two private bills of the Senate, to be sent to the other House.

Mr. ALLEN objected to the motion.

The CHAIR decided that, objection having been made, the motion could not be entertained to day.

Mr. EVANS hoped that it would be suspended, to permit the two private bills to be sent to the House.

Objection was made.

The House bill entitled "An act for the relief of Asahel Lee, Harvey Lee, and Lemuel Lee," was taken up as in committee of the whole, on amendments of the Committee on Claims.

Mr. PHELPS opposed the adoption of the amendment, and showed that the bill should pass as it came from the House.

The question was put on the amendment, and it was rejected.

The bill was then reported to the Senate, read the third time according to order, and passed.

The following bills from the House were then taken up as in committee of the whole, considered, reported to the Senate, and finally passed, viz:

An act for the relief of John Drysdale.

An act for the relief of Johnson Patrick.

An act for the relief of James Sweetman.

An act for the relief of Thomas King.

An act for the relief of John F. Wiley.

An act for the relief of Joseph Nimblett.

An act for the relief of Horace Wetherell.

An act granting a pension to Israel Thomas.

House bill entitled "An act for the relief of the widow of Captain William Royall, deceased," was taken up as in committee of the whole, on an adverse report of the Committee on Pensions.

After a few remarks from Messrs. BATES, CRITTENDEN, YOUNG, BUCHANAN, WOODBURY, and PHELPS, the question on concurring in the report of the committee was put, and decided in the negative—ayes 13, noes 14. The bill was then reported to the Senate, and ordered to a third reading. And the question being, Shall the bill pass?

Mr. WILLIAMS demanded the yeas and nays, which were ordered; and, being taken, resulted in the negative—yeas 13, nays 16.

So the bill was rejected.

Mr. ALLEN, from the Committee on Pensions, reported back, without amendment, and with a recommendation that it do pass, the House bill for the relief of Josiah Westlake.

Also, reported back, from the same committee, without amendment, and with a recommendation that they do pass, the bill for the relief of Nancy Wilson, and the bill for the relief of Robert Leytor's children.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE submitted the following; which, after a few remarks in its favor, was adopted, viz:

Resolved, That of the charts and maps emanating from the Topographical Bureau, reported to Congress during this session, or which may be hereafter reported, and ordered to be engraved, there shall be struck off fifty additional copies for the use of the Topographical Bureau.

Mr. ARCHER, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, reported back, without amendment, the bill from the House to provide for carrying into effect the treaty between the United States and Great Britain, concluded at Washington, on the 9th of August, 1842.

On motion by Mr. KING, leave was granted to withdraw the papers of William Walker from the files.

The Senate bill for the relief of certain officers of the late surveying and exploring expedition, was taken up, as in committee of the whole.

Mr. BAYARD explained the propriety of this bill, and hoped the remaining special orders would also be proceeded with.

Mr. BUCHANAN objected, on the ground that the Senate bills could not be sent to the House, without a suspension of the rules. He moved to postpone the special orders, with a view of proceeding with the general orders.

Mr. BAYARD made some further explanation in favor of the special orders.

Mr. CALHOUN urged the propriety of proceeding with the general orders.

The question was taken on postponing the special orders, and taking up the general orders, and decided in the affirmative—ayes 24, noes not counted.

The general orders then being announced, House bill No. 596, being an act for the relief of Joseph W. Reckless, came up for consideration.

Mr. HUNTINGTON said this bill would lead to discussion. He, therefore, moved to lay it on the table.

The bill was accordingly laid on the table.

The following House bills were taken up as in committee of the whole, considered, reported to the Senate, and finally passed, viz:

The bill for the relief of Richard Coke, jr., Robert Anderson, and George Southall.

The bill was indefinitely postponed—yeas 18, nays 15.

Mr. BERRIEN, from the Committee of Conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill for the relief of James S. Calhoun, reported the result of that conference, in the form of a substitute for the amendments disagreed to; which substitute was adopted by the Senate, allowing nothing for consequential damages, but $15,900 in full satisfaction for all claim against the Government.

Mr. ARCHER desired to proceed to the consideration of the bill making appropriation to satisfy the stipulations of the Ashburton treaty.

Mr. BENTON said that bill could be disposed of to-morrow. He therefore moved an adjournment; which motion was disagreed to on yeas and nays—yeas 7, nays 21.

The bill for the relief of Thomas Weaver and Jacob Heyberger, sureties of the Norristown and Valley Railroad Company, was taken up as in committee of the whole.

Mr. PORTER moved to amend the bill by adding, as an additional section thereto, the Senate bill to remit duties on railroad iron, on certain conditions.

Mr. WRIGHT moved that the bill be passed over informally; for he had no doubt that the amendment proposed would lead to debate.

Mr. WALKER hoped that the bill would not be passed over. He thought that the Senate would readily see the impropriety of amending a private bill, which was just in itself, by a general bill involving a great principle, and which would require a great deal of discussion before it could be disposed of.

Mr. PORTER made some remarks in justification of his course, and on the propriety of passing this bill, which merely gave further time to the railroad companies to import railroad iron free of duty. He thought it was germane to the bill before the Senate. He hoped the Senate would take a vote upon it, and indulge him with the yeas and nays on the amendment.

Mr. CONRAD said that the bill was analogous to the bill which was proposed to be amended; and, if it was passed, would tend to cheapen the transportation of the mail on railroads.

Mr. WALKER said it was vain and nugatory to send such a bill to the House, when it was known that that body had rejected the bill to remit duties in favor of the Petersburg Railroad Company.

Messrs. WRIGHT and ARCHER suggested that the bill should be passed over informally. This suggestion was acquiesced in by the Senate.

The bill in relation to the exemplification of the records of land patents, and other evidences of title, and amendatory of the act entitled "An act to reorganize the General Land Office," was taken up as in committee of the whole, on an amendment of the Committee on Public Lands, proposing (as it was understood by the reporter) to transfer the duties now performed by the secretary to the President, in signing patents, to the Recorder to the Land Office. This amendment led to discussion, in which Messrs. McROBERTS and WALKER participated in opposition to the amendment, and Mr. SMITH of Indiana in favor of it. The bill was, however, passed over informally till to-morrow.

Mr. WALKER submitted the following resolution; which lies one day on the table, under the rule, viz:

Resolved, That the President of the United States cause to be investigated by the judges of the superior courts of Florida, in their respective districts, all losses of property suffered by the inhabitants of said Territory, in consequence of the Seminole hostilities since the commencement thereof, in the year 1836; and that the testimony and opinions of said judges in such case be reported to this body when completed: Provided, That any expenses attending the investigation be provided for, and paid by, the said Territory of Florida.

Mr. HUNTINGTON gave notice that he should, on to-morrow, move the Senate, at the hour of two o'clock, to proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. MOREHEAD, on leave, introduced a joint resolution to authorize the translation of a pamphlet in the Navy Department, on the culture and preparation of hemp; which was read twice.

Mr. M. remarked that this pamphlet (which was in the Russian language) was upon a subject of great interest to the people of Kentucky; and asked that the resolution might now be passed.

Mr. WRIGHT did not object to such course, but thought that, Congress having provided agents to go to Kentucky and inspect and purchase hemp, it was as little as the great hemp-growing interest could do to pay the small sum which would be required to pay for translating this pamphlet.

Mr. WILLIAMS objected to its consideration; when,

On motion by Mr. SIMMONS,

The Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, March 1, 1843.

The House met this morning at 10 o'clock.

Mr. WESTBROOK presented the petition of citizens of Mauch Chunk, Pennsylvania, for the issuing of $200,000,000 of stock, to be distributed among the States and Territories, and District of Columbia.

AMOS KENDALL.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD presented to the House the following resolutions of the Legislature of Maine:

Resolved, That while it is the duty of a free Government to protect the people from injustice and oppression, it is also bound to sustain and defend its officers and agents in an honest, firm, and rigid discharge of their duties and trusts. That while an infringement of the laws should be visited with merited punishment, reparation of injuries incurred in the conscientious and impartial performance of their official functions should be prompt and complete.

Resolved, That, in the execution of his duties as Postmaster General of the United States, the honorable Amos Kendall evinced not only talents of the highest order, but unswerving and unpurchasable integrity; exalted and disinterested patriotism, never-tiring industry and zeal for the public weal; and unexampled watchfulness of peculators and swindlers, which have never been surpassed in the history of the Government, and entitle him to the gratitude of the nation.

Resolved, That in resisting what he deemed to be an unjust and exorbitant claim upon the Post Office Department, for which he is now incarcerated within the jail limits of the city of Washington, Mr. Kendall acted with a single eye to the public good, and with a deep sense of an imperative duty as a public servant.

Resolved, That the rank injustice of suffering a public servant, thus meritorious, to be placed in durance—not for any delinquency or misconduct, but on account of his fidelity to the Government—is a stain upon the national honor, which, as far as it can be done by Congress, should be speedily erased.

Resolved, That our Senators in Congress be instructed, and our Representatives requested, to exert all fair and honorable means to have the judgment on which the Hon. Amos Kendall is now imprisoned, for withholding his official sanction to the claim of Stockton & Stokes on the Post Office Department, cancelled by the Treasurer of the United States; and also to have the said Kendall allowed and paid, from the public treasury, the costs and expenses incurred by him in defending the suit of the said Stockton & Stokes against him, together with such further sum for damages, by reason of said suit and imprisonment, as may be a full remuneration therefor.

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be transmitted, by the Governor, to each of the Senators and Representatives in Congress from this State, and to the President of the Senate and Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States.

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, February 20, 1843.

Read, and passed.

DAVID DUNN, Speaker.

IN SENATE, February 21, 1843.

Read, and passed.

EDWARD KAVANAGH, President.

February 21, 1843. Approved:

JOHN FAIRFIELD.

Mr. DAVIS of New York also presented resolutions of the Legislature of New York, instructing the Senators and requesting the Representatives from that State in the Congress of the United States, to use their exertions to procure, if possible, at the present session of Congress, the passage of a law entirely relieving Amos Kendall from all and every personal responsibility and damage in consequence of a certain judgment against him in favor of Stockton & Stokes, for certain of his official acts while Postmaster General of the United States. The resolution was laid on the table.

On the motion of Mr. BARNARD, the following resolution was adopted:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be requested to cause a plan and estimates to be prepared at the topographical bureau, or otherwise within his department, and laid before Congress at the next session, for a room or apartment in the Capitol, or to be added thereto, for the better accommodation of the officers of the House of Representatives.

Mr. BARNARD also presented a communication from the authorities of the city of Albany, in relation to the condition of the navigation of the Hudson river.

Mr. T. W. WILLIAMS, from a committee, reported Senate bill declaring Robbinston, in the State of Maine, a port of delivery.

Mr. BIRDSEYE, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, made an adverse report upon the petition of Ellen Duval, in behalf of her late husband, E. W. Duval; which was laid on the table.

Mr. CHILDS, from the Committee on Commerce, reported a bill for the relief of John H. Hodges, of Baltimore; which was read twice, and committed.

SENATE BILLS.

The following bills from the Senate were read twice, and referred:

An act for the relief of Duncan L. Clinch.

An act declaring Robbinston, in the State of Maine, to be a port of entry.

An act to settle the title to the Pea Patch island, in the river Delaware.

An act for the relief of Mary W. Thompson, widow of the late Lieutenant Colonel Thompson, of the army of the United States.

An act for the relief of Nancy Polereesky.

An act for the relief of Daniel G. Skinner, of Alabama.

An act for the relief of John R. Williams.

Mr. HOWARD, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which was referred the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act to apply certain alternate sections of the public domain toward the completion of works of internal improvement in the State of Michigan, and for other purposes," reported the same without amendment.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

The House took up the bill entitled "An act making appropriations for fulfilling treaty stipulations with the various Indian tribes, for the half-calendar year beginning the 1st day of January, and ending the 30th day of June, 1843; and for the fiscal year, beginning the 1st day of July, 1843, and ending the 30th day of June, 1844;" which had come from the Senate with certain amendments. The amendments were concurred in.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, in compliance with a resolution of the House of the 28th day of June, 1842, a report respecting fines, penalties, and forfeitures received and retained by collectors and other officers of the revenue.

Also, a report from the Secretary of State, which, with the documents accompanying it, furnish the information requested by the resolution of the 18th February, which called for any correspondence between the representatives of foreign governments and the United States in relation to the operation of the present tariff laws or treaties existing with foreign governments.

CLERKS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a memorial from Noah Fletcher, a clerk of eighteen years standing in the office of the Clerk of the House, who has discharged the duties of engrossing and enrolling clerk, praying for an inquiry, by a select committee, into his services, that he may receive payment for the present session of Congress, &c.

Mr. McKENNAN moved that he be paid for his services for the present session; and that he be continued in the employment of the House.

After a few words from Mr. HOPKINS, Mr. UNDERWOOD, and others,

Mr. W. SMITH moved to lay the whole subject on the table.

Mr. SMITH of Virginia asked for the yeas and nays on the motion to lay on the table. They were not ordered.

Mr. SAUNDERS called for tellers on the yeas and nays. They were not ordered.

Tellers (Messrs. SMITH and McKENNAN) were ordered on the motion to lay on the table; who reported—ayes 34; noes 88.

So the House refused to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. MERIWETHER rose, and inquired whether it would be in order to move to dismiss Matthew St. Clair Clarke, as Clerk of the House.

The SPEAKER said, no.

Mr. BABCOCK called for a division of the question on the resolution.

The question was taken on the first part—by which authority is given to pay Mr. Fletcher for his services as clerk this session. It was agreed to.

Mr. HOPKINS called for the yeas and nays upon the second division of the resolution—by which authority is given to continue the said clerk (Fletcher) in office. They were ordered.

On taking the vote, the result was—yeas 64, nays 67.

So the House determined that Mr. Noah Fletcher shall not be continued in office.

Mr. SUMMERS rose and moved to reconsider the vote just taken, and took the occasion to make a statement in reference to the action of the Clerk of the House on the resolutions to reduce the force of his office. In the course of his remarks, he read extracts from the depositions of one of the clerks, (Mr. Fletcher,) and one of the messengers, (Mr. Brown,) showing that they had never been turned out of office.

Mr. BRIGGS made a stemement, in explanation, in behalf of the Clerk; after which,

Mr. SUMMERS withdrew his motion.

Mr. KEIM offered a resolution that Mr. Kingman, one of the superseded clerks, should be placed on the same footing with Mr. Fletcher, by being paid for his services during the session; which resolution was agreed to.

On motion by Mr. FILLMORE, the bill making appropriation for fortifications, as amended by the Senate, was taken up, and the amendments concurred in.

Mr. KING of Georgia moved to take up the message of the Senate asking a committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses to the amendment to the bill for the relief of James S. Calhoun; which motion was agreed to, and a committee of conference was appointed on the part of the House.

On motion by Mr. WISE, the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. McCLELLAN, of New York, in the chair.)

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WISE moved that the committee take up the bill making appropriations for the naval service for the half calendar and the fiscal year, terminating on the 30th of June, 1844, which had come from the Senate, with some amendments.

Mr. TILLINGHAST moved that the committee take up the two joint resolutions introduced from the Library Committee; the one in relation to the statue of Washington by Greenough, and the other in relation to Gordon's Digest.

The motion of the gentleman from Virginia was agreed to.

The first amendment of the Senate was one by which they struck out the provision of the House, that the head of the Bureau of Provisions and Clothing should hereafter be a captain in the navy.

Mr. MALLORY defended the provision of the House which the Senate had stricken out; and contended that, to pay a civilian while so many captains were unemployed, was a waste of expenditure which ought to be retrenched.

Mr. BURNELL also addressed the House on the amendment.

Mr. C. BROWN also defended the provision of the House, and contended that captains in the navy were better adapted for the office in question than a clerk in one of the departments at Washington. Captains in the navy would have more sympathy with the sailors, and take better care that they were not wronged.

Mr. KING was desirous of offering an amendment by which he proposed to substitute a purser for a captain as the head of this bureau.

The CHAIRMAN decided that the amendment was not now in order.

Mr. WISE addressed the committee in defence of the present head of this bureau; and read a letter from the Secretary of the Navy addressed to Mr. Evans of the Senate on that subject.

Some conversation took place upon points of order; after which,

Mr. REYNOLDS rose, and addressed the committee in opposition to the amendment of the Senate. He contended that a captain was a proper officer to be placed at the head of the Bureau of Blothing, instead of a civilian, as Mr. Goldsborough. He urged that, by employing an officer of the navy, (and there were many "waiting orders,") there would be a saving of $3,000 per annum to the Government. Though a small sum, he thought that everything should be saved which it was in the power of Congress to prevent being expended, without absolute injury to the service.

Mr. McKENNAN hoped that gentlemen would confine themselves strictly to the question before the committee. He then went into a defence of the propriety of continuing the office of head of the Bureau of Provisions and Clothing in the hands of a civilian. The duties of the office should be filled by a mercantile, and not a military man.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON urged the expediency and economy of placing the office in the hands of an officer of the navy. He replied to the gentleman who had eulogized Mr. Goldsborough, and said that all the abuses in the department grew up under the administration of the Navy Board, of which Mr. Goldsborough was the secretary. He preferred to have a purser at the head of the Bureau of Clothing; but, rather than have a civilian, at additional expense to the Government, he was willing to take a post-captain.

Mr. EVERETT thought that the House had acted unwisely in adopting the proviso, and that they ought now to adopt the amendment of the Senate. He thought a greater saving would be effected by retaining in this office a man of business and an accountant, rather than a naval captain, than the whole pay of that officer.

Mr. GWIN wished to inquire of the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, [Mr. WISE,] whether Mr. Goldsborough contracted for the fuel used by the steam-ships that have been laid up, owing to the enormous expenses incurred in keeping them afloat.

Mr. WISE said he did not know. He supposed not.

Mr. GWIN was anxious to ascertain this fact, and who was responsible for these contracts; for he believed that outrageous abuses had been committed in supplying this fuel. He had offered a resolution, six or seven weeks ago, calling upon the Secretary of the Navy for information in regard to these contracts and purchases. That resolution remains unanswered to this day. He thought the Secretary would be more appropriately employed in giving the House important information thus called for, instead of reading us lectures on our legislative action. He must say that the letter just read by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. WISE,] in which the Secretary characterizes our action as absurd, was impertinent—to say the least of it.

Mr. WISE said that the gentleman was entirely mistaken in his construction of the Secretary's remarks. He would read what he had said, and let the House decide whether the gentleman had done the Secretary justice.

Mr. GWIN said that the committee must perceive, from the extract of the letter read by the gentleman from Virginia, that he had done the Secretary no injustice. He says it is absurd to suppose that a captain in the navy can perform the service now required of Mr. Goldsborough by virtue of his office. This House passed a proviso to this bill, requiring this service to be performed by a captain of the navy; and hence our action is characterized by the Secretary as absurd. He was not disposed to silently receive lectures from any department of the Government for our action, for which we are responsible to the country. He believed this proviso was proper and legitimate, and he hoped the House would adhere to it. These duties, he believed, were now performed by subordinate officers of the navy—samples only of the article to be bought being submitted to the head of the bureau, who had no knowledge, except through these officers, whether the article proposed to be sold corresponded with the sample.

He hoped that, before this House adjourned, an answer would be received to his resolution, sent to the Secretary six weeks ago. He believed that there has been a most wasteful expenditure of the public money in purchasing fuel for these steamships, and he hoped the Secretary would not withhold the information asked for.

Mr. WISE. Where were these purchases made?

Mr. GWIN. At Pensacola; where, he understood, fifteen dollars a ton had been paid for a large amount of coal not worth five dollars per ton. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. KING] had stated to this House that this coal was useless as to the purpose for which it was purchased. He was in favor of putting the most rigid restrictions upon the expenditures of this department, which had swelled to such an enormous amount.

Mr. MALLORY said he would appeal to the House to maintain its own rights against the Secretary of the Navy, or anybody else that would say that its action had been absurd. He moved the proviso which the Senate's amendment proposed to strike out; and, if time was allowed him, he could demonstrate that the notions of the Secretary, and not his, were absurd. What did the Secretary of the Navy know about Mr. Goldsborough? He recollected what occurred in the committee, and the proposition of the department to make an extravagant appropriation for this bureau, and the committee's cutting it down to $17,000. There was no place in the bill, as reported by the committee, for Mr. Goldsborough; and he never dreamed, when he voted for it, that this gentleman would have been placed at the head of one of the bureaux. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. McKENNAN] had talked about the mercantile knowledge of Mr. Goldsborough, and his knowledge of the various and complicated accounts of the Navy Department. Now, this gentleman came to the committee with a bundle of papers to show that the Navy Department had no accounts at all. Why all this confusion in the accounts of the department, about which they had heard so much, grew up during the administration of this Mr. Goldsborough. What did they now see? Why, the officers of the navy, at the different stations, purchasing provisions and clothing, and receiving their orders from this man, lolling at his ease in one of the highest departments of the Government here at Washington. All the orders to officers of the navy should emanate from one of superior grade; and the adherence to this principle was one of the best modes of keeping up discipline. He had no idea, as one of the Naval Committee, that this gentleman would ever have been placed at the head of a bureau. He thought a captain should be placed at the head of it; and, if that could not be done, a purser would do as well.

Mr. HOLMES regretted that, upon a question which concerned one of the most important branches of our national defence, appeals similar to that of his friend from Mississippi and his friend from Virginia, [Messrs. GWIN and MALLORY,] should be made to their passions, when they should take counsel of their reason. He called upon the House not to be influenced by appeals such as these. The Secretary of the Navy was a logician, and had, in his letter, merely intended what was called a reductio ad absurdum, without putting it in logical form; but, at the same time, intending no offence to the House.

Mr. McKENNAN expressed the opinion that the debate was continued long enough; and he rose to make a motion that the committee rise, in order that he might submit a resolution fixing a time on which the debate should terminate. Mr. McK., however, withdrew his motion at the request of Mr. KING of Georgia, at whose instance the third section of the original bill was read, in order to bear out the statement he had made.

Mr. FILLMORE did not object to the motion for the committee to rise; but he wished some part of the discussion to be allotted to the subject of the dry-docks at Brooklyn and Pensacola, rather than that the whole time should be taken up in discussing these two appointments; for, after all, these abuses could not be remedied by legislation, but must be left to the discretion of the departments.

Mr. McKENNAN renewed his motion that the committee rise.

Mr. C. J. INGERSOLL endeavored to obtain the floor; but the Chair decided that the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania was first in order.

The question was then taken on McKENNAN's motion, and it was negatived—ayes 54, noes 74.

Mr. C. J. INGERSOLL then offered an amendment to the amendment, as follows: "Provided, That no part of this appropriation shall be applied to the support of a squadron to be kept on the coast of Africa." Mr. I said that this amendment was offered for the purpose—which he trusted would not be denied by the House—of enabling a respectable and considerable minority in that House to express their views on the subject of that part of the late treaty to which it referred.

Mr. FILLMORE raised the point of order, that the amendment had no relevance to the proviso it proposed to amend.

The CHAIR decided the amendment to be out of order.

Mr. C. J. INGERSOLL said that he had not been in the habit of trespassing on the time of the House, and he therefore hoped that some opportunity would be allowed him of explaining his views in relation to the important bill that was passed yesterday. A large minority had been compelled to vote on that—certainly one of the most important questions of the session, without the opportunity to say one word except the solitary No. It was not his intention to take up the time of the House by entering at length into the subject; but he wished merely, in vindication of himself, and those who thought with him, to explain the reasons why he could not approve of the late treaty.

Mr. WISE raised the point of order, that the remarks of the gentleman were not relevant to the subject before the committee.

The CHAIR decided that the remarks of the gentleman were not in order.

Mr. C. J. INGERSOLL asked if he was to understand the Chair that, on a naval appropriation bill, and in Committee of the Whole, it was not in order for him to discuss any portion of the bill.

The CHAIR said that it would be in order to discuss any part of the bill, but not to discuss the treaty. There were other amendments, to which it would be in order for the gentleman to attach his amendment.

Mr. STANLY offered an amendment, providing that all provisions and clothing of every kind for the navy should hereafter be furnished by contract to the lowest bidder, after advertisements for sealed proposals in the public papers, &c.; but, at the suggestion of several gentlemen, withdrew the amendment, with the intention of offering it at another stage of the bill.

Mr. WISE stated his point of order against the admissibility of the amendment of the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. STANLY;] and, after a few words from Messrs. WISE, STANLY, FESSENDEN, and others,

Mr. STANLY withdrew his amendment.

Tellers were then called for, on the question of concurring in the amendment of the Senate; and Messrs. MALLORY and ATHERTON were appointed; and they reported 52 in the affirmative, and 83 in the negative.

The third, fourth, and fifth amendments of the Senate were then concurred in.

The sixth amendment of the Senate struck out the proviso of the House, by which it was required that the head of the Bureau of Surgery and Medicine should have seen a certain number of years sea service.

Mr. WISE addressed the committee on this amendment, objecting to "legislating men out of office;" and contending that sea service was not the best school to fit a man to discharge the duties of the head of this bureau.

Mr. T. J. YORKE, as the chairman of the Select Committee on the Expenditures of the Navy Department, made some observations (as was understood) in behalf of Dr. Barton, the present head of the Bureau of Surgery and Medicine, of whose worth he had had an opportunity to form an opinion while in discharge of his duty as a member of the select committee; but he spoke in so low a tone of voice, that his observations were not distinctly heard.

Mr. A. H. H. STUART rose and stated that it was due to Dr. Barton that he should explain the result of the investigation which he had made into the expenditures of Dr. Barton's bureau. He went there, having no acquaintance with him, and with a previous prejudice against him, which was not removed by the Doctor's eccentric manners. He now believed that he was a good officer, and had introduced a good system. He referred to the abuses which existed in the surgical department of the navy, and instanced the Florida squadron, composed of five or six small vessels, and six hundred men; which, during eight months, cost $2,076 for liquors alone for the sick. For filling an ice-house with one hundred tons of ice, $1,000 was paid; $500 for the freight of the ice, and $125 for the chaff which was put around it, to keep it from melting. In some cases, $4 a gallon was paid for milk; $12 a dozen for fowls. For sheep for the sick, $1,200 was paid. Not a dollar appeared as credited to the hospital fund, although such large expenditures were made for hospital stores. Dr. Barton's system removed abuses. His liquor circular, which had offended the navy officers, was merely a premonitory circular posted on the liquor cases, telling the officers to use the liquors with moderation. Dr. Barton required the surgeons to give receipts for all stores carried to sea, and account for them in the proper manner.

He eulogised Dr. Barton at some length, and concluded by expressing the hope that he would be retained as an honor and an ornament to the naval service, and as a man whose very independence of character had made him enemies.

Mr. FESSENDEN opposed the amendment of the Senate, and sent to the Clerk's table, to be read, a portion of Dr. Barton's report, for the purpose of proving that his style was unintelligible, and without meaning. He said he had no feeling against Dr. Barton, nor any care about him—not even being acquainted with him by sight.

After some further remarks from Mr. FESSENDEN—

Mr. MORGAN addressed the committee in support of the amendment of the Senate, and in defence of Dr. Barton, whom he characterized as one of the most faithful and intelligent officers in the service of the Government. The Doctor, he said, had introduced a system and order in his bureau, which would in future prevent the frauds and abuses in the medical department which had been so loudly complained of; and he highly commended the gentleman for the facilities he had afforded to the committee in ferreting out and exposing those abuses. He held in his hand a bill of the particulars of the medicines furnished to the little Florida squadron under the command of Lieut. J. T. McLaughlin, which consumed, in eight months, one half of the large appropriation for the medical service of the navy for the year—say nearly $16,000. Among these, were to be found six bottles of champagne, $5; (Champagne for the sick!) port wine, 28 galls. and 4 bottles, $338; 15 galls. and 160 bottles of madeira, $256; claret, 7 boxes 7 galls., $575; 12 galls. of gin and 14 jugs, $55; whiskey, $32; Newark cider, $66; brown stout, $248; porter, $530; ale, $228; bitters, $1 50—making, in all, over $2,000 for liquor alone, for only eight months. Such were the facilities afforded by Dr. Barton to the committee, that they were able to expose all those abuses. For these reasons, he should vote for the continuance of this officer; and he thought the country indebted to him for the reform he had introduced in his department.

Mr. MALLORY made some remarks in opposition to the amendment, and in censure of Dr. Barton; and read one of his circulars to show the confused and unintelligible manner in which he wrote.

Mr. WISE replied, and produced a letter from Commodore Decatur, in which Dr. Barton's qualifications were spoken of in the highest terms.

Mr. JOS. R. INGERSOLL made a few remarks testifying to the high qualities of Dr. B. as a medical man, and the value of his services.

Mr. FILLMORE moved that the committee rise, for the purpose of offering a resolution fixing on a time for taking the bill out of committee; which motion was agreed to, and the committee rose and reported progress.

Mr. FILLMORE offered a joint resolution, suspending the 16th joint rule, which prohibits the sending bills from one House to the other on the last three days of the session.

Mr. WELLER objected; and asked for the yeas and nays.

Mr. FILLMORE said that it was indispensable that the rule should be suspended, in order to pass several bills.

Mr. WELLER said, that whenever the particular case occurred, in which it became necessary to suspend the rule, it could be done for that case.

Mr. FILLMORE said that the rule requiring a vote of two-thirds did not apply to the 16th joint rule.

The CHAIR said that was true; but the resolution itself, to suspend the rule, could not be received without a suspension of the rules.

Mr. FILLMORE then moved a suspension of the rules.

Mr. PICKENS hoped the gentleman from New York would specify the bills he wished to suspend the rules for. The object of the joint rule was to prevent hasty and imperfect legislation; and if they suspended the rule indefinitely, it would produce the very evil the 16th joint rule was intended to prevent.

The SPEAKER said that, by a reference to the precedents on this subject, he found that a majority only was necessary to suspend this joint rule.

Mr. WELLER inquired if the resolution itself was in order, without a suspension of the rules of the House.

The SPEAKER replied that it was not, if any gentleman objected.

Mr. WELLER said that he objected when the resolution was first offered.

Mr. C. BROWN called upon the gentleman from New York to say for the transmission of what bills he wished the rule suspended.

Mr. FILLMORE said it was impossible to say what bills the House might pass during the day.

The SPEAKER then explained to the gentleman from New York, that, as the reception of the resolution was objected to, it would require a majority of two-thirds to get it before the House.

Mr. FILLMORE moved a suspension, nevertheless, for this day only.

Mr. WELLER called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered; and, being taken, resulted—yeas 89, nays 70.

So the rules were not suspended.

Mr. FILLMORE moved a resolution to terminate debate on this bill in Committee of the Whole at fifteen minutes past 3 o'clock.

[Cries of "Oh, say 3 o'clock." It was now ten minutes to 3 o'clock.]

The resolution, as originally proposed, was agreed to; and the House again resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, (Mr. R. McCLELLAN in the chair.)

Mr. GORDON resumed the debate in Committee of the Whole, by observing that, some days ago, he made a short speech on this bill, and in advocacy of general reforms in the navy; and he took occasion to charge abuses in relation to the stores of ships; but, on that occasion, the gentleman from Virginia denied that there were any such abuses.

Mr. WISE denied that he had done so.

Mr. GORDON congratulated the gentleman on a change of sentiment on that subject.

Mr. WISE denied that he had changed his ground.

Mr. GORDON continued, and commented on the convenient manner in which some gentlemen one day denied that any abuses existed; and on another day, when it was necessary to sustain a particular officer in the navy, took different ground.

There was one position assumed by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WISE] which he could not approve of. It was that where he contended that sea-service was not a good school for a surgeon in the navy. It was, in his opinion, a school—a practical school—where a knowledge of diseases and of climates could best be acquired. Diseases, as all knew, differed as climates differed; and there should, in his opinion, be a man at the head of the Medical Bureau acquainted with endemical diseases. No man who filled the station of head of the Bureau of Surgery could possibly be any the worse off for having been at sea. He was glad to see that the gentleman from Virginia was disposed to abandon the ground assumed on a former occasion, and now came forward, for the purpose of saving an officer, to testify to the existence of abuses in the department.

Mr. WISE remarked that he would say to the gentleman from New York, that he was mistaken if he supposed he had changed his ground. Did he understand the gentleman to say that he had changed his ground in order to save a particular man?

Mr. GORDON said he did not make such a charge against the gentleman. What he had intended to express was, that the gentleman, although he had heretofore always defended the schemes of the Secretary of the Navy, yet, on the present occasion, when the merits of Dr. Barton were under discussion, he departed from his usual position, and admitted that there were abuses in the Navy Department.

Mr. WISE said he had, on a former occasion, when the gentleman charged that the officers of the navy had provided for their dinners out of the public stores, declared that the charge was without proof, and defied the gentleman to the proof. If the gentleman had then said that there were abuses in the application of the hospital fund, he should have expressed his concurrence in the sentiment.

Mr. GORDON said he did charge that the officers gave dinners and entertainment to foreign princes and grandees out of the public stores. He now repeated that charge. He wished to know what became of all the wine which was put on board of our ships, unless it was used by the officers at their entertainments? Would the gentleman undertake to say that wine out of the public stores was not used at these entertainments?

He should be willing to go against the proviso, and to save Barton, if he were satisfied that Dr. Barton were a man of sound common sense. He had evidence that Dr. B. had introduced many useful reforms, and was, in some respects, a good officer. He did not always judge by a man's style; but Dr. B. was certainly very queer. There was more of fancy and moonshine than of common sense in his communications. He had no doubt that the Doctor would make a very good poet; and should he turn his attention to literature, instead of hard practical service, would acquire some fame. After a few more remarks, he concluded.

Mr. FILLMORE made a few remarks on the subject of docks, and explained the objects of the amendment proposed in relation to the contemplated dry docks at Brooklyn and at Pensacola. He expressed the opinion that we had not yet experience enough to justify the erection of a floating dry-dock on any plan.

The time being out, the committee proceeded to vote.

The question was first taken on concurring with the Senate in their rejection of the proviso excluding any person from the post of head of the Bureau of Medicine who had not seen five years sea-service; ("Barton or no Barton,") and resulted—yeas 90, nays 35.

So the committee agreed to retain Dr. Barton in office.

DRY-DOCKS.

The question next recurred on the amendments of the Committee on Naval Affairs to the amendments of the Senate in relation to dry-docks.

The Senate proposed to insert a clause declaring that—

The Secretary of the Navy is hereby directed not to apply or expend any part of the appropriation of one hundred thousand dollars, mentioned in the ninth clause of an act of Congress approved on the fourth day of August, one thousand eight hundred and forty-two, entitled "An act making appropriations for the naval service for the year one thousand eight hundred and forty-two," nor the unexpended balances of former appropriations mentioned in said act, for the construction of a floating dock at Brooklyn, or in the harbor of New York; and this shall not be understood as reviving or conferring any authority to proceed with the construction of a dry-dock in said harbor, the making of which was provisionally suspended by the said ninth clause of said act; but the said sum of one hundred thousand dollars, appropriated as above mentioned, shall be applied to the construction of a floating dock at Pensacola, of capacity for the repair of frigates of the smaller class, and upon such plan as the Secretary of the Navy shall approve.

The Committee on Naval Affairs recommended a non-concurrence in this amendment; and that all of the same after the word "directed" be stricken out, and the following inserted in lieu thereof:

To apply the appropriation mentioned in the ninth clause of an act of Congress, approved on the fourth day of August, one thousand eight hundred and forty-two, entitled "An act making appropriations for the naval service for the year one thousand eight hundred and forty-two," and the unexpended balances of former appropriations mentioned in said act, to the construction of a floating dock at Brooklyn, New York, upon the plan preferred by the commissioners appointed for that purpose; and that the sum of one hundred thousand dollars be, and is hereby, appropriated for the construction of a floating-dock at Pensacola, of capacity for the repair of frigates of the smaller class, upon such plan as the Secretary of the Navy shall approve.

Messrs. J. L. WHITE and McKEON offered amendments to the Senate's amendment; which were severally rejected, and copies of which could not be obtained.

Mr. ROOSEVELT offered an amendment, the effect of which was to insert $100,000 for a floating-dock at Pensacola, and to leave the appropriations for the dry-dock at Brooklyn on the same footing upon which they were placed by the act of last session.

The question was then taken on Mr. ROOSEVELT's amendment, and it was rejected.

The question was then taken on concurring in the amendment reported by the Committee on Naval Affairs, and decided in the negative.

The question then recurred on concurring in the amendment of the Senate, and it was decided in the affirmative—ayes 75, noes 68.

The question coming up on the amendment of the Senate, appropriating $5,000 for defraying the expenses of an agent authorized by the joint resolution of January, 1843—

Mr. STANLY offered an amendment to it, providing that the provisions, clothing, &c., of the navy shall be furnished upon contract, to the highest bidder, after advertisement for sealed proposals in the public papers.

Mr. PARMENTER offered a verbal amendment, which was accepted as a modification by Mr. STANLY.

The committee then rose, and reported the bill to the House.

Some conversation ensued between Messrs. FILLMORE, TILLINGHAST, WISE, FERRIS, and others, respecting the Brooklyn dry and floating-dock question; which was ultimately terminated by the previous question.

The report of the Committee of the Whole on the first amendment was concurred in.

On the second amendment, in relation to the Bureau of Provisions and Clothing, the question was put in the affirmative form, on a concurrence with the amendment of the Senate; and the vote—taken by Messrs MEDILL and T. J. CAMPBELL, as tellers—was 72 in the affirmative, and 66 in the negative. The effect of this vote is to leave this bureau as at present organized.

The third, fourth, and fifth amendments were concurred in.

The question was then taken on agreeing to the report of the Committee of the Whole, recommending a concurrence in the amendment of the Senate on the subject of the instructions in relation to dry-docks.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the result was—yeas 85, nays 89.

So the House refused to concur.

The next amendment of the Senate (verbal) was concurred in.

The amendment of the Senate providing for an agent on the subject of water-rotted hemp, was also concurred in.

The bill was then returned to the Senate, and will there await the determination of that body to adhere or recede.

NAVY PENSIONS.

On motion of Mr. FILLMORE, the House took up the bill making appropriations for navy pensions, and concurred in the amendment of the Senate thereto.

The report of the Conference Committee on the disagreement in relation to the bill for the relief of James S. Calhoun, was taken up, and agreed to.

At 5 o'clock, Mr. WELLER moved an adjournment carried.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, March 2, 1843.

The reading of the journal having been dispensed with, the following engrossed bills were read the third time, and passed, viz:

House bill for the relief of Garret Vleit; and

House bill entitled "An act for the relief of the heirs, or the assignees of the heirs, of Isaac Todd and James McGill."

The PRESIDENT pro tem. laid before the Senate a communication from the Navy Department, giving information that letters had been received from the American minister at the court of St. Petersburg, and from the American consul at Odessa, transmitting documents in the Russian language on the subject of the cultivation and preparation of hemp; which, on motion of Mr. YOUNG, was ordered to lie on the table.

Also, laid before the Senate a communication from the Commissioner of the General Land Office and the Register of the Treasury, transmitting, in compliance with resolutions of the Senate of the 18th instant, a statement of the total amount of the two per cent. fund arising from the net proceeds of the sales of the public lands in the State of Ohio; and a statement of the entire cost of the Cumberland road, &c.; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. WRIGHT presented joint resolutions of the Legislature of New York, on the subject of the imprisonment of Mr. Kendall, under the judgment obtained by Messrs. Stockton & Stokes against him. Mr. W. said that, inasmuch as a bill had already passed on the subject of these resolutions, he would merely move that they be laid on the table: agreed to.

On motion by Mr. WRIGHT, leave was granted to Elisha Ketchum to withdraw his petition and papers from the files.

On motion by Mr. YOUNG, the same privilege was granted to John Dowling.

On motion by Mr. LINN, the same privilege was granted to the heirs and legal representatives of Julian Bugue, and the sureties of Thomas Hempstead.

Mr. PHELPS, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported back, without amendment, and with a recommendation that it do pass, the joint resolution from the House, to provide for the payment of awards under a treaty with the Cherokee Indians.

Mr. PHELPS, from the Committee on Claims, reported back, without amendment, and with a recommendation that it do pass, the bill from the House for the relief of Gamaliel E. Smith.

On motion by Mr. EVANS, at a subsequent part of the day, the previous orders were postponed, and the above bill was taken up as in committee of the whole, considered, reported to the Senate, and finally passed.

Mr. PHELPS, from the Committee on Pensions, reported back, without amendment, the bill for the relief of George Naddle.

Mr. CHOATE, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported a bill for the relief of Samuel H. Thompson; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Several adverse reports of the standing committees, on private claims, were taken up and concurred in by the Senate.

On motion by Mr. HUNTINGTON, the previous orders of the day were postponed, and the House bill entitled "An act to provide for the better security of the lives of passengers on board of vessels propelled, in whole or in part, by steam," approved July 7, 1838, was taken up, as in committee of the whole.

Mr. H. made some remarks on this bill, showing the great importance of it to give better security to the lives of persons travelling on steamboats. It modified the law of 1838, so as to dispense with the use of chains in the management of the tiller.

The amendments proposed by the Committee on Commerce having been agreed to, the bill was reported to the Senate, and finally passed.

On motion by Mr. KING, and by general consent, the vote on the adoption of the amendments of the Committee on Commerce on the above bill, was reconsidered. The amendment of the committee, striking out the 8th section of the bill (which section makes provision for testing steamboat boilers) was then disagreed to, and the bill was then passed as amended.

Mr. YOUNG submitted the following resolution; which was agreed to, viz:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be directed to receive the report to be made by the Secretary of the Treasury, in compliance with the resolution of the Senate of the 30th of July, 1842, in relation to the public lands, in the recess of the Senate; that the same be printed under his inspection; and that one thousand copies, in addition to the usual number, be printed for the use of the Senate, and distributed as other public documents.

The resolution submitted by Mr. WALKER on yesterday, was taken up for consideration, and read as follows, viz:

Resolved, That the President of the United States cause to be investigated by the judges of the superior courts of Florida, in their respective districts, all losses of property suffered by the inhabitants of said Territory, in consequence of the Seminole hostilities since the commencement thereof, in the year 1835; and that the testimony and opinions of said judges in each case be reported to this body when completed: Provided, That any expenses attending the investigation be provided for, and paid by, the said Territory of Florida.

Messrs. GRAHAM and BAYARD made some remarks in opposition to the resolution, on the ground that the President had no power to impose such a duty on the judges; and that it would be a constructive implication that Congress would hereafter render satisfaction for the losses of property there, regardless of the principles which had regulated its past action.

Mr. WALKER differed with those Senators as to the construction which they had placed on the resolution. The power (he said) had been heretofore exercised to instruct judges in such cases; and the resolution did not, in the least degree, imply any obligation on Congress to satisfy claims for the losses of property there, without regard to the circumstances under which it was destroyed.

Mr. BUCHANAN moved to lay the resolution on the table; which motion was agreed to.

Mr. BATES, from the Committee on Pensions, reported back, without amendment, the bill for the relief of Lyman N. Cook; which, on his motion, was taken up and considered as in committee of the whole, reported to the Senate, and finally passed.

Mr. SEVIER submitted the following resolution; which was read, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to ascertain, and report at the next session of Congress, the value and extent of the claims of the Western Cherokees upon the United States, growing out of their treaty stipulations.

On motion by Mr. GRAHAM, the Committee on Claims was discharged from the further consideration of the petition of the legal representatives of Patrick Gray and George Mayo.

Mr. MERRICK, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, reported back, without amendment, the joint resolution from the House authorizing the Postmaster General to settle with J. & P. Voorhees.

The bill for the relief of Boyd Reilly, authorizing the Secretaries of War and Navy to allow him compensation, not exceeding ten thousand dollars, for the use of his vapor-bath in the army and navy, was taken up for consideration, as in committee of the whole.

Mr. GRAHAM could not vote for an appropriation of $10,000 on an alleged invention. He gave notice that he would call for the yeas and nays on the passage of this bill.

Mr. MERRICK said the limitation was $10,000; but the Secretary of War and Secretary of the Navy might award only one or two thousand dollars, if the invention was worth no more.

Mr. YOUNG said the claim had increased every time it had come up, and that had been four or five times. He moved to amend the bill, by striking out $10,000, and inserting $5,000.

Mr. MERRICK opposed the amendment; and insisted that no one could tell the value of the invention till the subject was investigated, as proposed in the bill.

Mr. WILLIAMS urged that $5,000 would be an ample sum for the limitation.

Mr. SEVIER asked if it was the same bill which had passed the Senate so often before.

Mr. MERRICK said it was.

The question was taken on the amendment, and it was adopted.

The bill was then reported to the Senate, and read a third time.

On the question of the passage of the bill, Mr. GRAHAM called for the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. ALLEN said he would vote for the bill, because the public service had been enjoying the advantages of the invention.

Mr. LINN remarked, that ten years ago this bill had passed the Senate, after having undergone the scrutiny of a committee of doctors, of which he was one. He bore testimony to the invention being an admirable one, and to its having been found of the greatest service to the army and navy.

The bill was then passed—yeas 20 nays 9.

The bill for the relief of the Stockbridge tribe of Indians, in the Territory of Wisconsin, was taken up, and considered as in committee of the whole, reported to the Senate, and finally passed.

Mr. EVANS, from the Committee on Finance, reported back, with amendments, the bill making appropriation for the civil and diplomatic service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1844.

Mr. E. gave notice that he would at 2 o'clock ask the Senate to take up the above bill for consideration; and, on his motion, the amendments were ordered to be printed.

Mr. E said two bills had been returned from the House, with amendments. He moved that they be taken up. The motion was agreed to; and

The Senate then took up the bill making appropriation for the payment of naval pensions, which had been returned with a disagreeing vote to the amendment of the Senate striking out the sum of $16,000 for the satisfaction of pensions due under the navy pension law of 1837, which had been repealed in August, 1841.

Then, on motion by Mr. E., the Senate receded from its amendment.

The bill making appropriation for the support of the naval service for the half-calendar year ending in June 30, 1843, and the fiscal year ending in June 30, 1844. having been returned from the House with sundry amendments, and with a disagreeing vote to the amendment of the Senate on the subject of the erection of a floating dock at New York, was taken up for consideration. The amendments of the House were concurred in; and,

On motion by Mr GRAHAM, the Senate insisted on its amendment on the subject of the floating dock.

This bill was subsequently returned to the Senate—the House adhering to its disagreement to the Senate's amendment, and asking for a committee of conference; when,

On motion by Mr. EVANS, the President pro tem. was authorized to appoint three conferees on the part of the Senate, to take the disagreeing votes into consideration.

The resolution submitted by Mr. EVANS on yesterday, to suspend the 16th joint rule, for the purpose of permitting the bill to recharter the District banks; and the bill to refund to Massachusetts the balances due for disbursements during the late war with Great Britain; and several private bills, (to be sent to the other House,) was taken up for consideration.

Mr. ALLEN objected to the suspension of the rule, so far as it regarded the bill in to recharter the banks of the District of Columbia; and he, therefore, called for the yeas and nays on the adoption of the resolution.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the question was taken—yeas 22, nays 15. So the 16th joint rule was suspended.

Mr. BERRIEN, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back, without amendment, the House bill for the relief of Richard Sneed; which,

On motion of Mr. GRAHAM, was then taken up, as in committee of the whole; and, being considered, was reported to the Senate, and finally passed.

Mr. LINN submitted the following resolution; which lies on the table one day, under the rule, viz:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to the Senate, at the next session of Congress, such information as he may be able to procure respecting the foreign markets for provisions and breadstuffs, the products of the United States; the manner in which such markets are affected by the tariff and commercial regulations of different countries; the prospects and means of extending such markets; and any improvements that may be required in the preparation of such products for foreign consumption.

The unfinished business of yesterday was resumed—being the further consideration of the bill in relation to the exemplification of the records of land patents, and other evidences of title, and amendatory of the act entitled "An act to reorganize the General Land Office"—as in committee of the whole, on an amendment of the Committee on Public Lands, proposing to transfer the duties now performed by the secretary to the President, in signing patents, to the Recorder of the Land Office.

Mr. SMITH of Indiana wished the first two propositions of the amendment to be adopted—leaving that part in relation to the secretary to the President for the last question.

The first amendment was to strike out the preamble of the bill; which was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out the third section, and insert the substitute, repealing the act authorizing the appointment of a secretary to the President.

Mr. WALKER objected to the joint question of striking out the section and repealing a law.

Mr. SMITH of Indiana, to disembarrass the subject, would consent to make two questions of the amendment.

This not being in order, the amendment of the Committee on Public Lands was, by assent, rejected; and then

Mr. SMITH of Indiana moved, simply, to strike out the 3d section.

Mr. WALKER called for the yeas and nays on this question; which were ordered.

Mr. ALLEN opposed the proposition to strike out the third section, and pointed out the peculiar circumstances which called for its adoption.

Mr. SMITH of Indiana stated the views of the Committee on Public Lands, upon which they had come to the conclusion that this section should be stricken out.

Mr. ALLEN replied, showing that the difficulties of title to military lands on one side of the Scioto river prevented the improvement of the country, while, on the opposite side, where the titles are derived from patents of congressional lands, the highest state of cultivation and improvement prevails. This bill, in the form in which it came from the House, would effect the greatest benefits.

The subject was further discussed by Messrs. SMITH and ALLEN; when

Mr. EVANS gave notice, that if the question was to lead to further debate, he should move to lay it on the table.

The question was then taken on striking out the third section, and decided in the affirmative—yeas 27, nays 11.

Mr. SMITH now moved to insert the substitute of the Committee on Public Lands. He proposed that the question should be taken without debate.

The proposition was to dispense with the office of secretary to the President of the United States for signing patents, by transferring the duties to the office of the Recorder of Land Patents.

Mr. KING thought the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands ought to be satisfied with the amendment already made. He conceived it would be far more reasonable to abolish the office of Recorder in the Land Office, than that of secretary to the President. He suggested that the present state of things be left to continue till next session, and then let an examination be made so as to ascertain what office can be best dispensed with. He was opposed to this mode of legislating against an individual.

Mr. SMITH said this was not a proposition of the Committee on Public Lands alone, but had come from the House, which had recommended the provision in another bill, but it had been stricken out; and his object was to put it in this bill, to which it was more appropriate He thought the mere mechanical duty of signing patents was one of labor better suited to a laboring man than to a gentleman at large; for, of 52,000 patents sent for signature last year, 26,000 only were signed; and although the duties were not performed, nobody could expect that the President would remove his own son on a charge of neglect of duty.

Mr. MERRICK opposed this proposition at the present time, and entreated his friend [Mr. SMITH] to withdraw it.

Mr. BENTON was entirely opposed to the proposition. He stated the circumstances under which Congress had come to the determination that the President should have a member of his own household to sign patents. And as to the patents not being all signed during the last year, it should be recollected that other duties were to be performed; for Congress had been nearly two years in session.

Messrs WALKER, BERRIEN, BUCHANAN, and others, declared their opposition to the amendment.

The question was then taken, and the substitute was rejected, without a division.

The bill was reported to the Senate, the amendments made in committee were adopted, and the bill was read a third time and passed.

Mr. BARROW, from the Committee on Commerce, reported back, without amendment, the bill making the city of Lafayette, in Louisiana, a port of delivery.

Mr. EVANS, from the Committee on Finance, reported back, without amendment, the joint resolution in relation to certain property purchased for the United States in the city of Detroit.

Mr. WHITE presented a petition from citizens of the town of Franklin, in Indiana, praying for a reduction in the rates of postage; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

On motion by Mr. BAYARD, the Senate bill for the relief of certain officers of the late surveying and exploring expedition was taken up as in committee of the whole, considered, reported to the Senate, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

GEORGIA RESOLUTIONS.

Mr. CUTHBERT presented certain resolutions passed by the Legislature of Georgia on the 19th of December last; but which, in consequence of his long absence from Congress, (resulting from the bad state of his health,) he had not received when they were first transmitted to him; and which, consequently, it was not in his power to present till now. It would be seen, by the resolutions themselves, that he was instructed by his Legislature to lay them before the Senate of the United States.

The resolutions were then read; being the same heretofore published through the newspapers, condemnatory of the political course of the Hon. J. M. BERRIEN, one of the Senators of the United States from Georgia.

Mr. BERRIEN presented certain counter-resolutions, passed by an opposite portion of the Legislature, and other persons.

These resolutions were also read; being laudatory of Mr. BERRIEN'S political course.

Mr. CUTHBERT spoke, at considerable length, in justification of the general principles of the resolutions he had presented.

Mr. BERRIEN replied at equal length.

The discussion between the two Senators continued for some time, and will be hereafter published.

The motion to print, although not formally made on the presentation of the resolutions, was understood to be the pending question.

On inquiry by the CHAIR as to that understanding.

Mr. CUTHBERT said that such was his purpose; and he requested that it would be considered as if that motion had accompanied the presentation of the resolutions.

On the question of printing,

Mr. LINN called for the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

The vote was then taken, and resulted—yeas 21, nays 24, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Bagby, Benton, Buchanan, Calhoun, Cuthbert, Fulton, Henderson, King, Linn, McDuffie, McRoberts, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Sturgeon, Tappan, Walker, Wilcox, Williams, Woodbury, and Wright—21.

NAYS—Messrs. Archer, Barrow, Bates, Bayard, Choate, Clayton, Conrad, Crafts, Dayton, Evans, Graham, Huntington, Kerr, Merrick, Miller, Morehead, Phelps, Porter, Simmons, Smith of Indiana, Sprague, Tallmadge, White, and Woodbridge—24.

So the resolutions were not ordered to be printed.

THE TREATY OF WASHINGTON.

The House bill making provision for carrying out the treaty of Washington, lately made with Great Britain, was then taken up, as in committee of the whole.

Mr. BENTON said this scheme of the African of a floating dock at Brooklyn, New York, upon the plan preferred by the commissioners appointed for that purpose; and that the sum of one hundred thousand dollars be, and is hereby, appropriated for the construction of a floating dock at Pensacola, of capacity for the repair of frigates of the smaller class, upon such plan as the Secretary of the Navy shall approve.

Messrs. J. L. WHITE and McKEON offered amendments to the Senate's amendment; which were severally rejected, and copies of which could not be obtained.

Mr. ROOSEVELT offered an amendment, the effect of which was to insert $100,000 for a floating-dock at Pensacola, and to leave the appropriations for the dry-dock at Brooklyn on the same footing upon which they were placed by the act of last session.

The question was then taken on Mr. ROOSEVELT's amendment, and it was rejected.

The question was then taken on concurring in the amendment reported by the Committee on Naval Affairs, and decided in the negative.

The question then recurred on concurring in the amendment of the Senate, and it was decided in the affirmative—ayes 75, noes 68.

The question coming up on the amendment of the Senate, appropriating $5,000 for defraying the expenses of an agent authorized by the joint resolution of January, 1843—

Mr. STANLY offered an amendment to it, providing that the provisions, clothing, &c., of the navy shall be furnished upon contract, to the highest bidder, after advertisement for sealed proposals in the public papers.

Mr. PARMENTER offered a verbal amendment, which was accepted as a modification by Mr. STANLY.

The committee then rose, and reported the bill to the House.

Some conversation ensued between Messrs. FILLMORE, TILLINGHAST, WISE, FERRIS, and others, respecting the Brooklyn dry and floating-dock question; which was ultimately terminated by the previous question.

The report of the Committee of the Whole on the first amendment was concurred in.

On the second amendment, in relation to the Bureau of Provisions and Clothing, the question was put in the affirmative form, on a concurrence with the amendment of the Senate; and the vote—taken by Messrs MEDILL and T. J. CAMPBELL, as tellers—was 72 in the affirmative, and 66 in the negative. The effect of this vote is to leave this bureau as at present organized.

The third, fourth, and fifth amendments were concurred in.

The question was then taken on agreeing to the report of the Committee of the Whole, recommending a concurrence in the amendment of the Senate on the subject of the instructions in relation to dry-docks.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the result was—yeas 85, nays 89.

So the House refused to concur.

The next amendment of the Senate (verbal) was concurred in.

The amendment of the Senate providing for an agent on the subject of water rotted hemp, was also concurred in.

The bill was then returned to the Senate, and will there await the determination of that body to adhere or recede.

NAVY PENSIONS.

On motion of Mr. FILLMORE, the House took up the bill making appropriations for navy pensions, and concurred in the amendment of the Senate thereto.

The report of the Conference Committee on the disagreement in relation to the bill for the relief of James S. Calhoun, was taken up, and agreed to.

At 5 o'clock, Mr. WELLER moved an adjournment carried.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, March 2, 1843.

The reading of the journal having been dispensed with, the following engrossed bills were read the third time, and passed, viz:

Mr. SEVIER submitted the following resolution; which was read, and agreed to, as follows:

Mr. GRAHAM could not vote for an appropriation of $10,000 on an alleged invention. He gave notice that he would call for the yeas and nays on the passage of this bill.

Mr. MERRICK said the limitation was $10,000; but the Secretary of War and Secretary of the Navy might award only one or two thousand dollars, if the invention was worth no more.

Mr. YOUNG said the claim had increased every time it had come up, and that had been four or five times. He moved to amend the bill, by striking out $10,000, and inserting $5,000.

Mr. MERRICK opposed the amendment; and insisted that no one could tell the value of the invention till the subject was investigated, as proposed in the bill.

Mr. WILLIAMS urged that $5,000 would be an ample sum for the limitation.

Mr. SEVIER asked if it was the same bill which had passed the Senate so often before.

Mr. MERRICK said it was.

The question was taken on the amendment, and it was adopted.

The bill was then reported to the Senate, and read a third time.

On the question of the passage of the bill, Mr. GRAHAM called for the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. ALLEN said he would vote for the bill, because the public service had been enjoying the advantages of the invention.

Mr. LINN remarked, that ten years ago this bill had passed the Senate, after having undergone the scrutiny of a committee of doctors, of which he was one. He bore testimony to the invention being an admirable one, and to its having been found of the greatest service to the army and navy.

The bill was then passed—yeas 20 nays 9.

The bill for the relief of the Stockbridge tribe of Indians, in the Territory of Wisconsin, was taken up, and considered as in committee of the whole, reported to the Senate, and finally passed.

Mr. EVANS, from the Committee on Finance, reported back, with amendments, the bill making appropriation for the civil and diplomatic service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1844.

Mr. E. gave notice that he would at 2 o'clock ask the Senate to take up the above bill for consideration; and, on his motion, the amendments were ordered to be printed.

Mr. E said two bills had been returned from the House, with amendments. He moved that they be taken up. The motion was agreed to; and

The Senate then took up the bill making appropriation for the payment of naval pensions, which had been returned with a disagreeing vote to the amendment of the Senate striking out the sum of $16,000 for the satisfaction of pensions due under the navy pension law of 1837, which had been repealed in August, 1841.

Then, on motion by Mr. E., the Senate receded from its amendment.

The bill making appropriation for the support of the naval service for the half-calendar year ending in June 30, 1843, and the fiscal year ending in June 30, 1844. having been returned from the House with sundry amendments, and with a disagreeing vote to the amendment of the Senate on the subject of the erection of a floating dock at New York, was taken up for consideration. The amendments of the House were concurred in; and,

On motion by Mr GRAHAM, the Senate insisted on its amendment on the subject of the floating dock.

This bill was subsequently returned to the Senate—the House adhering to its disagreement to the Senate's amendment, and asking for a committee of conference; when,

On motion by Mr. EVANS, the President pro tem. was authorized to appoint three conferees on the part of the Senate, to take the disagreeing votes into consideration.

The resolution submitted by Mr. EVANS on yesterday, to suspend the 16th joint rule, for the purpose of permitting the bill to recharter the District banks; and the bill to refund to Massachusetts the balances due for disbursements during the late war with Great Britain; and several private bills, (to be sent to the other House,) was taken up for consideration.

Mr. ALLEN objected to the suspension of the rule, so far as it regarded the bill in to recharter the banks of the District of Columbia; and he, therefore, called for the yeas and nays on the adoption of the resolution.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the question was taken—yeas 22, nays 15. So the 16th joint rule was suspended.

Mr. BERRIEN, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back, without amendment, the House bill for the relief of Richard Sneed; which,

On motion of Mr. GRAHAM, was then taken up, as in committee of the whole; and, being considered, was reported to the Senate, and finally passed.

Mr. LINN submitted the following resolution; which lies on the table one day, under the rule, viz:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to the Senate, at the next session of Congress, such information as he may be able to procure respecting the foreign markets for provisions and breadstuffs, the products of the United States; the manner in which such markets are affected by the tariff and commercial regulations of different countries; the prospects and means of extending such markets; and any improvements that may be required in the preparation of such products for foreign consumption.

The unfinished business of yesterday was resumed—being the further consideration of the bill in relation to the exemplification of the records of land patents, and other evidences of title, and amendatory of the act entitled "An act to reorganize the General Land Office"—as in committee of the whole, on an amendment of the Committee on Public Lands, proposing to transfer the duties now performed by the secretary to the President, in signing patents, to the Recorder of the Land Office.

Mr. SMITH of Indiana wished the first two propositions of the amendment to be adopted—leaving that part in relation to the secretary to the President for the last question.

The first amendment was to strike out the preamble of the bill; which was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out the third section, and insert the substitute, repealing the act authorizing the appointment of a secretary to the President.

Mr. WALKER objected to the joint question of striking out the section and repealing a law.

Mr. SMITH of Indiana, to disembarrass the subject, would consent to make two questions of the amendment.

This not being in order, the amendment of the Committee on Public Lands was, by assent, rejected; and then

Mr. SMITH of Indiana moved, simply, to strike out the 3d section.

Mr. WALKER called for the yeas and nays on this question; which were ordered.

Mr. ALLEN opposed the proposition to strike out the third section, and pointed out the peculiar circumstances which called for its adoption.

Mr. SMITH of Indiana stated the views of the Committee on Public Lands, upon which they had come to the conclusion that this section should be stricken out.

Mr. ALLEN replied, showing that the difficulties of title to military lands on one side of the Scioto river prevented the improvement of the country, while, on the opposite side, where the titles are derived from patents of congressional lands, the highest state of cultivation and improvement prevails. This bill, in the form in which it came from the House, would effect the greatest benefits.

The subject was further discussed by Messrs. SMITH and ALLEN; when

Mr. EVANS gave notice, that if the question was to lead to further debate, he should move to lay it on the table.

The question was then taken on striking out the third section, and decided in the affirmative—yeas 27, nays 11.

Mr. SMITH now moved to insert the substitute of the Committee on Public Lands. He proposed that the question should be taken without debate.

The proposition was to dispense with the office of secretary to the President of the United States for signing patents, by transferring the duties to the office of the Recorder of Land Patents.

Mr. KING thought the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands ought to be satisfied with the amendment already made. He conceived it would be far more reasonable to abolish the office of Recorder in the Land Office, than that of secretary to the President. He suggested that the present state of things be left to continue till next session, and then let an examination be made so as to ascertain what office can be best dispensed with. He was opposed to this mode of legislating against an individual.

Mr. SMITH said this was not a proposition of the Committee on Public Lands alone, but had come from the House, which had recommended the provision in another bill, but it had been stricken out; and his object was to put it in this bill, to which it was more appropriate He thought the mere mechanical duty of signing patents was one of labor better suited to a laboring man than to a gentleman at large; for, of 52,000 patents sent for signature last year, 26,000 only were signed; and although the duties were not performed, nobody could expect that the President would remove his own son on a charge of neglect of duty.

Mr. MERRICK opposed this proposition at the present time, and entreated his friend [Mr. SMITH] to withdraw it.

Mr. BENTON was entirely opposed to the proposition. He stated the circumstances under which Congress had come to the determination that the President should have a member of his own household to sign patents. And as to the patents not being all signed during the last year, it should be recollected that other duties were to be performed; for Congress had been nearly two years in session.

Messrs WALKER, BERRIEN, BUCHANAN, and others, declared their opposition to the amendment.

The question was then taken, and the substitute was rejected, without a division.

The bill was reported to the Senate, the amendments made in committee were adopted, and the bill was read a third time and passed.

Mr. BARROW, from the Committee on Commerce, reported back, without amendment, the bill making the city of Lafayette, in Louisiana, a port of delivery.

Mr. EVANS, from the Committee on Finance, reported back, without amendment, the joint resolution in relation to certain property purchased for the United States in the city of Detroit.

Mr. WHITE presented a petition from citizens of the town of Franklin, in Indiana, praying for a reduction in the rates of postage; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

On motion by Mr. BAYARD, the Senate bill for the relief of certain officers of the late surveying and exploring expedition was taken up as in committee of the whole, considered, reported to the Senate, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

GEORGIA RESOLUTIONS.

Mr. CUTHBERT presented certain resolutions passed by the Legislature of Georgia on the 19th of December last; but which, in consequence of his long absence from Congress, (resulting from the bad state of his health,) he had not received when they were first transmitted to him; and which, consequently, it was not in his power to present till now. It would be seen, by the resolutions themselves, that he was instructed by his Legislature to lay them before the Senate of the United States.

The resolutions were then read; being the same heretofore published through the newspapers, condemnatory of the political course of the Hon. J. M. BERRIEN, one of the Senators of the United States from Georgia.

Mr. BERRIEN presented certain counter-resolutions, passed by an opposite portion of the Legislature, and other persons.

These resolutions were also read; being laudatory of Mr. BERRIEN's political course.

Mr. CUTHBERT spoke, at considerable length, in justification of the general principles of the resolutions he had presented.

Mr. BERRIEN replied at equal length.

The discussion between the two Senators continued for some time, and will be hereafter published.

The motion to print, although not formally made on the presentation of the resolutions, was understood to be the pending question.

On inquiry by the CHAIR as to that understanding.

Mr. CUTHBERT said that such was his purpose; and he requested that it would be considered as if that motion had accompanied the presentation of the resolutions.

On the question of printing,

Mr. LINN called for the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

The vote was then taken, and resulted—yeas 21, nays 24, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Bagby, Benton, Buchanan, Calhoun, Cuthbert, Fulton, Henderson, King, Linn, McDuffie, McRoberts, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Sturgeon, Tappan, Walker, Wilcox, Williams, Woodbury, and Wright—21.

NAYS—Messrs. Archer, Barrow, Bates, Bayard, Choate, Clayton, Conrad, Crafts, Dayton, Evans, Graham, Huntington, Kerr, Merrick, Miller, Morehead, Phelps, Porter, Simmons, Smith of Indiana, Sprague, Tallmadge, White, and Woodbridge—24.

So the resolutions were not ordered to be printed.

THE TREATY OF WASHINGTON.

The House bill making provision for carrying out the treaty of Washington, lately made with Great Britain, was then taken up, as in committee of the whole.

Mr. BENTON said this scheme of the African squadron became worse and worse. Every step taken in it is a new blunder. Commenced in violation of the Constitution, as he believed—in violation of the policy of the country—contradicted in its essential meaning by Sir Robert Peel—already pregnant with the seeds of war;—here, in addition to all this, is an indefinite appropriation for its support. Specific appropriations are the policy of our Government—one of the great reforms introduced by Mr. Jefferson. Before Mr. Jefferson's time, appropriations were made in mass for different branches of service; and the administration applied, more or less, to different branches. This was a source of abuse, which the change of parties in 1800 corrected. Specific appropriations were then introduced, and have been adhered to since, until now, when a great departure from it is attempted. The naval appropriation for the year is large: eight millions were asked by the Secretary. I do not know exactly how much has been granted.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Maine said six millions.

Mr. BENTON. Very well. Six millions! and out of this, the Secretary of the Navy is to take what he pleases for the African squadron. To this I object. I want a specific sum named, according to the safe practice and laudable reform introduced by Mr. Jefferson. We have three services for our navy—a home service for a home squadron; an African squadron for suppressing the slave-trade; and the protection of commerce by the navy generally. Here are three different services, and each should have its own appropriation—so much for the home squadron, so much for the African, and so much for the rest of the navy. The present indefinite appropriation violates this rule, and enables the Secretary to confound expenditures, and to hide the real expense of the African squadron. He is to take what he pleases out of six millions; and there is no way to ascertain how much he takes. In fact, he may send the whole navy there, and make this business of negro hunting on the coast of Africa cost us six millions of dollars per annum. It is an extravagant supposition that he will do so; but it will be bad enough if he takes any large part of it; and, with a policy which could originate such a squadron, there is no knowing what extravagance will ensue.

Mr. B. was more and more opposed to this squadron. He considered it unconstitutional. He believed the treaty-making power had no right to dispose of our navy by a treaty with a foreign nation; that the army and the navy were in the hands of Congress—the two Houses of Congress—and could not be taken out of their hands by the treaty-making power. Upon the principles of this treaty, the President and Senate, and any foreign nation, may take the whole navy out of the hands of Congress, and bind it for any number of years to any foreign service; and even for objects moral, and not political.

Mr. B. was against the policy of this squadron. It was a violation of the established policy of the Government. No entangling alliances; no quitting our own, to stand on foreign ground. Such were the words of Washington—such the obvious interest of the country. For fifty years we had refused these alliances. In 1834 President Jackson most formally rejected the very one which is now agreed to. In that year the British minister at Washington (Sir Charles Vaughan) pressed this very convention upon us. President Jackson directed Mr. Forsyth to refuse it, and to declare "that the determination of the Government was definitively formed, not to enter into any convention on the subject." In 1840 Mr. Van Buren instantly rejected the arrangement made on this subject by a British and an American naval officer. Until 1842, under all administrations, the policy of the country was inexorable—to have none of these foreign connexions: in that year this policy was departed from. The very convention was made which President Jackson, in 1834, had pointedly refused; and already we see the evils of such a departure from a wise policy. Besides this indefinite appropriation of money, we have dissension about the treaty itself. The British Government construes it one way: we construe it another; and the President, in his message to the House of Representatives, evidently construes it both ways; and then contemplates a contingency in which he may see it necessary that the Government shall send its whole naval force to Africa! Very much like war, this! And a fine commentary on the peace treaty! Its very authors already speaking of a contingency which may arise under it, and which may send our navy to Africa, to protect our vessels there from British visitation.

Mr. B. said there were other things in the bill to which he should not object. So far as it provided for carrying into effect all that came within the scope of the treaty-making power, he should make no objection, much as he disliked the treaty. But this provision for the squadron he held to be unconstitutional, and a gross and fatal departure from the wise and old-established policy of the country. To this part he objected, and should take all proper occasions to manifest his opposition to it. The session was now expiring; much business was pressing. He could not make a speech; but he could not lose the opportunity of placing himself fully and unequivocally before the country as utterly opposed to this African squadron—a squadron which, besides entangling us in a foreign alliance, involves a vast expenditure of money, and sends the tenth part of our navy to Africa at a time when we are denying appropriate defence to the West—dismounting our dragoons on the frontiers of Missouri and Arkansas, and retrenching 12½ per cent. from the pay of officers whose whole pay is now barely adequate to the support of themselves and families.

Mr. ALLEN submitted an amendment, to come in at the end of the 6th section, to the effect that the sum to be applied to the support of the squadron on the coast of Africa shall not exceed $240,000. Mr. A. said that this amount was the same as the estimates of the department.

Mr. ARCHER said the Senator from Missouri [Mr. BENTON] had acted in perfect good faith with the assurances which he gave on yesterday—that he would consume but a few moments in the discussion of this bill. That was the reason which induced him to abstain from making any reply to the remarks of that Senator, except as to one point—that this bill appropriated an amount in gross, subject to be applied in the discretion of the Executive. He (Mr. A.) contended that there was no violation of the usual practice in this case; the appropriation was necessarily subject to be applied according to the discretion of the Executive. As to striking out the 6th clause of the bill, he had no objection to it whatever; for he considered the provision contained in that clause to be wholly unnecessary. There was no specific provision requisite, in order to give to the Executive the power of making the application of the sum necessary to carry the provisions of the treaty into effect.

Mr. CALHOUN said there was no specific appropriation, because no additional expense was added to the existing expenses of the navy. If no treaty had been made, the same difficulty would exist with regard to the right of visitation. The treaty had not created the difficulty; it had grown out of other subjects; and if a war should hereafter take place, in consequence of the British insisting upon the right of visitation, so far from the treaty being responsible for producing it, we would be, in consequence of the existence of the treaty, in an infinitely better position than before; because we would then have not only the law of nations in our favor, but that which was infinitely stronger, and which could not fail to command the sympathies of the world—the express stipulations of a treaty. He believed the interpretation put upon it by the President was the true interpretation. He would not consume the time of the Senate upon this matter. He did not think there was the slightest necessity for the amendment; and he would, therefore, vote against it.

Mr. ALLEN said he thought it right and proper that the American people should know something about the additional expense which would be entailed upon this Government by the treaty. Under the present bill, the Executive might go on and appropriate ten millions of dollars. It was for this reason he was desirous of fixing upon a specific sum; for, unless some limit were given to the expenditure in this way, it could never be ascertained how much expense the treaty had entailed upon the Government. He asked for the yeas and nays upon the motion.

Mr. EVANS said if the gentleman would refer to the report of the Secretary of the Navy, he would find that no additional expense was to be incurred; a change of destination for a part of the gross amount was all that would be required.

Mr. ALLEN said he believed it was not customary to put the whole number of the vessels composing the American navy into commission at once, during a time of peace.

The allegation of the Senator from Maine, was, that the same number of ships would be employed without the treaty as with it. One of two things must, then, be the case: either that too few ships had heretofore been employed—[Mr. EVANS. That is it]—or else that a greater number than was necessary were to have been commissioned without reference to the treaty.

Mr. CALHOUN said that the object of the Senator from Ohio now turned out to be, to ascertain the additional expense which this country would be subjected to, in consequence of the treaty. He submitted, in all candor, to that Senator, whether there would be any additional expense, as it was requisite, at all events, to have a large force upon the coast of Africa; and whether the whole expense of that force was to be attributable to the existence of the treaty. And he would submit to the Senator a still stronger question. The Senator was aware of the existing state of things in this country; and he was also aware that Great Britain had acquired the right of visitation and supervision partly by our own agency and example. We had, ourselves, induced her to take the course she had. We were the first to condemn the African slave-trade; and yet it was well known that all slavers were in the habit of making fraudulent use of our flag. He submitted, then, whether, upon considerations of honor and duty, we were not bound to send vessels to that coast, to prevent such abuses; and whether the charge incurred for that purpose should be attributed to the treaty.

Mr. ALLEN observed that, if the Senator's argument was good, there was no occasion for us to enter into a treaty at all; and its only effect would be to place ourselves under an obligation to do that which we were bound to do before. But he had yet to learn that there was a necessity for keeping one-tenth of our fleet upon the coast of Africa. He would undertake to say that the expenses incurred by reason of the treaty would more than quadruple the expense which without it, would have been requisite for that branch of the public service. He was opposed to that article of the treaty upon higher grounds. Great Britain possessed the greatest maritime power of any nation upon earth; she had twenty guns to our one; she was, consequently, by this arrangement, disposing of one-tenth of our naval force, and, to that extent, weakening our power. Eighty guns, to us, were something; to her, nothing. This was a very important consideration, independently of the enormous increase of expense.

Mr. ARCHER entreated the Senator from South Carolina not to persist in raising a general debate upon the subject of the treaty; and he appealed—and he thought his appeal would not be in vain—to the Senator from Ohio, whose motion had given rise to this discussion, to forbear protracting the debate at this time. A single word would suffice to dismiss the whole subject. The question whether it was our policy to have a certain number of guns upon the African coast, could not now by possibility arise—and why? Because we were bound by treaty stipulations. Whether expedient or not, we were bound to employ that particular number for the next five years, in the suppression of the slave-trade. He submitted to the honorable Senator from Ohio, whether he desired to be instrumental—no matter whether he deemed the force too great or not—in involving this country in the commission of a breach of public faith? That honorable Senator, and the Senator from Missouri, seemed to regard the sixth clause of this bill as something extraordinary. And he confessed that he himself regarded it as an extraordinary proposition, that a portion of the naval force of the country should receive its destination from Congress. Congress might, with equal propriety, indicate what force should be sent to the Pacific, and what to the Mediterranean. Who ever heard before that this was a part of the duty of Congress? Was Congress to engross everything—to dictate everything? No: this had not been the practice of the Government of the United States. It was a matter which ought to be left to the Executive—and why? The reason was very obvious: because at one part of the year a greater force might be required at a given place, than at another part of the same year.

Mr. CALHOUN said the Senator had admonished him—

[Mr. ARCHER. Not admonish, but request.] —not to go into the debate. There was no necessity for the admonition; for he did not intend even to be driven into a general discussion. He had one word, however, to say to the Senator from Ohio, in justice to himself, and to those who thought with him upon this subject; and it was, that when the Senator proposed to show what expense should be incurred, he ought to be prepared to show what force was necessary. It appeared that the Senator was not prepared; and, therefore, there would be a fallacy, to some extent—and, in his opinion, to a great extent—if the particular amount specified by the Senator should be fixed upon.

Mr. RIVES said the amendment ought not to prevail, because it is utterly inconsistent with the provision that eighty guns should be kept afloat on the coast of Africa. A proviso to the sixth section of the bill, that the expense of the African squadron shall not exceed $240,000, would amount to a prohibition of carrying out the express stipulation of the treaty in that particular. One of the important objections made by the Senator from Missouri, was that, by force of treaty, this Government undertakes to settle how the public armed force shall be employed—a power which the Senator denies to belong to the treaty-making power. But the sixth section of this bill shows that this power is effectually checked by the legislative action necessary to its approval. Mr. R. enlarged upon this view, and proceeded at considerable length to review the circumstances under which this compact with the British Government became the best and only policy which the Government of the United States could adopt. He expressed his firm conviction that the British cruisers, let what will be said in or out of Parliament, will not, pending this treaty, attempt to interfere with American vessels; and that there will be no exercise of the right of visitation on the coast of Africa, heretofore asserted by Great Britain. He, for one, denied—what he was sorry to find the President of the United States had been betrayed into the admission of, in his message—that Great Britain could have any right of visitation; for he maintained that an entry on board an American vessel, even under the circumstances here supposed—whether under the name of visit or search—would be, in the eye of the law of nations, a trespass, involving a legal responsibility for the act in every case; that the measure of that responsibility might be mitigated and extenuated, according to circumstances; but that in no case could a right—far less a "perfect" right—be recognised, on the part of a foreign cruiser, to enter on board an American vessel on the high seas, in time of peace, to ascertain her nationality or character by an examination of her papers, &c., or for any other purpose; that the deck of an American vessel should be held as inviolable as the precincts of the national territory; that a British cruiser, suspecting a vessel sailing under the flag of the United States to be a pirate or slave-trader of some power which had conceded the right of search, might, upon her responsibility, enter on board such vessel, but she would do so at her peril; and, if the vessel turned out to be a bona fide American vessel, an act will have been committed, drawing after it all the legal consequences of a trespass, for which indemnity and redress, corresponding to the circumstances of the case, would be due. The position which he sought to establish—and which he thought it of the highest importance to maintain, both in regard to the consistency and integrity of the maritime code, and for the practical security of national independence—is, that there is no right, on the part of a British cruiser, in any case, to enter the deck of an American vessel on the high seas in time of peace; and that whatever circumstances of suspicion, real or imaginary, "felt or feigned," may lead to it, as soon as the vessel thus entered and detained on the highway of nations is discovered to be a bona fide American vessel, a legal responsibility for the act as a trespass accrues. If this responsibility be admitted, (as it would seem to be in the later communications of the British Government,) the very admission nullifies the alleged right, and reduces it to a solecism in language. He hoped and believed effectual steps would be taken between this Government and Great Britain to guard against any inference of a conceded right of visitation to be drawn from the incautious admission in the President's message.

The sixth section of this bill was particularly commended to him, as recognising the principle that legislative concurrence was indispensable to the treaty making power, by giving Congress a veto, through the exercise of its right of making appropriations, in withholding the means of carrying out a treaty improperly made.

Mr. EVANS said it was his purpose to move a recess as soon as this question was disposed of. He appealed to Senators on both sides to abstain from debate, in consideration of the arrear of business on the calendar.

Mr. RIVES protested against the lecture of the Senator from Maine. He had heretofore abstained from the expression of his opinions, and did hope that, situated as he had been, he would have been allowed half an hour for presenting his views.

Mr. ARCHER renewed his appeal to the Senate, and particularly to the Senator from Ohio, to let the question be taken on the pending amendment.

Mr. ALLEN modified his amendment, by making the sum $281,000.

The amendment was negatived without a division.

The bill was then reported back to the Senate.

Mr. KING had listened with great pleasure to the remarks of the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. RIVES,] particularly with regard to the denunciation of the British claim to the right of visitation. He wished to know of the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations whether that portion of the President's message relating to the right of visitation, as regards suspected piracy, is correctly given in the printed copies of the message; and if so, what was the exact understanding of the principle.

Mr. ARCHER replied that he understood the law of nations to relate to piracy proper—not the piracy of the slave-trade.

Mr. LINN made allusion to a particular instance of supposed piracy in the slave-trade, in which an acknowledged outrage had been committed on an American vessel. And with regard to the harshness of language indulged in by American legislators against Great Britain, he asked did it not arise out of the fact that Great Britain was always the aggressor against the rights of the United States, and therefore the language of resentment was natural. He asked what reparation had been provided for the outrages on American vessels.

The bill was then read a third time, and passed.

Mr. WRIGHT asked the Senate to take up the bill in relation to the steamboat law. He proposed a modification of the Senate's amendment, which would reconcile all difficulties between the two Houses.

The modification was adopted, and the bill was read the third time and passed.

Mr. EVANS moved to take a recess till six o'clock.

Mr. MERRICK objected.

Mr. McDUFFIE asked whether experience had not satisfied him that, after dinner, gentlemen would be more disposed to make long speeches than before it.

Mr. EVANS replied that he never made long speeches at a period of the session calling for action rather than debate.

The question was then taken on the motion of Mr. EVANS, and the Senate took a recess till six o'clock.

EVENING SESSION—6½ o'clock, p. m.

The Senate resumed its session.

The CHAIR informed the Senate that a joint resolution had just been presented from the House, explanatory of the act for the relief of Thomas King. It was the opinion of the Chair that the joint resolution could not be received without a suspension, by the House, of the 16th joint rule, which prohibits the sending from either House to the other any bill or resolution originating within the last three days of the session.

Mr. KING said it would be necessary to return the resolution to the House.

Mr. SEVIER said it was a bill merely to correct an error in the phraseology of a law, which passed this session; and he hoped, by unanimous consent, the Senate would agree to receive it.

Mr. KING replied that the Senate could not receive it by unanimous consent. The rule was imperative. It made no difference what the character of the bill was. Though the bill was unimportant, the principle involved was the same. He moved that the Secretary of the Senate be directed to return the joint resolution to the House, accompanied by a message, expressing the opinion of the Senate that it could not be received unless by a suspension, on the part of the House, of the joint rule. The order was agreed to.

The Senate bill, fixing by computation the value, at the custom-house, of certain German and other foreign coins, having been returned from the House with sundry amendments, was taken up for consideration; and, after a few remarks by Mr. EVANS, those amendments were concurred in.

The joint resolution reducing the rates of postage, having been returned from the House with sundry amendments, was taken up for consideration; when

Mr. MERRICK said, during the recess of the Senate he took that opportunity to examine the amendments of the House; and it was his opinion, upon such an examination, that the Senate could not, with propriety, concur in them. The bill which passed the Senate, fixed the rate to the Federal coin, and graduated it according to distances throughout the Union; but the amendments of the House proposed to strike out these provisions of the Senate bill, and to substitute a provision regulating the postage according to weight; a provision which he believed would be destructive of the revenues of the department. He moved that the Senate disagree to the amendments of the House.

The Senate disagreed, and the bill was returned.

Mr. LINN submitted the following resolution; which lies one day on the table:

Resolved, That the report of Lieutenant Freemont, of the Topographical Engineers, be printed, for the use of the Senate, and the map and drawings engraved; and that —— thousand extra copies be printed; and that the work be done under the revision and correction of the Topographical Bureau, and each extra copy be covered with stout colored paper; and that one hundred copies be delivered to the Topographical Bureau, for distribution.

Mr. WALKER submitted the following resolution, which lies over one day:

Resolved, That there be printed, under the authority of the Topographical Bureau, three hundred copies of the large outline map of Mr. Nicolet's geographical exploration west of the Mississippi river; and fifteen hundred copies of the same map, reduced to a convenient and suitable size, with the topographical details, to accompany the report, or descriptive memoir, of the country which it is intended to illustrate.

Mr. MERRICK expressed a wish that the Senate would proceed to the consideration of executive business; to which the Senate refused to yield.

On motion by Mr. EVANS, the Senate proceeded to consider, as in committee of the whole, the bill from the House to authorize the reissue of treasury notes, and for other purposes.

The question pending being the following amendment proposed by the Committee on Finance, viz:

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That, in lieu of issuing the treasury notes in the manner authorized by the first section of this act, the President, (if, in his opinion, it shall be for the interest of the United States so to do,) may cause any of said notes now outstanding to be redeemed and cancelled as they become due, if the Secretary of the Treasury cannot redeem them out of the funds in the treasury, by an issue of stock of the United States for the amount thus redeemed, in the same form, for the same time, and under the same restrictions, limitations, and provisions, as are contained in an act approved April fifteen, eighteen hundred and forty-two, entitled "An act for the extension of the loan of eighteen hundred and forty-one, and for an addition of five millions of dollars thereto, and for allowing interest on treasury notes due," except that no commissions shall be allowed or paid for the negotiation of such business.

Mr. EVANS said that the Senate were aware that there were now outstanding something like eleven and a half millions of treasury notes. Of that amount, near $4,000,000, according to his recollection, were due on presentment at the department; and the holders might at any moment present them and demand payment; and the residue (about $7,000,000) would fall due within the year. In fact, he might say that the whole $11,000 000 were payable this year. There was nothing which prevented the presentation of those notes to the department now, but the resolution of last session authorizing the payment of interest until they were redeemed. It was obvious that, if gentlemen would look at the state of the treasury, they would see that it was utterly impossible to redeem this year any part of the outstanding treasury notes, and, at the same time, to carry on the operations of the treasury. Near $3,500,000 of those notes were not on interest after they become due, but the rest were. Congress did not provide that interest should continue until the redemption of those three and a half millions. The object to be effected by the amendment was to place those treasury notes now falling due on the same foundation as the previous issues—that was, that as long as they were outstanding, they should be entitled to interest. The very moment those notes cease to bear interest, he could assure gentlemen they would be returned upon the treasury. The object, therefore, was to continue those three and a half millions on the same footing that the previous issues were. The Committee on Finance had agreed on the propriety of the amendment pending; so that, if the Secretary could not redeem the notes as they fall due, out of the means at his command, during the present year, he could exercise the discretion whether he would take them up, or fund them under the limitations of the act of 1842—which limitations were all calculated to guard the treasury. The committee had examined this matter with as much deliberation as they could; and they believed that it was expedient and proper, instead of issuing new treasury notes, to leave the discretion to the Secretary either to fund those outstanding, or not, as he might think best under the circumstances. If gentlemen would look at the matter, they could not expect that the treasury would be able to redeem $11,000,000 of notes outstanding, and carry on its operations, out of the means for the year. The true question was, in fact, whether they could get along even without the redemption of any of the notes. It was as much as they could do to meet the ordinary expenditures of the Government from the accruing revenue. Mr. E then went on to show what would be the receipts for the year. The passage of this bill would not increase the public debt.

There was no mode of increasing it, unless Congress authorized it. The Senator on the other side, [Mr. McDuffie,] the other day, without looking at this matter, told the Senate that the public debt was $30,000,000, and was rapidly going up to $40,000,000; and that, before the end of the year, it would be $40,000,000. He (Mr. E.) desired to say that it was utterly impossible that there could be such an increase, unless the Senate and this Congress authorized it. Therefore, he could say that there was an outstanding debt of $25,000,000 only; of which $11,000,000 were treasury notes, and the rest the loans which had been authorized at the last and preceding sessions of Congress. Mr. E. went on still further in an argument, to show that it was utterly out of the power of the Government, either in the year 1843 or 1844, to redeem those $11,000,000 of treasury notes, and also the $5,000,000 loan, which would fall due before 1845. The committee, therefore, proposed now to restore the 3½ millions of treasury notes to the former loan, of which it was, in fact, a part—that amount of treasury notes having been issued in lieu of the loan.

Mr. BENTON made some remarks, which were not distinctly heard, but to which

Mr. EVANS replied, showing what would be the condition of the treasury at the end of the year. He differed, not only with the conjectural estimates of the department, but with the opinion of the Ways and Means Committee of the other House. He believed that the revenue from customs would be $15,000,000; and he would not be surprised if it should go up to $17,000,000, instead of $13,000,000, as supposed. He greatly feared that the revenue would be too large—not for the wants of the treasury, but for the good of the country. His opinion was founded upon the fact, that there was a superabundance of money in the great commercial emporium (New York) seeking investment. He feared that that superabundance would lead to improper speculation, and would cause to be brought into the country more goods than were necessary for proper and ordinary consumption.

Mr. BUCHANAN understood that the whole effect of the bill would be to enable the Secretary of the Treasury to fund so much of the outstanding treasury notes as the necessities of the treasury might require. They must either do that, or create a cause for assembling an extra session, which he believed to be one of the greatest curses that could befall the country. He preferred the alternative of conferring power to fund the treasury notes.

Mr. KING inquired of the Senator from Maine [Mr. Evans] whether, if they funded the notes, there would be any limitation as to the time—whether they would be redeemed at the pleasure of the holder, or the option of the Government.

Mr. EVANS said they would be funded on the same conditions, and on the same time, as was provided for in the loan law.

Mr. WOODBURY next took the floor, and made an elaborate and very able speech (which will be published hereafter) showing the absolute necessity of making some provision to enable the Secretary of the Treasury to meet the demands upon the treasury for the year. He showed that, with all the anticipated means, both from lands and customs, it would be utterly impossible to redeem any of the treasury notes now falling due. The only question with him, then, was, whether they should go on and authorize a reissue of the notes falling due, or leave the discretionary power with the Secretary to fund so much of the notes as was necessary to keep the wheels of the treasury in operation. He was opposed to the re-issue, for two reasons: one was, that it was not so economical as funding the notes; and the other was, that it gave too much countenance to the idea of a Government paper circulation. He could only justify the issue of treasury notes as a means of anticipating the revenue, to meet the pressing demands on the treasury. He much preferred a loan to a resort to treasury notes.

Mr. W. then went on to show that the revenue anticipated for the year, according to the Secretary's own showing, would be totally inadequate to supply the treasury, and to prevent a new accumulation of debt. He believed that the income had been overrated. Mr. W. then went on to show to what extent the debt had accumulated under the Whig administration of the Government. He adverted to the resolutions introduced by the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. Clay,] before he retired from the Senate, which set forth the declaration, that it was the duty of the Government to provide within the year the means for carrying on the Government for the year; and maintained that the present majority of Congress, instead of complying with that declaration of duty, had widely departed from it; that they had permitted the debt to go on accumulating from year to year, by millions. He saw no mode of providing within the year the means to carry on the Government during the year, except by having a proper revenue tariff, and by resorting to the wise system of legislation (which the present party in power should have resorted to) of bringing down the expenses of Government to the income of the Government.

Mr. CRITTENDEN said the Senator seemed to be exceedingly indignant with something. What was it? The amendment, or the bill?

Mr. WOODBURY observed that, so far from that, he was in favor of the amendment.

Mr. EVANS asked what, then, was the Senator doing but scolding him, (Mr. E.,) or somebody, for introducing an amendment which he is going to vote for? He (Mr. E.) was really ashamed to find himself called upon to explain for the fourth or fifth time, in vain, the extent of the debt, the estimates of the revenue, and the fact that the treasury notes to be met are only re-issues of the very treasury notes which the Senator himself either originated or sanctioned.

The Senator says he agrees with him (Mr. E.) on all the essential points of the bill. Why, then, consume time in debate? The Senator wants to see and examine a mass of figures, and to make calculations; but to what purpose? Now, if it was to prove there would be only seven millions of revenue for the year, he (Mr. E.) would make a prediction the reverse of the Senator's—he would say that the revenue of the year would be $15,000,000; he would go further, he would say $17,000,000. The imports of February are coming up—those of March will be more. If gentlemen want to make the revenue fail, they have only to keep making their predictions, and promising that they will repeal the tariff bill, and every other measure of this Congress, on the first day of next session. If they succeed in persuading importers that they will bring down duties by the 1st of January next, these importers will hold off from ordering importations, and the gentlemen can succeed in breaking down the treasury, and thereby verify their predictions. Let this tariff stand but two years, and it will be proved that the revenue can effectually carry on the Government.

The Government complaint of this moment is, the embarrassment occasioned by cash duties.

Money is exceedingly plenty. The banks in New York have nine millions of specie in their vaults; they cannot lend it out safely at even 5 per cent. It is now going into the commerce of the country. The danger is, that, for the last quarter of this year, the imports will be too large—not for the treasury, but for the interests of the country. He verily believed the whole revenue of the year would exceed $15,000,000. He knew there were counteracting causes; a reduction on the price of the great staple, cotton, for instance. But he expected the price would revive.

Large importations of specie had been coming in during the last year. This cannot continue long; goods must come in instead of specie.

The opinion of the best informed merchants in Boston and New York is, that the imports of the last quarter of the year will be such as to give $15,000,000 of revenue for the year.

The Senator thought he discovered some want of information or concealment in the estimates of the revenue. He referred to reports from the Treasury Department, wherein a difference in the estimates appeared. This arose out of goods being stored, which did not pay duties on the arrival, but did in sixty days. On this account, the estimate, in one of those instances, embraced the receipts of revenue, including half a million from a former quarter; and "accruing revenue" meant the revenue of the quarter on the importations of the quarter.

Mr. WOODBURY would make a short explanation, not intending to make a speech, or to scold the Senator from Maine, as he supposed. As to the Senator's allusion to his administration of the treasury: was it not the fact, that all the treasury notes outstanding when he left the treasury amounted only to $5,500,000?

Mr. EVANS. Did not the Senator recommend and assent to the issue of five and a half millions more?

Mr. WOODBURY replied that he had assented to the issue of five and a half millions of new treasury notes, to take up the old ones.

Mr. EVANS. No, sir; no. Five and a half millions of a new issue, to supply the treasury.

Mr. WOODBURY assured the Senator he was mistaken. Mr. W. then explained the matter at large.

Mr. BUCHANAN begged that the question would be allowed to be taken. The Senator from South Carolina had said, before the recess, that there was danger of gentlemen being more eloquent after dinner than before it. He (Mr. B.) believed his prediction was about to be verified. His friend from New Hampshire and his friend from Maine had enlightened the Senate with disquisitions on tariff, revenue, treasury notes, and other things, while no question was pending; for all agreed to vote for the amendment. Now, with the heavy calendar yet to be disposed of, and the long list of nominations to be considered in executive session, he asked, was it proper to be disposing of the last few hours of the session in useless disquisitions? He went for action—action—action!

Mr. CALHOUN made some remarks, concurring in the views expressed by the chairman of the Committee on Finance, that the revenues would be, in all probability, largely increased before the end of the year. He grounded his belief on the amount of exports, which, he assumed, would be about one hundred millions, which would be returned in the form of goods dutiable; though it was possible a portion might be returned in the form of State stocks, or be smuggled in; in which latter cases, the revenues would be lessened to the extent of the returns in that form.

The amendment was agreed to; and the bill was reported back to the Senate, where the amendment was concurred in. The bill was then read a third time, and passed.

CIVIL AND DIPLOMATIC APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. EVANS moved to take up the House bill No. 804, "making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending the 30th day of June, 1844."

The bill was then taken up for consideration as in committee of the whole, and the amendments recommended by the Committee on Finance were read.

The first amendment was:

"And the employment of all the persons for which appropriations are hereinbefore made in said department, are hereby legalized and authorized in the same manner as similar employments were legalized in the other Executive departments by the act of August 26, 1842."

After said amendment, to insert:

"To defray the expenses of distributing the remaining numbers of the Census and Statistics, according to a resolution of Congress, $2,500."

The first branch of the amendment was adopted, as was also the second.

The next amendment was to strike out the proviso, page 3, and insert:

"For expenses of printing 20,000 copies of the Compendium of the Sixth Census, heretofore required by law to be printed under the direction of the Secretary of State, a sum not exceeding $13,579 60: Provided, however, That, before the said account is paid, it shall be the duty of the Secretary of State, or other proper accounting officer, to ascertain, from one or more disinterested practical printers, what would be considered a fair and just compensation for composition, press work, and paper; and that so much, and no more, be allowed."

Mr. WOODBURY hoped the chairman of the Finance Committee would explain that amendment.

Mr. EVANS remarked that the Census proper was printed by Blair & Rives. By an act of 1841, the Secretary of State was authorized to cause a Compendium of the Census to be printed—that is, a digest; of which 20,000 copies were ordered. The Secretary of State directed Mr. Allen to print this Compendium. He did so. The number of volumes ordered has been received and distributed. The House agreed to pay Mr. Allen—not the amount contracted for, but the amount of expenses—leaving nothing for profit. The House went on the supposition that there was no authority of law by which the Secretary of State could order the printing when the order was made. There was a question as to the printing of 10,000 copies of the Compendium by Blair & Rives; the clerk of the department affirming that there was authority, and the Secretary of State denying it. But the matter at issue now was this: the Committee on Finance viewed the award of the House as barely to cover the expense; and felt satisfied that award was wrong, and that it should have been in favor of the usual rate always allowed for such printing. The printing of the Census proper was (as said before) done by Blair & Rives, under the authority of the former Secretary of State, (Mr. Forsyth;) and the Compendium was printed by Mr. Allen, under the authority of the succeeding Secretary of State, and according to the law of 1841. Congress appropriated upwards of $131,000 to pay for the printing of the Census proper.

The printing of the Compendium was going on at the same time. The House thought there was no law authorizing the order for printing the Compendium; but they did not go back to see whether there had been any more law for ordering the printing of the Census proper. For both, there was the same authority—that of the Secretary of State.

Now, he ventured to say that the actual expense of printing the Compendium—the sum actually out of pocket—was not less than $25,000. Good faith required that the full price of the contract should be paid. Before the law of 1841 was passed, Blair & Rives also commenced printing the Compendium, on the authority of the clerk of the department, who said the Secretary had authorized him to make the order. But this the Secretary denied; and, when the law of 1841 was passed, he notified Blair & Rives not to proceed with the printing. Notwithstanding this notification, they proceeded with, and printed, their 10,000 copies. Now, he was not willing to pay them on the ground of contract; but he would agree, at any moment, to pay them a fair compensation, and take the work off their hands. This they were not willing to accept; and, therefore, they were left out. And another reason he had for letting Blair & Rives lie over, was, that, if the gentlemen opposite were to be in the plenitude of the power they anticipated next year, they could pay Blair & Rives themselves.

Mr. WOODBURY showed that, at the time alluded to by the Senator, the work was considerably in advance by Blair & Rives, on the authority of the clerk of the department, resting upon the assurance of being authorized by the Secretary of State. Now, the committee of the House had investigated the matter thoroughly, and had come to the conclusion that both Blair & Rives and Allen should be paid their full expenses. The bill should either be suffered to stand as it is, or, if one of the printers is advanced in price, so ought the other.

Mr. BERRIEN asked the Senator from New Hampshire if he denied the authority of the Secretary of State as to making the contract; that the contract was entered into; and if it was, that it was fulfilled?

Mr. WOODBURY said he would read a part of the report of the committee in the other House.

Mr. EVANS made a question of order, on reading a document of the other House as authority in the Senate.

Mr. WOODBURY said he meant to read it as part of his speech.

The CHAIR thought it was in order to read such matter as part of a speech.

Mr. EVANS withdrew his question of order.

Mr. WOODBURY read the extract from the report of the Committee in the House. He then demanded the same justice for Messrs. Blair & Rives, which was intended for Mr. Allen.

Mr. HENDERSON made an inquiry, which Mr. EVANS answered.

Mr. HENDERSON then stated his impression of the state of the case.

Mr. EVANS and Mr. HENDERSON discussed the question at issue between them for some time. It was in relation to the reduction of 20 per cent. on the public printing of Congress; and whether it affected this contract or not.

The amendment was then adopted.

The next amendment, being merely verbal, was adopted; as also the succeeding amendment.

The next amendment was to correct several verbal errors. It was adopted.

The last amendment was: "To defray the expenses of taking care of and preserving the botanical and horticultural specimens brought home by the squadron of the exploring expedition, under the direction and control of the Joint Committee on the Library, $1,200.

It was adopted.

The amendments of the Committee on Finance having been all gone through,

Mr. EVANS moved (on the recommendation of the Library Committee) an amendment appropriating $5,000 for removing the statue of Washington from the rotundo in the Capitol, to the east side of the Capitol grounds, with a view of placing it on a pedestal, under shelter, and in a proper position.

Mr. KING adverted to the several propositions at first made for placing the statue in the rotundo, and also his original proposition to place it in the public grounds. He had at first objected to its being placed in the rotundo, having foreseen that it would not answer.

Mr. EVANS remarked that Mr. Greenough was here; and probably a better time never would arrive for making this necessary removal. The sum was small, and he hoped the amendment would be adopted.

Mr. KING asked where it was to be placed.

Mr. EVANS replied, just where the Senator himself had first recommended.

Mr. ALLEN thought a sitting statue never could be placed in any light to show better than where it was. He should vote against the removal.

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. EVANS next proposed an amendment appropriating $25,000 for the improvement of the Hudson river, and advocated its necessity and propriety at some length. He had resisted 100 amendments with which he had been importuned; but this was one so important, that he could not avoid offering it.

Mr. KING said, if the Senator insisted on this amendment, and it should be passed, he would be importuned—and with great justice—by Senators from all quarters of the Union, for local appropriations of similar character. Why should this be put in, to the exclusion of other claims? He would not vote for one cent to be applied to internal improvement until the chairman of the Finance Committee should satisfy him that the Government could be carried on, and have a surplus in the treasury, without a resort to borrow money. Why was not this amendment presented to the Finance Committee, so that it could be investigated?

Mr. EVANS maintained his right as an individual Senator to offer an amendment. He said he had refused 100 amendments pressed upon him as chairman of the Finance Committee; and would resist them, come up when or how they might. This amendment he offered on his own responsibility, not as chairman of the committee.

Mr. KING, acting upon the principle which he wished to see carried out by others, had refrained from asking appropriations for his own State, more necessary for general navigation than this; and he would oppose everything of the kind, till the treasury was in a condition to justify such appropriations.

Mr. TALLMADGE insisted that, in consequence of the act of the General Government on a former occasion, certain improvements of the Hudson river were commenced; but they had been suspended, three years ago. The result was, that a bar was forming, which would destroy the navigation of that river, unless this $25,000 was granted, to remove it. The appropriation was justifiable, on the ground of reparation of an evil created by the General Government.

Mr. BERRIEN felt himself in the same condition as the Senator from Alabama: he had much to ask for in favor of his own State, but refrained, on account of the condition of the treasury. He was therefore obliged to vote against the amendment.

The question was then taken on the amendment, and resulted in the negative—ayes 15, noes 19.

Mr. EVANS next moved an amendment, appropriating $1,350—$1,300 of it for the salary fixed by law for the reporter of the Supreme Court of the United States, and $50 arrear due on last year's salary.

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. HUNTINGTON, by direction of the Committee on Commerce, moved an amendment, appropriating $1,000 for paying an agent for having the mail carried across the Isthmus of Panama.

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. GRAHAM moved an amendment, to appropriate $15,000 for purchasing a new site, and commencing a building for a custom-house at Wilmington, North Carolina, (in addition to the proceeds of present site,) provided the whole cost shall not exceed $40,000.

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. TALLMADGE moved to increase the compensation of special Post Office agents from $1,000, proposed by the bill, to $1,500; which would be $100 less than their former salaries.

Mr. SEVIER asked how many special agents there were?

Mr. HUNTINGTON was about to make the same inquiry.

Mr. TALLMADGE said the number was, he believed, seven or eight.

Mr. EVANS remarked that there were ten special agents. He explained their duty. The present Postmaster General, on coming into office, found there were a certain number of these agents at $1,600 a year each; and he made a change, raising the number to ten, and reducing the salaries to $1,200 each. Subsequently, finding he could not have suitable persons to do the duty at that rate, he raised the salaries to $1,500.

Mr. MERRICK hoped the amendment would prevail. This was a valuable class of officers, and they should be paid a suitable salary. It was impossible to expect proper persons to take the office at $1,000 salary.

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. BAYARD moved an amendment appropriating $800 to reimburse the Chamber of Commerce of Philadelphia for expenses incurred in keeping up a light at Cape Henlopen.

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. BAYARD also moved an amendment appropriating $30,000 for Babbitt's anti-attrition metal, purchased under contract, by the Secretary of War. He stated that on the 29th of August last, an act of Congress was passed, authorizing the Secretary of War to make this contract. This anti-attrition metal is one of the most valuable inventions of modern times. It saves at least one-half of the oil commonly used by steam-engines. If all the steam-engines employed by the Government be taken into account, it will be found that the saving will be immense. It amounts to at least $1 per day for each engine—making $300 a year, and probably $6,000 on all the engines employed by the Government.

Mr. CHOATE made a short explanation as to the appropriation not having been brought forward sooner.

Mr. HUNTINGTON asked, was it proper thus to ratify a contract by an appropriation? What committee of the Senate had considered and reported on the subject?

Mr. BAYARD read the letter of the Secretary of War in relation to it. The article was now in use for all the steam-engines employed by the United States Government. Its value was fully tested by the new and beautiful vessel, the Union, and that trial was decisive that the invention would be an immense saving in the public service.

Mr. EVANS thought it would be time enough to make the appropriation next session.

Mr. CHOATE made some further explanation, as to the recommendation made last session to give authority to the Secretary of War for adjusting and ratifying the contract.

The subject was further discussed by Messrs. EVANS, CHOATE, &c.

The amendment, however, was rejected—ayes 17, noes 19.

Mr. SEVIER moved an amendment, restoring to the same rate as formerly the pay of the watchmen of the War Department, by striking out the bulk sum of $710, and inserting $1,270.

Mr. EVANS understood the proposition to be, to increase the pay of the watchmen of the War Department to what it was formerly. The subject was fully investigated last session, and the pay of the watchmen of all the departments was equalized. He was averse to this distinction, as well as to any departure from the established rate agreed upon last session. He did not think this the time or mode of effecting the object. He was in favor of better pay for the subordinate officers in the public service; but let it be done in a proper way, and at a proper time.

Mr. SEVIER urged the claims of these watchmen, and decried the paltry economy of cutting down the wages of these poor men.

The amendment was rejected—ayes 15, noes 18.

Mr. DAYTON proposed an amendment recommended by the Committee on Public Buildings, in relation to the furnaces in the Treasury building.

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. KERR proposed an amendment appropriating $6,000 for Johnson's patent iron window-shutters for the basement story of the Treasury building. He read the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury, explaining the advantages and necessity of applying this invention to the Treasury building.

Mr. EVANS asked what was the use of these iron shutters? In regard to fire, the Treasury building is well protected by watchmen; and in regard to thieves, what, in the name of heaven, would they have to find in the treasury under its present condition? If thieves get into it, they will find all their labor lost. It will be time enough to get this fanciful protection when it can be of any use. It is not wanted at all.

Mr. KERR begged Mr. Johnson's own recommendation of the shutters would be read.

The Secretary of the Senate read it in part; when,

Mr. MERRICK begged his colleague would refrain from reading all the authorities with which he was about to fortify this proposition. Nobody doubted that it was a very fine shutter; and if it was indispensable to the safekeeping of the money in the treasury, it would, as a matter of course, be adopted.

Mr. KERR begged his colleague would let the reading go on.

The Secretary of the Senate then proceeded with the reading.

Mr. KERR had but one single word to add. He then proceeded for some time with his remarks in support of the merits of the invention, and concluded by recommending the adoption of his amendment.

Mr. BUCHANAN asked if this bill was to be made an omnibus for all sorts of appropriations? Was it proper, at 10 o'clock on the last night of the session of an expiring Congress, to proceed with such a proposition, in the direct teeth of the report of the Commissioner of Public Buildings, and the sense of the whole Senate?

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE moved an amendment, with a proviso, fixing the price of the printing done for this Congress at the rates of the resolution of the 3d of March, 1819—that is, to restore the 20 per cent. which it had been reduced.

Mr. KING opposed the amendment. Could anybody tell what reason there was for raising the price of printing 20 per cent., when everything else had come down?

Mr. SIMMONS said that, in consequence of the work having been cut down to half what it usually was, and the reduction of 20 per cent. on the price having been made on the supposition that the quantity of printing would be the same, the printers of both Houses had lost money on the printing for this Congress.

Mr. EVANS said the subject had been called to his notice this morning, but he had since forgotten it. He contended that, when the reduction of 20 per cent. was agreed upon, it was on the presumption that the quantity of printing would continue to be the same as usual. But there had been such a falling off in the usual printing of extra numbers of documents, that it was impossible for the printers to do the work at the reduced price, without loss.

He read a statement of the printer of the Senate, to the effect that there would be a dead loss on his contract for doing the work of this Congress.

Mr. ALLEN denounced this mode of springing upon the Senate, by surprise, at ten o'clock on the last night of the session, another printing job. After the signal defeat of the monstrous job attempted two nights ago, he little expected that another job of the same kind would be attempted. He should have the yeas and nays on this job too. Retrenchment, indeed! Gentlemen commenced the Congress with zeal for retrenchment, and now end it with far more earnest zeal for the augmentation of expenditures.

He protested against having this proposition sprung upon the Senate at midnight, after a three months' session, during which it might have been brought forward, and when it could have been properly investigated and discussed. Till this moment, he had never heard any complaint on the part of the public printers. There was another book-job, too, in this bill, which he hoped some gentleman would vote to strike out. He alluded to the appropriation of $47,000 for books distributed to members of Congress, according to a former resolution of the House. Did gentlemen want to job out the treasury? Job, job, job! It was all jobbing—book-jobbing, printing-jobbing—and now, nocturnal jobbing.

Mr. WRIGHT understood that Mr. Allen had virtually no interest in this printing; having sold out the Madisonian establishment. He believed he had undertaken a much better job in Missouri than this printing, even with the 20 per cent. added.

Mr. W. commented at some length upon the retrenchment movement made by gentlemen now in power, at the beginning of this Congress, both in regard to the resolution reducing the price of printing, and the plan of curtailing the printing, by referring all the propositions to print to a Committee on Printing. The proposition now was, to restore a rate, which is to put $6,000 into Mr. Allen's pocket; and if it was confined to him, it would, perhaps, be hardly worth while to say much—aware that his quantity had really been cut down. But it is to apply to the other House, in which there has been no committee on printing, and in which there has been as much extra printing done as usual. There have been extraordinary large numbers of extra documents ordered by the House during this Congress to be printed. He fully believed the printing of this session, at the prices of 1819, would amount to as much as that of any session for the last ten years. He was aware that, so far as the Senate was concerned, the printing had been commendably reduced; but once they went beyond the Senate, the application of the 20 per cent. to a contract entered into at a reduced rate, must result in nothing but a gift of so much money to a party printer.

The subject was further discussed by Messrs. WOODBURY, SIMMONS, CALHOUN, and EVANS.

The question was then taken on the amendment, and resulted in the affirmative—yeas 24, nays 19, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Archer, Barrow, Bates, Bayard, Berrien, Choate, Conrad, Crittenden, Dayton, Evans, Kerr, Mangum, Merrick, Miller, Morehead, Phelps, Porter, Rives, Simmons, Smith of Indiana, Sprague, Tallmadge, White, and Woodbridge—24.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Bagby, Benton, Buchanan, Calhoun, Fulton, Henderson, King, Linn, McRoberts, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Sturgeon, Tappan, Walker, Wilcox, Williams, Woodbury, and Wright—19.

Mr. WOODBURY moved to strike out the item of $47,000 for books authorized to be purchased by a simple resolution of the House at the last session.

Mr. EVANS mentioned that the books had been purchased, received, boxed up, and sent off to members already, by the Clerk of the House, under a resolution of the House of Representatives; and they were to be paid for. It was, therefore, obviously useless to resist the payment now.

Mr. BENTON asked, how they were bought without money?

Mr. EVANS said they were bought, but not paid for; nor could they be paid for till this appropriation was made.

Mr. BENTON asked, at what price the books were bought?

Mr. EVANS said he did not know.

Mr. BENTON asked in what stage the bill now was?

Mr. EVANS said, on its third reading.

The CHAIR observed that the bill had been read twice, and could receive its third reading on to-morrow.

Mr. BENTON. Then, in that case, I cannot stop it by any opposition of mine. If I could do so, this book item should come out, or the bill should be lost.

Mr. TAPPAN made a few observations on the impropriety of the House, by a simple resolution, incurring a debt which Congress should be called upon to make an appropriation to pay; and that, too, for the distribution of property to the members themselves.

Mr. ALLEN found, on reference to the journal of the House, that the House, on the 8th of August, passed a resolution to adjourn on the 22d; that Mr. Morris introduced the resolution for the purchase of these books, and immediately moved the previous question. Under the operation of the previous question, it was passed—yeas 89, nays 71. Thus $50,000 worth of books were ordered to be purchased and distributed to the members of the House, without any money to pay for them. Had the House any right to authorize its Clerk to incur a debt; and, after the debt was incurred, to make an appropriation to pay it? There must be an end put to this business. A case must be made before the country upon this course. The people must be told of it on the stump. They are asleep, while you, now, at midnight, are voting away their money to yourselves or your partisan printers. But they shall be told of it. The yeas and nays must go to them.

The question was then taken on Mr. WOODBURY's amendment to strike out the $47,000 appropriation for books to members of Congress; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 14, nays 23, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Bagby, Benton, Buchanan, Fulton, King, Linn, McRoberts, Sevier, Sturgeon, Tappan, Williams, Woodbury, and Wright—14.

NAYS—Messrs. Archer, Barrow, Bates, Bayard, Berrien, Choate, Conrad, Crittenden, Dayton, Evans, Henderson, Kerr, Mangum, Miller, Morehead, Phelps, Porter, Simmons, Smith of Indiana, Sprague, Tallmadge, White, and Woodbridge—23.

Mr. BAYARD moved an amendment authorizing the settlement of accounts for extra pay to the officers of the exploring expedition.

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. LINN moved an amendment, appropriating $2,000 for extra clerk-hire for the surveyor general of Missouri.

Mr. EVANS said it was quite unnecessary, as there was, on the next page, an appropriation of $31,000 for extra clerk-hire to the surveyors general, and the surveyor general of Missouri would get his just proportion.

Mr. LINN withdrew his amendment.

The bill was then reported back to the Senate; and the question being on concurring in the amendments of the committee of the whole,

Mr. WOODBURY asked that the amendment in relation to paying for the Compendium of the Census should be excepted.

The other amendments were concurred in.

The question being on the amendment of the committee of the whole, striking out the amount awarded by the House to Messrs. Blair & Rives, and increasing the amount to Mr. Allen, for printing the Compendium of the Census Returns,

Mr. WOODBURY moved to insert the names of Blair & Rives, so as to place them on the same footing with Allen, in regard to the work done by them—they having printed the Compendium under the first contract.

Mr. EVANS admitted that the House understood that both printers stood upon the same ground; but the Finance Committee of the Senate did not so understand it. They believed that there was a regular contract with Allen, but none with Blair & Rives. He was willing to take the work off the hands of the latter at a fair valuation, but not as being bound to do so under contract.

Mr. WRIGHT called for the yeas and nays; which were ordered. He wished to make a few remarks on this subject of printing. Blair & Rives were the legal printers of Congress, under a contract solemnly made by the Senate—which contract was subsequently repudiated, and Mr. Allen was inducted in their place.

Mr. EVANS interposed, to say this was not for the printing of the Census—it was for the printing of the Compendium.

Mr. WRIGHT observed that the legal printers of Congress, Blair & Rives, were duly employed by contract to do the work, authorized by the Secretary of State. The Secretary of State had authorized the contract. They were, therefore, entitled to the pay for the printing, and could recover it in any court of law.

Mr. EVANS said that was a question at issue.

Mr. WRIGHT remarked that he knew all about it, and was well satisfied that the Secretary of State did authorize the contract.

Mr. HENDERSON submitted a modification, providing that the price paid to Messrs. Blair & Rives, and to Mr. Allen, should not exceed the price of printing contracted for by this Congress.

Mr. WOODBURY had no objection to this modification.

Mr. WALKER contended that, in any court of law or equity, if the United States permitted itself to be sued, Blair & Rives would recover damages for the whole of the printing.

Mr. EVANS observed that this did not relate to the Census; it was the Compendium—quite a different thing.

Mr. WALKER said it was no more a different thing, than an index was a different thing from the main work to which it belongs. Mr. W. showed how the work was authorized by the department, and carried on, in good faith, by Blair & Rives; and that, on a full and impartial investigation by the committee of the House, it was decided that they should be placed on the same footing.

Mr. WRIGHT called for the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

The question was then taken on Mr. WOODBURY's amendment, and decided in the affirmative—yeas 24, nays 13, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Bagby, Bayard, Benton, Buchanan, Calhoun, Fulton, Henderson, King, Linn, McRoberts, Mangum, Rives, Sevier, Sturgeon, Tallmadge, Tappan, Walker, Wilcox, Williams, Woodbridge, Woodbury, Wright, and Young—24.

NAYS—Messrs. Archer, Berrien, Conrad, Crittenden, Dayton, Evans, Kerr, Miller, Morehead, Phelps, Porter, Smith of Indiana, and White—13.

So the amendment on the amendment was adopted; and the amendment as amended was concurred in.

Mr. BAYARD renewed his amendment, relating to Babbitt's anti-attrition metallic patent, appropriating $20,000 to pay the contract.

It was adopted.

The amendments were then ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

Mr. EVANS submitted a resolution to suspend the 17th joint rule.

Mr. BENTON objecting—

The resolution was laid over one day.

Mr. EVANS moved to suspend the previous orders, for the purpose of taking up the joint resolution to continue an additional clerk in the Second Auditor's office.

The request was complied with; and the joint resolution was taken up, considered, read three times, and passed.

Mr. BERRIEN moved to proceed to the consideration of House bill 806; which was agreed to.

House bill 806 was, accordingly, taken up as in committee of the whole, considered, reported, read a third time, and passed. The title of the bill was: "A bill for the survey of the Northern line of the reservation of the half-breeds of Sac and Fox tribes of Indians under the treaty of the 4th August, 1804."

Mr. HUNTINGTON moved to proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was concurred in; and, at half-past 11 o'clock, p. m., the Senate went into executive session.

After considerable time spent in secret session, the Senate resumed its legislative session; when

The following bills from the House were taken up, considered as in committee of the whole, reported to the Senate, and passed, viz:

The bill for the relief of Jos. W. Newcomb; and

The bill to provide for the erection of a marine hospital at Key West, in the Territory of Florida.

The Senate then, at 2 o'clock a. m. adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, March 2, 1843.

Mr. PAYNE presented a memorial of the Legislature of Alabama, praying a reduction and graduation of the price of the public lands: referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. REYNOLDS presented the memorials and resolutions from the General Assembly of the State of Illinois, and had them referred to the appropriate committees, to wit:

1. Stating the propriety of settling the Oregon question with Great Britain, and urging the subject on the consideration of the Government of the United States. It is also stated, in the resolution, that it was a grievous omission in the late treaty not to settle the Oregon boundary with the other boundary questions; and that the question should not be delayed any longer.

2. Proposing a reduction on the postage of letters, &c.

This subject is urged on the consideration of Congress, with facts, and great force of argument. It is regarded in the memorial as a duty on Congress to reduce postage generally.

3. Praying an appropriation of money to improve the navigation of the Western waters.

Many facts are referred to, which will satisfy Congress that the improvement of those rivers is indispensable to the commerce of the Western country.

4. Praying the reduction of duties on certain indispensable articles of consumption.

It is stated that it is unequal and unjust to compel one section of the Union to support other sections of the same country by any act of Congress; that the article of salt is indispensable; that one family uses almost as much of this article as another; that the imposition of taxes ought to be in proportion to the amount of property each individual may own. The present act of Congress makes no such discrimination; but imposes as much tax on a poor man for salt, as on a person worth millions. The operation of this act (states the memorial) is so unjust and unequal, that it ought to be forthwith repealed.

5. Praying an amendment in the pre-emption laws, so as to do justice to the actual settler.

GENERAL JACKSON'S FINE.

After the journals had been read, Mr. WHITE of Louisiana obtained the floor, and said that he was induced to seek the attention of the Chair this morning, for a personal explanation. He said he had been attacked, and sorely insulted, in the face of the House—not, indeed, in his individuality; for, as to that, if every bone in it were fractured, he would not deem it a thing worthy of the Speaker's notice—but (he said) when he spoke of himself in this connexion, it was only as the impersonation of those he represented; and this, he hoped, was not too bold an allegory. The people of his State, he said, and his immediate constituents more especially, had been vilified and misrepresented in debate here.

It has been stated—and the authority of General Jackson's opinions has been invoked in support of the idea—that a large portion of the people whom I represent were spies and traitors in the last war; that they were hostile to the cause in which the country was engaged; and were ready to join the enemy in opposition to their brethren in arms.

Sir, (said Mr. W.,) those statements have gone abroad uncontradicted. No opportunity has occurred, under the rules and modes of proceeding, to contradict or examine them. In some twenty or thirty hours more, this session is to close; and then these aspersions will pass into your Registers of Debate as the materials of future history.

Mr. W. said he really conceived it to be due to truth, to justice, to an abused portion of the people of the United States, and to the reputation of our common country, that some little chance should be given to the Representative of those thus wronged, to examine the grounds of the obloquies, in order to see how far they may be founded in fact or reason, or to what extent they are fallacious, and susceptible of refutation.

How (he inquired) was this to be accomplished? There was some difficulty in it, he confessed, in the present juncture. The way he would propose was this: The subject-matter on which those objectionable statements had been made—the remission of General Jackson's fine—was before the House in a variety of shapes. Among them was bill No. 12, from the Senate. He would move that, as soon as the House shall go into Committee of the Whole, an hour be devoted to the consideration of that bill, in order to afford him the opportunity of some expression in the premises.

Several gentlemen expressing themselves to the effect that the standing committees had better first be called for reports, after which it might be done—Mr. W. said he had no objection to that. Any course was agreeable to him, which afforded a reasonable prospect of attaining the end.

MERCHANDISE RECOVERED FROM SHIPWRECK.

On motion by Mr. FILLMORE, the Committee of Ways and Means was discharged from the bill to permit the entry of merchandise recovered from shipwreck, in certain cases, free from duty; and the same having been ordered to be engrossed, was read the third time and passed.

FOREIGN COINS.

Mr. FILLMORE, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported, without amendment, the bill from the Senate regulating the currency of foreign gold and silver coins in the United States; and, the same being considered by the House, was read the third time, and passed.

PEA PATCH ISLAND

Mr. JOS. R. INGERSOLL, from the same committee, reported, with several amendments, the bill from the Senate to settle the title to the Pea Patch Island, in the Delaware.

The amendments having been read,

Mr. J. R. INGERSOLL asked that the bill be put on its passage, by general consent.

Mr. WELLER called for the reading of the bill.

Mr. JOHNSON of Maryland objected to the third reading of the bill at this time, under the apprehension that it would lead to debate.

Mr. J. R. INGERSOLL then moved to refer it to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; which motion was agreed to.

WEIGHTS AND MEASURES OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. J. R. INGERSOLL submitted a joint resolution, requesting the President of the United States to present to the British Government a set of the standard weights and measures of the United States, to replace those destroyed in the late fire in London: adopted.

BRITISH TREATY.

Mr. POPE rose and explained that he was unavoidably absent when the final vote was taken on the bill to carry into effect the late treaty with Great Britain, so that his name did not appear among the yeas and nays on that vote. He wished to state that, had he been present, he would have voted for the bill.

PRIVATE BILLS.

Mr. GIDDINGS moved that the Committee of Claims be discharged from the further consideration of the bill for the relief of Daniel Skinner, and the bill for the relief of Richard Patten; which motion was agreed to.

Mr. COWEN then explained and advocated the bill for the relief of Richard Patten, and moved that it be taken up in the House, and put upon its passage; which, being agreed to by general consent, the bill was read the third time, and passed.

FOREIGN COINS.

Mr. JOHN P. KENNEDY, from the Committee on Commerce, reported, with several amendments, the bill from the Senate to fix the value of certain foreign moneys in the accounts and computation of the custom-houses; and the amendments having been read,

Mr. ADAMS made an inquiry, which led to explanatory remarks from Mr. PICKENS and Mr. WINTHROP. The amendments of the committee were then concurred in; and the bill was read a third time, and passed.

Mr. WINTHROP, from the Committee on Commerce, made a report on a communication from the Treasury Department, on the subject of light-houses on the Eastern coast.

COLORED SEAMEN.

Mr. WINTHROP moved that the House take up the resolutions appended to the report some time since made by him in relation to the imprisonment of colored seamen in Southern ports. He said it was too late, at this period of the session, to discuss the subject at any length; yet, while he hoped the House would take a vote on the resolutions, he would not move the previous question.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON moved to lay the subject on the table.

Mr. WELLER called for the reading of the resolutions.

The Clerk accordingly read the resolutions as follows:

Resolved, That the seizure and imprisonment, in any port of this Union, of free colored seamen, citizens of any of the States, and against whom there is no charge but that of entering said port in the prosecution of their rightful business, is a violation of the privileges of citizenship guaranteed by the 2d section of the 4th article of the Constitution of the United States.

Resolved, That the seizure and imprisonment, in any port of this Union, of free colored seamen, on board of foreign vessels, against whom there is no charge but that of entering said port in the course of their lawful business, is a breach of the comity of nations, is incompatible with the rights of all nations in amity with the United States, and, in relation to nations with whom the United States have formed commercial conventions, is a violation of the 6th article of the Federal Constitution, which declares that treaties are a part of the supreme law of the land.

Resolved, That any State laws, by which certain classes of seamen are prohibited from entering certain ports of this Union, in the prosecution of their rightful business, are in contravention of the paramount and exclusive power of the General Government to regulate commerce.

Resolved, That the police power of the States can justify no enactments or regulations which are in direct, positive, and permanent conflict with express provisions or fundamental principles of the national compact.

Mr. WINTHROP called for the yeas and nays on the motion to lay the resolution on the table, and they were ordered; and being taken, resulted as follows—yeas 86, nays 59.

So the motion prevailed.

Mr. B. RANDALL, from the Committee on Commerce, made various adverse reports.

Mr. HOWARD, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported Senate bill entitled "An act for the relief of John R. Williams," without amendment; and he asked the House to put it on its passage.

After a few words of explanation, the bill was read a third time, and passed.

DISTRICT BANKS.

Mr. POWELL, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, reported a joint resolution to continue the charter of certain banks in the District of Columbia; and the same having been read,

Mr. PICKENS inquired whether this was an original bill of the House, or a bill from the Senate.

The SPEAKER said that it was an original joint resolution reported from a committee.

Mr. PICKENS observed that a joint resolution was in the nature of a bill, and could not, without a suspension of the 16th joint rule, be sent to the Senate.

The SPEAKER said that the joint resolution was in fact a bill, and, if passed, could not be sent to the Senate without a suspension of the rule.

Mr. POWELL called for the second reading of the resolution.

Mr. WELLER observed that it could not be read the second time but by general consent, and he objected to it.

The SPEAKER said that, when the second reading of a bill was objected to, the question then arose, "Shall it be rejected?"

Mr. SMITH of Virginia raised the point of order, that a bill on the same subject had already been reported, and was now before the Committee of the Whole. This bill was then out of order, under the rule prohibiting the introduction of two bills on the same subject.

Mr. UNDERWOOD wished to correct the gentleman in point of fact. This resolution was different from the bill in Committee of the Whole, for the reason that it contained a provision allow-

CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

PUBLISHED BY BLAIR AND RIVES, AT ONE DOLLAR PER SESSION, IN ADVANCE.

27TH CONG.....3D SESS. FRIDAY, MARCH 10, 1843. VOLUME 12....No. 25.

ing Congress, at any time hereafter, to alter or repeal it.

The SPEAKER overruled the point of order of Mr. SMITH.

Mr. SMITH of Virginia then moved to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON called for the yeas and nays; which being ordered, the question was taken, and the motion was rejected—yeas 72, nays 89. So the resolution was not laid on the table.

The question then recurred, "Shall this joint resolution be rejected?" and the yeas and nays having been ordered, the question was taken, under the operation of the previous question, and decided in the negative—yeas 77, nays 92.

YEAS—Messrs. Arrington, Atherton, Beeson, Bidlack, Brewster, Aaron V. Brown, Charles Brown, Burke, William O. Butler, Patrick C. Caldwell, John Campbell, William B. Campbell, Cary, Casey, Chapman, Clinton, Coles, Daniel, Richard D. Davis, Dawson, Doan, John C. Edwards, Egbert, John G. Floyd, Charles A. Floyd, Fornance, Gerry, Gilmer, William O. NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Landaff W. Andrews, Baker, Barnard, Blair, Borden, Botts, Brockway, Bronson, Jeremiah Brown, Burnell, Calhoun, Thomas J. Campbell, Caruthers, Childs, Chittenden, John C. Clark, James Cooper, Cowen, Cranston, Cravens, Crawford, Cushing, Garrett Davis, Deberry, John Edwards, Everett, Fessenden, Fillmore, Thomas F. Foster, Gamble, Gentry, Giddings, Goggin, Patrick G. Goode, Graham, Granger, Green, Halsted, Henry, Howard, Hudson, Joseph R. Ingersoll, James Irvin, James, Wm. Cost Johnson, I. D. Jones, J. P. Kennedy, King, Lane, McKennan, Samson Mason, Mathiot, Mattocks, Maxwell, Maynard, Meriwether, Moore, Morgan, Morris, Morrow, Osborne, Pendleton, Pope, Ramsey, Benj. Williams, Christopher H. Williams, Joseph L. Williams, Winthrop, Wise, Yorke, and Augustus Young—92.

So the bill was not rejected.

Mr. ATHERTON then offered the following amendment:

And be it further resolved, That all the stockholders, and all who may become stockholders, in said banks, shall be liable in their individual and private capacity, as copartners, for the debts and liabilities of the banks in which they are respectively stockholders, accruing during the time when they are stockholders in said banks.

Mr. A. said this amendment involved important principles; and had it been generally adopted in the legislation of the people of this country with regard to banks, many evils, frauds, and disasters would have been prevented. Nothing was so certain as that the only way to prevent the mismanagement of money, was to make those who were interested liable for the misdeeds of their agents. The principle of an individual liability had generally been adopted in England, where associated wealth was generally allowed greater privileges than in this country; and he could not see why it should not be generally adopted here, where the privileges of the people were so much more numerous and enlarged.

With regard to the banks of the District of Columbia, let it be admitted that it was expedient to recharter them: did it follow that such a step was necessary at this time? It would, he thought, be setting a bad example, to recharter these institutions, without inquiring into their past conduct and their present condition. No report whatever had been submitted showing their liabilities, their capital stock, whether they had always redeemed their bills, and how they had been generally managed. How was this bill brought before the present Congress? Not until the three last days of its session, when there could not be sufficient time allowed to debate its provisions. Why the necessity of rechartering these banks at all the present session, when their charters did not expire until July, 1844? Why not leave it to the next Congress, who would have sufficient time to examine into the matter without haste, and thoroughly find out the condition of those banks? He wished to know if the banks shrunk from investigation. If they did, it was but a poor argument why Congress, as the guardians of public rights, should recharter them, and give into their desires.

Mr. WELLER opposed the resolution; and entered into a detailed statement of the pretences under which the various extensions of the charters of these banks had been made since 1836—the most prominent being that they wanted time to wind up their affairs. He also alleged against them a violation or evasion of the conditions on which their charters were extended, and the purchase, by their officers, of their own depreciated paper and stock—thereby committing flagrant wrongs on widows and orphans, whose limited means were thus invested. And he asked if such conduct was to be justified by this House? and whether this resolution was thus to be passed through the House by a species of legerdemain, by which the rules of the House were evaded? He called the attention of the House to the fact, that the next Congress would be in session on the 4th December next, whereas the charters of these banks would not expire until the succeeding July. If, then, there was good reason to extend these charters, he thought it should be left to the next Congress to judge of that reason and that necessity; and that this Congress should not anticipate the legislation of its successor—especially if it were done from a fear that the next Congress would not extend the charters on the same terms as this Congress was willing to do.

Mr. FILLMORE rose and inquired if the morning hour had not expired?

The SPEAKER replied that it had.

Mr. FILLMORE then called for the orders of the day.

Mr. WELLER said he was desirous to offer a few remarks on the amendment which had been submitted.

The SPEAKER replied that the orders of the day had been called for.

Mr. WELLER then observed that he supposed he should have the floor to-morrow.

The SPEAKER replied that he would, during the morning hour.

TWO HUNDRED MILLION NATIONAL STOCK.

Mr. W. COST JOHNSON asked the gentleman from New York to withdraw his demand for the orders of the day, to allow him to make a report.

Mr. FILLMORE said he would consent to the presentation of any reports which would not lead to any debate.

Mr. W. C. JOHNSON then rose to present a report from the select committee appointed to consider the memorials on the subject of issuing $200,000,000 of national stock; and he was proceeding to make some explanatory statements, when

Mr. PICKENS said he should object, if this subject was to give rise to debate at this late period of the session.

Mr. W. C. JOHNSON then submitted his report, and moved that it be printed. The report concluded with the following resolution:

Resolved, That it is expedient to employ the credit of the Government of the United States for the relief of the States, to the extent prayed for by the memorialists.

Resolved, That —— committee be instructed to prepare and report a bill accordingly.

Mr. J. R. INGERSOLL begged permission to offer a resolution in connexion with the motion of the gentleman from Maryland, to direct the printing of 5,000 extra copies of both the report of the gentleman from Maryland, and the report some time since made on the same subject by the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. W. C. JOHNSON hoped the gentleman from Pennsylvania would allow the question first to be taken on the simple proposition to print the usual number.

Mr. ADAMS said he had a resolution which he wished to offer as a substitute for the resolution of the gentleman from Maryland. It was as follows:

Resolved, That the repudiation, by any State of this Union, of any debt to foreigners, contracted by authority of the Legislature of the said State, is a violation of the Constitution of the United States, in the first paragraph of the tenth section of the first article, which provides that no State shall pass any law impairing the obligation of contracts.

Resolved, That if any State of this Union shall, by or in consequence of such repudiation, involve herself in war with any foreign power, the Congress of the United States has no power to involve them, or any other of the States of this Union, or the people thereof, in such war.

Resolved, That in the event of such war, the State involving herself therein, will cease thereby to be a State of this Union, and will have no right or claim to aid in her defence from the United States, or any of them.

Mr. W. C. JOHNSON again appealed to gentlemen to allow the vote to be taken on the question of printing.

Mr. J. R. INGERSOLL pressed his motion to print extra numbers of the two reports designated.

Mr. TURNEY objected.

The SPEAKER said, as objection was made, the motion would have to go over.

Mr. J. R. INGERSOLL moved a suspension of the rules.

Mr. A. V. BROWN called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

The SPEAKER explained to the gentleman from Massachusetts that the gentleman from Maryland did not ask for the consideration of his resolutions at this time, but merely the printing of the report.

The previous question was moved on the question of printing, and it was sustained by the House.

Mr. A. V. BROWN called for the yeas and nays on the motion to print the amendment.

Some irregular conversation ensued, and the reading of Mr. ADAMS's amendment was again called for, and read accordingly.

Mr. JOHN CAMPBELL wished to offer an amendment, but it was ruled out of order.

Mr. ADAMS hoped the House would not be afraid to express its opinions.

Mr. C. BROWN asked if it would be in order to move that all the schemes be rejected.

The SPEAKER said, No; but a motion to lay on the table would be in order.

Mr. JACOB THOMPSON moved to lay the whole subject on the table.

This motion was followed by considerable confusion in all parts of the hall; and various gentlemen rose to questions of order,

Mr. J. THOMPSON inquired what would be the effect of withdrawing the motion to lay on the table.

The SPEAKER said it would bring the House to a vote on the motion to print the substitute of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ADAMS.]

Mr. J. THOMPSON then withdrew his motion.

The question was taken on the motion to print the substitute above mentioned, and decided in the negative—yeas 72, nays 108, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Allen, Landaff W. Andrews, S. J. Andrews, Arnold, Aycrigg, Baker, Barnard, Blair, Boardman, Borden, Botts, Briggs, Brockway, Bronson, Jere. H. H. Stuart, Sumter, Taliaferro, John J. Thompson, Triplett, Trotti, Underwood, Van Buren, Wallace, Ward, Washington, Watterson, Weller and Westbrook—108.

Mr. BRIGGS then moved to lay the whole subject on the table; which motion was agreed to.

JONATHAN ROBERTS.

Mr. TOLAND, from the Select Committee on the case of Jonathan Roberts, late collector of the port of Philadelphia, made a report, accompanied by a resolution that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the subject.

The report was laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed, and the resolution agreed to.

Mr. GILMER rose and asked leave to withdraw a motion to reconsider the vote by which the House had passed a bill granting a section of land to the town of Fair Play, in the Territory of Wisconsin. The effect of the withdrawal of the motion is to send the bill to the Senate.

Mr. SLADE asked leave to present certain resolutions of the Legislature of Vermont.

Objections being made,

Mr. SLADE moved the suspension of the rules; but the motion was rejected.

Mr. COOPER of Pennsylvania, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to which had been referred the bill from the Senate for the relief of Joseph Bryan, reported the same without amendment.

SECOND REGIMENT OF DRAGOONS.

Mr. WM. O. BUTLER, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which had been referred the bill from the Senate to repeal certain parts of the act "for the organization of the army and for other purposes," approved 23d August, 1842, reported the same without amendment.

Mr. WM. O. BUTLER then moved that the bill be put upon its passage, and moved the previous question.

Mr. ADAMS hoped the bill would not pass. It swept away all the reform that was made in this branch of the service at the last session.

The SPEAKER reminded the gentleman from Massachusetts that, the previous question having been called for, debate was not in order.

Mr. BRIGGS suggested that, as the bill contemplated new appropriations, it must be considered in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER said that it would be necessary to refer it to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. WM. O. BUTLER accordingly moved that the bill be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the State of the Union.

Mr. ADAMS moved to lay it on the table; and, on this question, he called for the yeas and nays, which were ordered; and,

On taking the question, it was decided in the negative—yeas 63, nays 114.

The question was then put on referring the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and decided in the affirmative, without a division.

Mr. MOORE, from the Committee on Public Lands, asked leave to report the bill from the Senate to authorize the States of Missouri, Louisiana, and Arkansas, to institute proceedings to try the validity of their claims.

Objections being made by several—

Mr. MOORE moved the suspension of the rules; but the motion was negatived.

CODE FOR THE NAVY.

Mr. WISE, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported a joint resolution, providing that the code of rules and regulations for the government of the navy of the United States, prepared by the Secretary of the Navy and the Attorney General, under the resolution of the last session, be submitted to Congress at its next session; and that, until then, said code shall be put in operation, and printed, for the use of the navy.

Objected to by several, and not received.

LIVE OAK.

Mr. GRAHAM moved that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole, for the purpose of taking up the bill to protect the live-oak timber of the United States in Florida; but the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. CARUTHERS, on leave, introduced a joint resolution to correct a mistake in the bill for the relief of Thomas King, directing the Secretary of War, and not the Commissioner of Pensions, to place his name on the pension roll.

NAVY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The House proceeded to the consideration of the navy appropriation bill, which had come back from the Senate with the action of that body on the amendments thereto.

The Senate had concurred in all the amendments save the one in relation to the Brooklyn dry-dock; and the question came up in the House on receding from its amendment in that respect.

Mr. WISE hoped the House would recede, so that the House and the Senate might concur, and the bill be passed.

Mr. FILLMORE hoped that the House would not recede; and he went on to give his reasons for desiring the House to pursue that course. He concluded by moving the previous question; which was sustained by the House.

Mr. R. McCLELLAN called for the yeas and nays on the question of receding; and, being ordered, they resulted thus: Yeas 78, nays 98.

Mr. WISE then moved the appointment of a committee of conference; which was agreed to.

The House then took up several bills, which had come from the Senate with various amendments—the whole of which were concurred in.

REDUCTION OF POSTAGES.

The bill from the Senate entitled "An act to reduce the rates of postages," was read twice.

Mr. BRIGGS offered the following amendment: Strike out the first section of the bill, and insert, in lieu thereof, the following:

On all letters weighing not more than one-quarter of an ounce, avoirdupois, for any distance not exceeding fifty miles, five cents.

On all letters for any distance over fifty miles, ten cents.

On all letters weighing more than one-quarter, and not over one-half ounce, double the above rates; and the same rates of postage for every additional quarter of an ounce weight on all letters weighing more than half an ounce.

On all drop-letters, five cents.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That, from and after the first day of January next, all existing laws granting the privilege of franking, or receiving free of postage, any letters, packets, or papers of any kind, to members of Congress, the Secretary of the Senate, the Clerk of the House of Representatives of the United States, and to any and all other persons, excepting the President, ex-Presidents, and widows of persons who have been Presidents of the United States, and excepting, also, the Postmaster General, the Assistant Postmasters General, and the Auditor of the Treasury for the Post Office Department, be, and the same are hereby, repealed: Provided, however, That the privilege of franking and receiving letters, papers, and packets, free of postage, granted to the Postmaster General, the Assistant Postmasters General, and to the Auditor of the Treasury for the Post Office Department, shall extend to such matters only as relate to the business of their offices.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That, from and after the first day of January next, the postage on all letters, papers, and packets, that may be lawfully sent by mail, received by or directed to the members of either House of Congress, during the sessions thereof, and the postage on all letters, papers, and packets, that may be lawfully sent by mail, received by the Secretary of the Senate or the Clerk of the House of Representatives of the United States, relating to the business of the office of the said Secretary or Clerk, shall be paid out of the contingent funds of the respective Houses.

Mr. B. addressed the House at length in support of his amendment.

Mr. HOPKINS replied to Mr. BRIGGS, expressing his objections to the amendments of the latter.

Mr. WISE moved the previous question; and it was sustained by the House.

Mr. HOPKINS moved to lay the bill and the amendments on the table.

On this motion tellers were called for and appointed; and they reported 76 in the affirmative.

Mr. BRIGGS called for the yeas and nays; and, as they were ordered, the count by tellers was suspended. The yeas and nays were then taken as follows: yeas 62, nays 91.

Mr. FILLMORE called for the reading of the amendments; and they were read accordingly.

The question was then taken on the first division of the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BRIGGS,] by which letters are to be charged—for 50 miles or under, 5 cents; over 50 miles, 10 cents, &c.

The amendment was agreed to—yeas 88, nays 54.

The question recurred on the second division of the amendment—i. e. that which prohibits and limits the franking privilege, except in certain cases.

This portion of the amendment was rejected—yeas 73, nays 83.

The question recurred on the third division of the amendment, which provides for the payment of the postage of members of Congress on letters addressed to them on public business, out of the contingent fund of the House; and, on taking the question, the amendment was rejected without a division.

The question coming up on the passage of the bill—

Mr. RHETT moved to lay it on the table; which motion was rejected—yeas 57, nays 80.

The bill was then passed, under the operation of the previous question.

Mr. WISE then rose and stated that the Senate had taken a recess until 6 o'clock, and he wished to move that the House take a recess also. [It was now half-past 4 o'clock.]

Mr. FILLMORE suggested that the House should dispose of some Executive messages, which were on the table of the Speaker.

Mr. UNDERWOOD hoped the House would go on with the business in order; for they would not be able to do any business after a recess. He objected to everything but the regular order of business.

Mr. WELLER was understood to move that some particular bill be taken up; but it was not agreed to, nor was the title of the bill heard. Great confusion ensued, the prevailing object being to avoid a recess. Ultimately, the House took up some bills which had come with amendments made therein by the Senate, with which the House concurred. They were as follows:

An act for the better protection of the lives of passengers by vessels propelled in whole or in part by steam.

An act reorganizing the General Land Office.

Mr. FILLMORE said he had received a letter from the chairman of the Committee on Finance of the Senate, informing him that the Senate had taken a recess until six o'clock; and that, as several very important appropriation bills were still to be acted upon, it would be necessary to hold a night session. Under these circumstances, he intimated his wish that the House should take a recess. [Loud cries of "No—no recess."]

Mr. UNDERWOOD desired a joint resolution to be first acted upon, which had come from the Senate, for the suspension of the 16th joint rule of the two Houses, to permit certain specified bills to be transmitted from the Senate to the House. On this subject he moved the previous question.

Mr. READ moved to lay the resolution on the table, and on this he called for the yeas and nays; and they were ordered, and resulted as follows: yeas 78, nays 81.

Mr. BOWNE moved that the House adjourn. (5 o'clock.)

Mr. FILLMORE hoped that the House would not adjourn, inasmuch as, by the joint rules of the two Houses, this was the last day on which bills could be sent to the President.

The yeas and nays were ordered on the motion to adjourn. The result was—yeas 64, nays 92.

So the House refused to adjourn.

Mr. WELLER moved that there be a call of the House.

The yeas and nays were taken on this motion, and resulted—yeas 62, nays 85.

So the House refused to order a call.

Mr. ANDREWS of Kentucky moved that the House adjourn.

Mr. J. C. CLARK objected, that the motion was not in order till there had been some business action of the House.

The SPEAKER overruled the point of order, saying that there had been a motion for a call of the House, and the question was taken on it.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON called for the yeas and nays on the adjournment; which were ordered, and resulted in yeas 75, nays 79.

So the House refused to adjourn.

The question recurring on the resolution,

Mr. TURNEY moved to lay it on the table.

Mr. FILLMORE submitted that the motion was not in order, as there had already been a similar motion made and rejected, while no business had been done since.

Mr. C. W. WILLIAMS appealed to the friends of the resolution to withdraw from it the obnoxious measures, as it was evident they stopped all the business of the House.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON said that if it was the intention of gentlemen to pass through, at this late hour, this Massachusetts claim which had been defeated for twenty-five years, without a word of debate or explanation——

[Loud cries of "Order, order," drowning the rest of the sentence.]

The SPEAKER here decided upon Mr. FILLMORE's point of order, overruling it on the ground that the right to make this motion at any time was essential to the business of the House.

Mr. FILLMORE appealed.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON moved to lay the appeal on the table.

Mr. MASON of Ohio moved that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole.

Mr. C. H. WILLIAMS asked if it would be in order to move to lay the resolution on the table. [Loud cries of "There is a question of order."]

Mr. SAMSON MASON asked if it would be in order to move to go into Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER was understood to say that it would.

Mr. S. MASON said he wished to move that the House go into Committee of the Whole on the bill concerning the regiment of dragoons.

Mr. FILLMORE requested the gentleman who moved the previous question on the joint resolution from the Senate, to withdraw his motion, so that any bill mentioned in the list appended thereto, if objectionable, might be excepted and stricken out; and that the rest might then be acted upon. [Cries of 'Strike out the bank bill, and the other can pass; or they will all be lost together."]

The SPEAKER suggested that there were three propositions in the resolution; on each of which a distinct vote might be called for.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON suggested that a distinct vote be taken on each bill mentioned in the list from the Senate.

[Loud cries of "It cannot be done."]

Mr. FILLMORE, (despondingly.) Well, there is no other way, then. I take an appeal from the decision of the Chair.

[Loud cries of "The yeas and nays," and laughter.]

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON moved to lay the appeal on the table.

[Cries of "The yeas and nays," and great confusion.]

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON said, if they were to be compelled to act upon bills of so much importance, both to the House and to the country, without any opportunity for a single word of debate, and without an opportunity to inquire into the goodness or badness of these banks, or the justice or injustice of extending their charters—

Mr. UNDERWOOD rose to a question of order. Receive the bills, (he said,) and then discuss them.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON. Why, you will not allow discussion.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. You do not know. [Great confusion—the SPEAKER beating with his mallet on his desk, and loudly calling the gentlemen to order.]

The SPEAKER said the only question before the House was, "Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the House?" and not the bank bills. It was simply a question of "Is the Chair right or wrong?"

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON asked to be excused from voting on that question. [Loud cries of "Yeas and nays on that," and laughter.]

Mr. C. H. WILLIAMS said he had moved, some time ago, that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole. [Cries of—"The yeas and nays on that."]

Mr. BOTTS rose and moved an adjournment.

Mr. L. W. ANDREWS demanded the yeas and nays; but 24 gentlemen rose in favor of the motion. Tellers were demanded on taking the yeas and nays, and they were ordered; and Messrs. CALHOUN and WELLER were appointed. The yeas and nays were ordered and taken.

Mr. BOTTS rose before the decision was announced, and said that he had learned that, if the House adjourned, it was likely that the civil and diplomatic bill would be lost: he should therefore change his vote, No. [A voice was heard to say—"Why, then, you vote against your own motion," and laughter.]

The SPEAKER then announced the vote to be 83 in the affirmative, and 86 in the negative. The motion was, therefore, not carried.

Mr. C. H. WILLIAMS moved that the House go into committee.

Mr. FILLMORE rose and expressed the hope that the matter in hand would be dropped, rather than risk the defeat of the three appropriation bills which were pending before the two Houses. He had just returned from the Senate, where he was informed by the chairman of the Finance Committee that the civil and diplomatic appropriation bill had not been disposed of in that body, and the enrolling of which bill would require ten to twelve hours. He, therefore, urged that it was indispensably necessary to pass that bill to-night.

Mr. ADAMS made an inquiry as to the effect of adjourning, and Mr. FILLMORE replied; but none of the conversation was heard above the surrounding noise.

Mr. GILMER rose to make an inquiry. He wished to know whether it required a suspension of the 16th joint rule in order to act upon the bills which had been sent to the Senate, but amended in that body.

The SPEAKER said, No.

Mr. GILMER. Then the objection of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FILLMORE] falls to the ground.

The SPEAKER then observed to the gentleman from New York that he was informed by the Clerk that the appropriation bills were already enrolled, and it would be only necessary to add to them such amendments as should be adopted by the Senate.

Mr. FILLMORE said he had his information from the chairman of the Finance Committee. He would inquire whether the Speaker did not mean to say engrossed.

The SPEAKER said he was informed, upon specific inquiry, that the bills were enrolled.

The Senate announced their disagreement to the amendment of the House to the bill for the reduction of postages.

Mr. J. G. FLOYD moved that the House adjourn.

Mr. C. H. WILLIAMS asked for the yeas and nays; which were taken, and resulted—yeas 89, nays 76.

So the House, at seven minutes before 7, adjourned.

IN SENATE,

FRIDAY, March 3, 1843.

The reading of the journal was dispensed with.

Mr. EVANS, from the Committee on Finance, to which was referred the House bill to authorize the settlement of the accounts between the United States and Richard M. Carter, reported the same back, with a recommendation that it be indefinitely postponed; and,

On motion by Mr. EVANS, the previous orders were postponed, and the above bill was taken up as in committee of the whole, and indefinite by postponed.

Mr. EVANS, from the same committee, reported back, with amendments, the bill from the House concerning money received by certain public officers before they can be disbursed, and for other purposes. Mr. E. said, though the committee had recommended amendments, they could not recommend the passage of the bill. On his motion, the bill was then taken up as in committee of the whole, and indefinitely postponed.

Mr. BATES, from the Committee on Pensions, made adverse reports on the petitions of Samuel C. Mabson and Jacob Rose. The reports were concurred in by the Senate.

The House bill making appropriation to test the plan for electro-magnetic telegraphs, was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. STURGEON presented a petition from James P. Allen, and other citizens of the United States, and a petition from a number of citizens of Pennsylvania, praying the issue of Government stock, based on the public domain; which were ordered to be printed.

On motion by Mr. WILLIAMS, the adverse reports of the Committee on Naval Affairs on the petitions of Benjamin Franklin and Charles L. Williamson, were taken up and concurred in.

Mr. BAYARD, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, submitted a communication from William W. Hunter, of the United States navy, in relation to war steamers; which, on his motion, was ordered to be printed.

On motion by Mr. SEVIER, the vote on the adoption of the resolution below was reconsidered, viz.:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to ascertain, and report at the next session of Congress, the value and extent of the claims of the Western Cherokees upon the United States, growing out of their treaty stipulations.

Mr. S. then moved to amend the resolution, by adding the following, viz:

That is to say, that portion of the Cherokees known and designated as the old settlers west of the Arkansas; which claims are set forth in their memorial of the 16th April, 1842, signed John Rodgers, and others.

The amendment was agreed to; and the resolution, as amended, was then adopted.

The resolution submitted by Mr. EVANS on yesterday, proposing to suspend the 16th joint rule, to permit certain bills to be sent to the other House, was taken up; and, after being amended, on his motion, to suspend the 17th joint rule so far as to allow all bills and resolutions which were passed yesterday, and those which might pass to-day, to be presented to the President for approval, it was adopted.

On motion by Mr. WHITE, the previous orders were postponed, and the Senate proceeded to consider, as in committee of the whole, the bill for the relief of George E. Johnson. After a few remarks by Messrs. WHITE, EVANS, and MOREHEAD, the bill was amended, on the motion of Mr. EVANS. There being no further amendment, it was reported to the Senate, read the third time, and finally passed, as amended.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE, from the Committee on Commerce, to which was referred the bill from the House to repeal an act entitled "An act to extend the collection district of Wiscasset," reported the same back without amendment, and with a recommendation that it be indefinitely postponed.

This bill was then taken up, as in committee of the whole, on the question of indefinite postponement; and, after a few remarks by Messrs. WILLIAMS, KING, EVANS, WOODBRIDGE, and HUNTINGTON, the vote was taken, and decided in the negative. There being no proposition to amend the bill, it was reported to the Senate, and finally passed.

House bill entitled "An act to authorize the investigation of alleged frauds under the pre-emption laws, and for other purposes," was taken up, read the third time, and passed.

A message was received from the House, asking the Senate to suspend the 16th and 17th joint rules, for the purpose of receiving, and permitting to be sent to the President, the following bills, which had been amended by the House, viz:

The bill granting a pension to David Welch; and

The bill for the relief of Thomas King.

On motion by Mr. EVANS, the above message was taken up for consideration; and, on his motion, the proposition of the House to suspend the joint rules was amended, by inserting the bill for the relief of Robert B. Lewis. The proposition, in this form, was concurred in by the Senate.

PENSIONS TO WIDOWS.

Mr. BATES said, as most of the business on the calendar had been disposed of, he would ask the attention of the Senate to bill No. 655, making appropriations for the widows of the officers and soldiers of the Revolution. He had made several attempts to bring this subject before the Senate, but without effect; and he now made the motion to postpone all the previous orders, with a view to take up that bill.

Mr. KING said he would be glad if the Senator would allow him to dispose of a bill for the relief of a poor soldier of the Revolution, which he was convinced would take up no time, and then the pension bill could be called up immediately afterwards.

Mr. BUCHANAN, (sotto voce.) Don't give way; he means to vote against our bill.

Mr. BATES said he could not consent that 5,000 widows of the officers and soldiers of the Revolution should give place for anything or anybody.

Mr. BUCHANAN thought it unreasonable as well as ungallant in his friend from Alabama to desire to make 5,000 widows give way for one poor old soldier. Such was his understanding of the gallantry of by-gone days, that 5,000 soldiers would gladly give way for one of the gentler sex, and particularly those standing in the light which these estimable ladies did, as relicts of the heroes of the Revolution.

Mr. KING said the bill he desired to have acted on, was for one who had done the State some service; while the widows, who seemed to claim so large a share of the gentleman's sympathy, never did any service, nor did their husbands. These old women had married over and over again, and now came to claim pensions from the Government. These were beautiful times, indeed, to make gratuities of half a million of dollars to old women who never rendered any service whatever to the country.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Order.

Mr. KING, (smiling.) How does the Senator make out his point of order?

Mr. BUCHANAN, (playfully.) The point of order I make is, that the Senator from Alabama should speak of these ladies as old. It was not pleasant to him to hear them thus spoken of; and he was quite sure it must be less so to them. To be serious, however, on this matter, he had been instructed unanimously by his State to support the measure; and, rigid as he was known to be where all matters of appropriation were concerned, he should vote for this bill with as much pleasure as he ever did for anything in his life. He did not mean to go into the discussion of the pension system; all he desired was to have some definite action on the bill. These ladies had before received the bounty of the Government; and why take it from them now, when they were some seven or eight years older than they were, and most of them on the extreme verge of life? To refuse them this little pittance, he held would be unkind, unjust, and ungrateful to the memory of their departed husbands. What was the difficulty on this matter? It had been said that the times were unpropitious; that the amount is large, &c.; yet, they could sit and discuss, at midnight, joint resolutions to give thousands upon thousands to persons who were better paid than any other officers under Government, while this body sought to refuse a small pittance to those meritorious old ladies—the relicts of departed heroes of the Revolution.

Mr. WALKER thought the bill might as well be taken up; for when the Senator from Pennsylvania appeared at the head of his five thousand widows, he was a very formidable opponent, and not easily beaten.

The question was then taken on the motion of Mr. BATES, to postpone all the previous orders, with a view to take up the bill; and decided in the affirmative—yeas 23, nays 10.

So the bill was taken up.

Mr. BATES, chairman of the Committee on Pensions, rose and explained the bill at some length, going into detail, and pointing out the objects of the committee in the amendments they had proposed. The bill, as it came from the House, would make the number as computed from eight to nine thousand, and the amount required would have been somewhere about eight or nine hundred thousand dollars. The amendment of the committee, if adopted, would make the pension to extend to all married prior to 1794, to commence from the 4th of March, 1843. This would place some five or six thousand on the list, and, for the first year, would require between three and four hundred thousand dollars. Very few of these widows were under the age of seventy; and all knew how rapidly the sands of life run at this age. Most of these ladies had been engaged during the war of the Revolution, but their marriages had not been consummated until after the perils of the Revolution had ceased.

Mr. McDUFFIE. The Senator seems to speak knowingly of these matrimonial engagements. He (Mr. McD.) did not very well know what personal knowledge the chairman could have of the matter; but it seemed to him that engagements that lasted eleven years were rather too long.

Mr. McD. moved to amend the bill by striking out "ninety-four," and inserting "eighty-three;" so that no pension under this act should be paid to any widow who was married to the revolutionary soldier or officer after the year 1783.

Mr. BUCHANAN suggested that the amendment, if it prevailed, would operate a defeat of the bill. He thought it better, therefore, to take a direct vote upon its passage.

Mr. McDUFFIE rose to ask upon what principle of policy or justice a claim could be set up by a widow, whose marriage had taken place subsequently to the termination of the war, to a pension, founded upon the services of her husband during the war. The husband, during his life, had received a pension, enuring to her benefit, as well as his own; and he demanded by what right a pension could be claimed on the part of the widow, unless it were shown that she had participated in the struggle, and been subjected to the privations incident to the time.

Mr. BATES said pensions, in these cases, were claimed upon two grounds. First, upon the same ground upon which a widow would be entitled to demand and recover the debt of her deceased husband. The revolutionary soldiers had never been paid for their services; and it was just, therefore, that their widows should receive pensions. Another ground was, the gratitude due to the revolutionary soldiers, who rendered to their country the most important services. Upon considerations both of justice and gratitude, this Government ought to contribute to render the remainder of their lives comfortable.

The amendment of Mr. McDUFFIE was negatived—yeas 15, nays 24, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Archer, Benton, Berrien, Calhoun, Clayton, Dayton, Graham, King, McDuffie, McRoberts, Mangum, Walker, Woodbury, Wright, and Young—15.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Bagby, Barrow, Bates, Buchanan, Choate, Crafts, Crittenden, Evans, Fulton, Huntington, Kerr, Linn, Phelps, Porter, Simmons, Smith of Connecticut, Smith of Indiana, Sprague, Sturgeon, Tallmadge, White, Wilcox, and Woodbridge—24.

Mr. SMITH of Connecticut sustained the bill, not on the ground of a gratuity, but because the females of that day were all more or less compelled to make sacrifices, and had besides rendered material service.

Mr. McROBERTS asked what they were about to do? Here was an attempt to expend some six or eight hundred thousand dollars for a gratuity to widows of the Revolution. Where was the money to come from? How were they to get it? Was not the treasury bankrupt, and were they not now borrowing money for the ordinary expenses of the Government? He would move to strike out "five," and insert "one" year; and then let the next Congress do as it pleased.

The question was taken on this amendment, and decided in the negative—ayes 16, noes 23.

Mr. MERRICK inquired if any appropriation had been made for carrying into effect the bill?

Mr. BATES said there was no appropriation, of course, until the bill passed; and, if it should pass, he would move to insert $380,000.

Mr. YOUNG thought the present a most unpropitious period for the passage of such a bill. Here they were, at the close of a Congress, seeking to anticipate business which appeared to him to belong of right to the succeeding one. It was not proper that an expiring Congress—indeed, he might almost say, a dead Congress—should attempt to fix a system; when it was known that great changes had been made under the census of 1840, and changes, also, in their own body. He would, therefore, move to lay the whole subject on the table; and on that question he asked the yeas and nays.

The question having been taken, there appeared yeas 17, nays 22.

YEAS—Messrs. Archer, Benton, Berrien, Calhoun, Clayton, Cuthbert, Dayton, Graham, King, McDuffie, McRoberts, Miller, Tappan, Walker, Williams, Wright, and Young—17.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Barrow, Bates, Buchanan, Choate, Crafts, Evans, Huntington, Kerr, Linn, Merrick, Phelps, Porter, Simmons, Smith of Connecticut, Smith of Indiana, Sprague, Sturgeon, Tallmadge, White, Wilcox, and Woodbridge—22.

Mr. GRAHAM desired to call the attention of the Senate to this subject, conceiving, as he did, that it involved principles of importance. We had commenced with the soldiers, and that was right; we had extended it to their widows, and of that he did not so much complain. And now here was a proposition to give five years' pensions to all those who married prior to 1794.

Mr. BATES. No, sir; no such thing in the bill.

Mr. GRAHAM was glad to hear that much. In this case, no expectations had been excited. You have already allowed them five years' pensions, and now you are about to grant an additional gratuity of five years more, when it was neither required by justice nor policy; but, above all, now—when they were borrowing—to vote $380,000 for gratuities, seemed to him most strange.

Mr. ALLEN said, as the House had sent the bill to them, it would have required millions of dollars to have met all the cases embraced in it. The subject had been carefully considered by the intelligent and industrious chairman of the Committee on Pensions, who, after mature deliberation, had proposed the amendment which they had heard. Mr. A. gave, as an additional reason for his support of the amendment of the Senate, that the hopes of those ladies had been excited; and as they had been made the recipients of the bounty of the Government, they would feel more keenly the deprivation than those who had never enjoyed it. He should vote for the bill, therefore, not with any desire to extend the pension system, but to relieve those who had been taught to look for it, and which to refuse now would be considered a grievous disappointment; at a time when, above all others, they would be least able to bear it. In his opinion, it would be the height of human cruelty to withhold it.

Mr. KING said the Senator from Ohio seemed to take great credit to himself that he had not taken the House bill, which would have given away millions, but one that only cost some three or four hundred thousand dollars. Where was the difference in principle? For his own part, he did not know but he should prefer the House bill. Where was the necessity of pensioning those who had already once been pensioned? They all knew how this bill came to be passed in the first instance; and that it was from the importunity of one who was herself cut off from all its benefits after it had been passed. On what principle of justice did the bill proceed? Where was the merit of being married prior to 1794, or subsequent? Why had the committee fixed on that particular period?—as though it was a great merit to have married a day sooner or a day later. Was that the great sympathy of gentlemen—to give all their bounty to one class, and to withhold it from another, on the ground that to have extended it would have been too onerous on the treasury? If that be so, would it not be better to give to those who had married since 1794, and had never received it?

What possible excuse could there be for giving a pension to one who marries a day earlier than another? Suppose a gentleman goes home to his constituents, and sees two of these widows living side by side; one of whom is made the recipient of the bounty of the Government, because she fortunately happened to marry a day earlier than her neighbor, who, though marrying a day later, may have been the widow of a brave and gallant officer or soldier. What possible excuse could there be for any such proceeding? To do exact justice, we must pension all. The idea of a Senator voting for such a bill, because we had excited hopes, seemed to him the most extraordinary argument he ever listened to. He could tell gentlemen that he knew many of these widows who were ladies of fortune; and you give these pensions to the rich, while you exclude others. The law, he was aware, could not discriminate, because it must take time for its element; and he mentioned these things to show that the bill could not rest on any ground of justice or policy.

This whole matter of pensions was wrong in the first instance. It is generally the first step that costs. When the bill was first presented, the cry was that these widows were old and helpless, and they were pensioned for five years; and now they are older, and must be pensioned for a further five years. What merit was there in these women marrying officers and soldiers of the Revolution after the war, that they should be entitled to pensions? Matches with the officers were desirable, and highly creditable to them; and they were very fortunate in obtaining them. Did they suffer any losses from the marriage after the close of the war and as late as 1794? or were they harassed by revolutionary troubles? No, sir. Go to the Pension Office, and you will find that most of these widows who had married these old revolutionary officers, soon after their deaths provided themselves with young husbands.

Mr. ALLEN said the Senator from Alabama had gone into a statement of some of the requisites of a good husband. He had spoken of the revolutionary soldier as being strong, robust, and able-bodied, and that such a husband ought to be considered a sufficient compensation to any woman for enduring privation and hardships incident to a state of war, without granting them a sum of money out of the public treasury. This argument did not serve to satisfy him that a pension was unnecessary. The Senator had stated, also, that some of these widows were wealthy; but that did not alter the case, in his estimation. The law must necessarily be uniform—and a uniform law could not be made to reach the case of every individual. It could not be supposed that a law which was of itself broad and general, could possibly mete out exact justice to every individual. There could not be such a law, so long as there was so great a diversity among the men upon whom the law was to operate.

Mr. WALKER said the only reason he had heard offered in favor of this bill, which had any weight with him, was, that these widows had enjoyed their pensions for five years already; and that their expectations had been raised that they would be continued. He would have been glad if gentlemen by whom this argument was urged, had listened to it in regard to the cases of pensions in the navy. The law, in that case, had been permitted to expire; that law provided that the widows of those who died of casualties or diseases contracted in the service of the country should receive pensions. It was intended to apply to those who were actually the wives of seamen at the time of service. The argument could have no force, now, coming from those who opposed it in that case. Only $64,000 was required in the case he referred to, to pension the widows of those gallant men who met their fate upon the ocean; the widows of such men as Neale and Lewis—men who conferred honor upon their country, and who proved that the power of Great Britain was not invincible: these pensions were refused, while here it was proposed at one swoop to appropriate $380,000 to pension those who married soldiers long after the war had terminated.

Mr. BUCHANAN observed that discussion, at this stage of the bill, must be death to it; and, if he were to follow the example of the Senator from Mississippi, and go into the discussion of the question of the naval pension fund, and the propriety of pensioning the widows of naval officers, by the very consumption of time in the discussion the bill must necessarily be defeated.

His friend from Alabama was very much opposed to the bill, because, forsooth, (to use the language of the Senator from New Hampshire,) all the widows of revolutionary soldiers, who were married at any time previous to 1800, were not included. His expansive benevolence embraced the whole. He had told them that he would not vote for any, unless the whole were included. He (Mr. B) was not disposed, under existing circumstances, to go so far.

In regard to the question now before them, he believed that public sentiment was far in advance of the action of Congress. Many of the State Legislatures had moved in the matter; and he believed ninety-nine in a hundred of the people at large were favorable to the granting of such pensions as now proposed. Every person could point to cases, within his own immediate vicinity, of destitute widows of revolutionary soldiers, who are supported by the liberality of their friends; and who, in case the bill did not pass, must go the poor-house. Although he was opposed to extending the system of granting pensions, yet he thought this a class of cases which should not be neglected. It was admitted that those who were wives during the war ought to receive pensions; but, it was said, those who were married afterwards ought to be excluded. Was this so? Suppose it had been made optional with any one of those gallant men who served in the revolutionary war, whether he should receive a pension during his own life, or whether his widow, after his death, should receive it: what would have been his decision? Every one of them would have said, Relieve the distresses of the wife of my bosom. During my own life, I can afford her protection and support; but when that protection is withdrawn—when I am removed by death, and she is thrown defenceless on the world—then let her be taken under the protection of the Government which I have served. While he was opposed to the system of extending pensions to new cases, he thought there was much force in what was stated by the Senators from Massachusetts and Ohio. These widows had been in the habit of receiving the bounty of the Government, and they had not calculated upon that bounty being withdrawn; and if it should be withdrawn, they would be left infinitely more helpless and dependent than if they had never received a cent. He would ask his friend from Alabama if, for the purpose of manifesting his gratitude towards his friend far advanced in life, he had taken that friend under his immediate protection, and furnished to him or her an annuity for five years, whether he would consider it the part of an honorable man to abandon that friend at an advanced period of life, and deprive him of the bounty which his benevolence had bestowed? He thought to debate the bill would be to kill it.

The bill was reported to the Senate; when

Mr. McROBERTS said he should renew his proposition, which had failed in committee, to strike out "five years," and insert "one year." The next Congress could fully and fairly represent the wishes of the people; and they ought to be heard on the subject. The idea of spending money, when they were now without, and borrowing—and that, too, on the eve of a new Congress coming in—was too monstrous to be thought of.

[Mr. McR. was prevented, by a violent cold, and cough which accompanied it, from proceeding.]

Mr. BENTON said he was extremely sorry to perceive that the Senator from Illinois was unable, in consequence of the state of his health, to do justice to his feelings on this occasion. He sincerely sympathized with the honorable Senator, and would take up his argument just where the honorable Senator had stopped. This expiring Congress, now in the agonies of death, was continuing to incur debts for five years to come. It was like the blunder committed by Congress when they attempted to recharter the Bank of the United States for a period which would run into the representation under a new census and a new apportionment. Congress should do the legitimate business of its term, and nothing beyond. He thought the Senator from Illinois had taken a very forcible ground of objection. He was willing to extend pensions to those who were participants in the alarms, the dangers, and the sufferings of the Revolution, being actually the wives of soldiers or officers at the time; but he never was willing to extend them to a period since the Revolution. Persons might be pensioned under this act, who were not born at the time of the Revolution. There might have been widows, who were married at the age of thirteen, born since the surrender of Cornwallis, and who had had no share whatever in the perils and pains of the war; and yet, under this bill, they would be entitled to the bounty of the Government. In this way, the system might be carried down to the present time. An old revolutionary officer, just going out of the world, might marry a young girl for the purpose of entitling her to receive a pension; and she might live to draw that pension for eighty years. He thought the proposition of the Senator from Illinois was a very just and commendable one; and he would give it his hearty concurrence.

Mr. ALLEN said he thought there was very great force in the remarks made by the Senator from Illinois and the Senator from Missouri upon the propriety of leaving to a future Congress to legislate upon this matter, without depriving these widows in the mean time of their pension. He should vote for the motion, believing, as he did, that, in all the great questions of money and power, the people should be fully and thoroughly represented.

The question was then taken upon the amendment of Mr. McROBERTS, to strike out "five" years, and insert "one" year; and decided in the affirmative—yeas 24, nays 21, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Archer, Bagby, Bayard, Benton, Berrien, Calhoun, Clayton, Conrad, Crittenden, Dayton, Fulton, Graham, Henderson, Linn, McDuffie, McRoberts, Mangum, Miller, Tappan, Walker, Williams, Wright, and Young—24.

NAYS—Messrs. Barrow, Bates, Buchanan, Choate, Crafts, Evans, Huntington, Kerr, Merrick, Morehead, Porter, Rives, Simmons, Smith of Connecticut, Smith of Indiana, Sprague, Sturgeon, Tallmadge, White, Wilcox, and Woodbridge—21.

So the amendment was adopted.

Upon the passage of the bill, the yeas and nays were as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Bagby, Barrow, Bates, Buchanan, Choate, Crafts, Evans, Fulton, Huntington, Kerr, Linn, Merrick, Miller, Morehead, Porter, Sevier, Simmons, Smith of Connecticut, Smith of Indiana, Sturgeon, Tallmadge, White, Wilcox, and Woodbridge—26.

NAYS—Messrs. Benton, Berrien, Calhoun, Clayton, Crittenden, Cuthbert, Dayton, Graham, Henderson, King, McDuffie, McRoberts, Mangum, Tappan, Walker, Wright, and Young—17.

The Senate then took a recess until half-past 5 o'clock.

EVENING SESSION.

The PRESIDENT pro tem. laid before the body a message from the President of the United States, transmitting a report received from the director of the mint, and showing its operations for the year 1842; which was ordered to be printed.

Also, a communication from the State Department, enclosing information in relation to the commodities imported from foreign countries; which was ordered to be printed.

LIEUTENANT FREMONT'S EXPEDITION TO THE ROCKY MOUNTAINS.

A communication was received from the War Department, in answer to a call heretofore made for the report of Lieutenant Fremont's expedition to the Rocky Mountains.

Mr. LINN moved that it be printed for the use of the Senate; and also that one thousand extra copies be printed.

In support of his motion, Mr. L. said, that in the course of the last summer a very interesting expedition had been undertaken to the Rocky Mountains, ordered by Colonel Abert, chief of the Topographical Bureau, with the sanction of the Secretary at War, and executed by Lieutenant Fremont of the topographical engineers. The object of the expedition was to examine and report upon the rivers and the country between the frontiers of Missouri and the base of the Rocky Mountains; and especially to examine the character, and ascertain the latitude and longitude of the South Pass, the great crossing-place in these mountains on the way to the Oregon. All the objects of the expedition have been accomplished, and in a way to be beneficial to science, and instructive to the general reader, as well as useful to the Government.

Supplied with the best astronomical and barometrical instruments, well qualified to use them, and accompanied by twenty-five voyageurs, enlisted for the purpose at St. Louis, and trained to all the hardships and dangers of the prairies and the mountains, Mr. Fremont left the mouth of the Kansas, on the frontiers of Missouri, on the 10th of June; and, in the almost incredibly short space of four months, returned to the same point, without an accident to a man, and with a vast mass of useful observations, and many hundred specimens in botany and geology.

In executing his instructions, Mr. Fremont proceeded up the Kansas river far enough to ascertain its character, and then crossed over to the Great Platte, and pursued that river to its source in the mountains, where the Sweet Water (a head branch of the Platte) issues from the neighborhood of the South Pass. He reached the Pass on the 8th of August, and describes it as a wide and low depression in the mountains, where the ascent is as easy as that of the hill on which this Capitol stands, and where a plainly-beaten wagon road leads to the Oregon through the valley of Lewis's river, a fork of the Columbia. He went through the Pass, and saw the head-waters of the Colorado, of the Gulf of California; and, leaving the valleys to indulge a laudable curiosity, and to make some useful observations, and attended by four of his men, he climbed the loftiest peak of the Rocky Mountains, until then untrodden by any known human being; and, on the 15th of August, looked down upon ice and snow some thousand feet below, and traced in the distance the valleys of the rivers which, taking their rise in the same elevated ridge, flow in opposite directions to the Pacific ocean and to the Mississippi. From that ultimate point he returned by the valley of the Great Platte, following the stream in its whole course, and solving all questions in relation to its navigability, and the character of the country through which it flows.

Over the whole course of this extended route, barometrical observations were made by Mr. Fremont, to ascertain elevations both of the plains and of the mountains; astronomical observations were taken, to ascertain latitudes and longitudes; the face of the country was marked as arable or steril; the facility for travelling, and the practicability of routes, noted; the grand features of nature described, and some presented in drawings; military positions indicated; and a large contribution to geology and botany was made in the varieties of plants, flowers, shrubs, trees, and grasses, and rocks and earths, which were enumerated. Drawings of some grand and striking points, and a map of the whole route, illustrate the report, and facilitate the understanding of its details. Eight carts, drawn by two mules each, accompanied the expedition; a fact which attests the facility of travelling in this vast region. Herds of buffaloes furnished subsistence to the men; a short, nutritious grass, sustained the horses and mules. Two boys, (one of twelve* years of age, the other of eighteen,†) besides the enlisted men, accompanied the expedition, and took their share of its hardships; which proves that boys, as well as men, are able to traverse the country to the Rocky Mountains.

The result of all his observations, Mr. Fremont had condensed into a brief report—enough to make a document of some ninety or one hundred pages; and, believing that this document would be of general interest to the whole country, and beneficial to science, as well as useful to the Government, I move the printing of the extra number which has been named.

In making this motion, and in bringing this report to the notice of the Senate, I take a great pleasure in noticing the activity and importance of the Topographical Bureau. Under its skillful and vigilant head, [Colonel Abert,] numerous valuable and incessant surveys are made; and a mass of information collected of the highest importance to the country generally, as well as to the military branch of the public service. This report proves conclusively that the country, for several hundred miles from the frontier of Missouri, is exceedingly beautiful and fertile; alternate woodland and prairie, and certain portions well supplied with water. It also proves that the valley of the river Platte has a very rich soil, affording great facilities for emigrants to the west of the Rocky Mountains.

The printing was ordered.

The CHAIR here announced to the Senate that a mistake had been made in engrossing the amendments to the civil and diplomatic appropriation bill. The amendment adopted by the Senate, giving $500 additional to the mail agents of the Post Office Department, had been inadvertently overlooked; and it was engrossed at $1,000, as it came from the House. The bill had been returned to the other House.

Mr. EVANS suggested that the bill could be sent for; and he moved an order directing the Secretary to proceed to the House, and announce by message, the fact of the error, and the wish of the Senate that the bill should be returned. This order was agreed to.

On motion by Mr. WOODBRIDGE, the previous orders were postponed, and the Senate took up for consideration, as in committee of the whole, the bill for the protection of commerce on the western shores of Lake Michigan. The amendments of the Committee on Commerce having been adopted, the bill was reported to the Senate, and finally passed; the title having been amended by striking out the words "western shores."

Mr. HUNTINGTON moved the Senate to proceed to the consideration of executive business, but waived the motion on the suggestion of

Mr. MERRICK, on whose motion the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads was discharged from the further consideration of all matters now pending before it.

On motion by Mr. KERR, a similar discharge was made with reference to the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office.

On motion by Mr. HUNTINGTON, a similar discharge was made with reference to the Committee on Commerce.

On motion by Mr. BERRIEN, a similar discharge was made with reference to the Judiciary Committee.

On motion by Mr. SMITH of Indiana, a similar discharge was made with reference to the Committee on the Public Lands.

On motion by Mr. BAYARD, a similar discharge was made with reference to the Naval Committee.

On motion by Mr. TALLMADGE, a similar discharge was made with reference to all the remaining committees.

The joint resolution for the relief of Benjamin Ogle Tayloe, was taken up as in committee of the whole; and, having been amended on the suggestion of Mr. KING, was reported to the Senate, and ordered to be engrossed as amended.

TREASURY NOTE BILL.

The bill to authorize the re-issue of treasury notes, and for other purposes, having been returned from the House with a disagreement to the amendment of the Senate authorizing the funding of three and a half millions of the notes outstanding, to run for twenty years, was taken up for consideration.

Mr. EVANS said the amendment authorizing the funding of those notes was one of considerable importance; and he was strongly impressed with the propriety of insisting on it. He believed it was adopted by a unanimous vote of the Senate. He was entirely at a loss to know on what ground it was that the House refused to concur. He was strongly of the opinion that the law, to be effective, should pass in the form in which it was passed by the Senate. If it could not pass in that shape, it was absolutely necessary that it should pass in some form: that was dictated by every consideration of necessity.

Mr. WOODBURY concurred in the propriety of passing the bill in its present form; and, in accordance with that sense of propriety, he moved that the Senate insist on its amendment, and ask for a committee of conference.

The Senate insisted; and,

On motion by Mr. EVANS, the Chair was authorized to appoint a committee on the part of the Senate, to consist of three.

On motion by Mr. SMITH of Indiana, the previous orders were postponed, and the Senate took up for consideration, as in committee of the whole, House bill entitled "An act providing for the sale of certain lands in the States of Ohio and Michigan, ceded by the Wyandot Indians, and for other purposes."

Mr. SMITH of Indiana explained the provisions of the bill; it was to authorize the sale of the lands acquired by treaty from the Wyandot Indians.

Mr. WHITE said that, by the provisions of the treaty by which the land of the Wyandot Indians was ceded, the United States stipulated to pay those Indians for their improvements such sum as, upon appraisement, they were found to be worth; the appraisers to be appointed by the United States. These appraisers had awarded to the Indians $125,957 21. Mr. W. said the Secretary of War had recommended an appropriation to cover the amount of the award. He therefore moved to amend the bill under consideration, with an additional section, appropriating for that purpose the sum of $105,957 21. He remarked that $20,000 had been already appropriated for the purpose. This amount would make up the full award.

Mr. KING was opposed to paying such an enormous sum. They were told, in the discussion on the appropriation to pay for the land, that the amount required to pay for these improvements would not be more than $20,000. The sum paid for the land was enormous. Having approved of the sum stipulated for the land, they were now called upon to appropriate more than $125,000 for the improvements of a handful of Indians, which could not have been anything but huts and a few fruit trees. This sum was most enormous—unless, indeed, those Indians were even more civilized than the whites on the frontiers, and had erected for themselves splendid tenements, and laid out pleasure-grounds, abounding with beautiful shrubbery, and fountains, &c. Who would undertake to say that such was the case? No one. Who were the agents, and by whom were they appointed, who had awarded such an unreasonable amount for the mere huts of a handful of Indians?

Mr. WHITE replied that Moses H. Kirby and John Waters were the agents—one of whom, he knew, was reputed to be a most highminded and honorable man. The other he did not know.

Mr. KING continued his remarks, at some length, against the amendment. He considered the award a fraud. He hoped the amendment would not be agreed to, on the limited information they now possessed. He was as willing and as ready to do justice to the red man as the white; but he could not sanction such an award, believing it to be a fraud on the Government. No man in his senses, who knew anything of the Indian character, their mode of living, and the nature of the improvements, could believe, for a moment, that those improvements were worth anything like the amount proposed to be appropriated.

Mr. TAPPAN remarked that the Secretary of War should not have selected such men as would do injustice to the United States. But the appraisers had been selected according to the stipulations of the treaty; and they had made an award. How could they help themselves? They must fulfil their contract with the Indians. The United States contracted under the treaty to pay such sum for the improvements of those Indians, as appraisers, to be appointed by the Goverment, should award to them. The United States had exercised her rights under the treaty—had appointed appraisers to protect her interests. They have made the award. He (Mr. T.) would rather pay $100,000,000 than consent to a violation of treaty stipulation by this Government with the humblest tribe of Indians. If there had been proper officers appointed, it would have been managed better. If the people did not wish to be saddled with such enormous awards, they must see and know whom they put into power. The Wyandots were the innocent party; they were not instrumental in placing those men in office. He hoped, therefore, the amendment would prevail.

Mr. EVANS said this amendment had been discussed two or three times before; he hoped the Senate would, therefore, take a vote upon it. It was of the utmost importance that the Senate should proceed with other business.

*Randolph Benton, son of Senator Benton.

†Henry Brant, son of Col. Brant, of St. Louis, Mo.

Mr. WHITE said he felt no further interest in this matter, than a desire that the United States should fulfil its treaty obligations.

Mr. McDUFFIE said he did not regard this as an arbitration at all. There was no judgment binding on the United States. It was, in fact, merely an ex parte investigation for the information of the mind of the Executive.

Mr. SEVIER endeavored to show that it was an arbitrament binding on the United States.

The question was then taken on the proposed amendment, and it was disagreed to.

Mr. TAPPAN remarked that it was unwise to pass a bill to sell lands which they had not possession of. They could not get possession of the lands, until every provision of the treaty was fulfilled.

The bill was then reported to the Senate, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BATES, from the Committee on Pensions, reported back, without amendment, and with a recommendation that it do pass, House bill entitled "An act for the relief of Joseph Ellery;" and on his motion, it was taken up, and considered as in committee of the whole, reported to the Senate, and finally passed.

On motion by Mr. SEVIER, the bill for the relief of Thomas King, which had been returned from the House with an amendment, was taken up, and the amendment was concurred in.

The joint resolution from the House, explanatory of the act for the relief of Thomas King, was taken up, as in committee of the whole, considered, reported to the Senate, and finally passed.

On motion by Mr. EVANS, the Senate took up for consideration the message from the House returning the civil and diplomatic appropriation bill, with certain disagreeing votes. The one was a disagreement to the amendment of the Senate restoring the Congress printing, for this Congress alone, to the prices fixed by the joint resolution of 1819—that is, to allow Gales & Seaton, printers to the House, and Thomas Allen, printer to the Senate, twenty per cent. over the prices they contracted to do the printing for.

Mr. EVANS moved that the Senate insist on all its amendments, and ask a committee of conference.

Mr. WRIGHT moved to except the amendment giving twenty per cent. additional for the Congress printing, and demanded the yeas and nays on it. They were ordered.

Mr. ALLEN wished the Senate to bear in mind that at 10 o'clock at night, on the last night of the session, they were called to vote on a proposition to give to Gales & Seaton and Thomas Allen, printers to this Congress, twenty per cent. more than they agreed to give them in the contract for doing the Congress printing. If there was any justice in giving more than the contract called for, why did not the party (the Whig party) which was friendly to the proposition, go a little farther, and give fifteen per cent. to Blair & Rives for executing the printing of the last Congress. Those gentlemen executed the printing for fifteen per cent. below the prices of the resolution of 1819—and fifteen per cent. less than was now proposed to give the present printers. Where was the justice in such proceeding?

The question on insisting on this amendment was then put, and decided in the affirmative—yeas 26, nays 20, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Archer, Barrow, Bates, Bayard, Berrien, Choate, Clayton, Conrad, Crittenden, Dayton, Evans, Graham, Henderson, Kerr, Mangum, Merrick, Miller, Morehead, Phelps, Porter, Simmons, Smith of Indiana, Sprague, Tallmadge, White, and Woodbridge—26.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Bagby, Benton, Buchanan, Calhoun, Cuthbert, Fulton, King, Linn, McDuffie, McRoberts, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Sturgeon, Tappan, Walker, Wilcox, Williams, Woodbury, and Wright—20.

The Senate then insisted on its amendment, giving Thomas Allen and Blair & Rives the full price for the printing of the Compendium to the Sixth Census.

The Senate then receded from its amendment legalizing the appointment of certain clerks in the State Department.

On motion by Mr. EVANS, the Chair was authorized to appoint three conferees on the part of the Senate, to confer with a like number on the part of the House, touching the disagreeing votes on the remainder of the amendments.

On motion by Mr. MERRICK, a committee of conference was appointed by the Chair, to meet a like committee on the part of the House, to consider the disagreeing votes between the two Houses on the bill to reduce the rates of postage to the Federal coin.

THE MISSION TO CHINA.

On motion by Mr. ARCHER, the previous orders were postponed, and the Senate took up for consideration, as in committee of the whole, the bill to provide the means for future intercourse between the United States and the Government of China, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the sum of forty thousand dollars be, and the same is hereby, appropriated and placed at the disposal of the President of the United States, to enable him to establish the future commercial relations between the United States and the Chinese empire on terms of national equal reciprocity; the said sum to be accounted for by the President, under the restrictions and in the manner prescribed by the act of 1st of July, 1790, entitled "An act providing the means of intercourse between the United States and foreign nations."

Mr. WRIGHT desired to know why so large a sum as $40,000 was necessary to be appropriated in this case.

Mr. ARCHER said he would answer the inquiry of the gentleman from New York. The question was a very fair and reasonable one, and one which he had anticipated. The bill provided that $40,000 should be appropriated for the purpose of establishing a commercial intercourse with China. It was not intended that the salary of the minister, or agent, together with his outfit, should exceed $18,000, the amount usually appropriated for such purposes. But it would be perceived that there was a considerable variance between this and other cases, by reason of the remoteness of the country to which our agent was to be sent. The object could hardly be accomplished in a single year; indeed, from the singular usages of the people of China, it was not certain in what manner our minister would be received; and a sum, therefore, much larger than the ordinary outfit of a minister would be required. A provision would have to be made for an interpreter; and it was very well known to the Senate that, in our intercourse hitherto with Mahometan countries, it had always been necessary to bestow presents. It could not be known for what length of time the negotiations would be in progress. Supposing them to occupy two years, this appropriation would be insufficient. This, he thought, was a sufficient answer to the inquiry of the gentleman from New York; and he hoped this bill, to which he thought very great importance should be attached, would meet the general approval of the Senate.

Mr. WRIGHT said the explanation was not at all satisfactory to him, as to the necessity for appropriating so large a sum. It seemed to him that the same argument would require that they should appropriate for a minister to England a sum sufficient for the whole time he was to be kept there. The appropriation for an agent in China could be voted every year, in the same manner as appropriations for ministers at all foreign courts.

Mr. BENTON took many objections to this mission, to the bill which provided for it, and to the motives in which it was founded. He considered the mission unnecessary for any public purpose; he held the bill to be fraudulently contrived, to cheat the Senate out of its control over the appointments under it, and to hide the waste of the money it appropriated; and he considered the motives for the mission to be wholly personal and individual, and invented as an indemnification to one person for vacating his place for the benefit of another.

That there was no necessity for a treaty with China, was proved by the fact that our trade with that country had been going well without one for half a century, and was now growing and increasing constantly. It was a trade conducted on the simple and elementary principle of "here is one," and "there is the other"—all ready-money and hard-money work—no credit-system, no paper-money. For a long time this trade took nothing but silver dollars. At present it is taking some other articles, and especially a goodly quantity of Missouri lead. This has taken place without a treaty, and without an agent at $40,000 expense. All things are going on well between us and the Chinese. Our relations are purely commercial, conducted on the simplest principles of trade, and unconnected with political views. China has no political connexion with us. She is not within the system, or circle, of American policy. She can have no designs upon us, or views in relation to us; and we have no need of a minister to watch and observe her conduct. Politically and commercially, the mission is useless. Religiously, it must be still more so; and even if our form of government admitted of missions to propagate the faith, an unfrocked priest would not be the instrument to do it. The mission is not created for the public service, but for an individual. The gentleman is "cut and dried" who is to have it. It is made for a man; and he is waiting to take the place the instant it is created.

The bill was a studied fraud. It provided for sending an agent to China, without fixing his grade or compensation: it placed $40,000 in his hands, and exempted him from accounting for it. It was fraudulent in three points: in the appointment of the agent—in the amount of his salary—and in the accountability for his expenditures. By the Constitution, all ministers are to be appointed by the Senate; but this minister to China is to be called an agent, and sent out by the President without the consent of the Senate; and thus, by imposing a false name upon the minister, defraud the Senate out of their control over the appointment. The enormity of the sum shows that the mission is to be more expensive than any one ever sent from the United States; and that it is to be one of the first grade, or of a higher grade than any known in our country. Nine thousand dollars per annum, and the same for an outfit, is the highest compensation known to our service; yet this $40,000 mission may double that amount, and still the minister be only called an agent, for the purpose of cheating the Senate out of its control over the appointment. The bill is fraudulent in relation to the compensation to be given to this ambassadorial agent. No sum is fixed, but he is to take what he pleases for himself and his suite. He and they are to help themselves; and, from the amount allowed, they may help themselves liberally. In all other cases, salaries and compensations are fixed by law, and graduated by time; here, there is no limit either of money or time. This mission goes by the job—forty thousand dollars for the job—without regard to time or cost. A summer's work, or a year's work, it is all the same thing—it is a job, and is evidently intended to enable a gentleman, who loves to travel in Europe and Asia, to extend his travels to the Celestial Empire at the expense of the United States, and to write a book. The settlement of the accounts is a fraud upon the treasury. In all cases of foreign missions, except where secret services are to be performed, and spies and informers to be dealt with, the accounts are settled at the Treasury Department, by the proper accounting officers; when secret services are to be covered, the fund out of which they are paid is then called the contingent foreign intercourse fund; and are settled at the State Department, upon a simple certificate that the money has been applied according to its intention. It was in this way that the notorious John Henry obtained his $50,000 during the late war; and that various other sums have been paid out to secret agents at different times. To this I do not object. Every Government, in its foreign intercourse, must have recourse to some agents, and have the benefit of some services, which would be defeated if made public; and which must, therefore, be veiled in secrecy, and paid for privately. This must happen in all Governments; but not so in this case of the Chinese mission. Here, secrecy is intended for what our own minister, his secretary, and his whole suite, are to receive. Not only what they may give in bribes to Chinese, but what they take in pay to themselves, is to be a secret. All is secret and irresponsible! And it will not do to assimilate this mission to the oldest Government in the world, to the anomalous and anonymous missions to revolutionary countries,

Such an analogy has been attempted in defence of this mission, and South American examples cited; but the cases are not analogous. Informal agencies, with secret objects, are proper to revolutionary objects; but here is to be a public mission, and an imposing one—the grandest ever sent out from the United States—and the London mission vacated, in order to supply the man that is to fill it. To attempt to assimilate such a mission to a John Henry case, or to a South American agency, is absurd and impudent; and is a fraud upon the system of accountability to which all our missions are subjected.

The expense of the mission is great and unparalleled. It is double the expense of a mission to the first courts of Europe; and, besides that, involves the expense of a new minister to England. The Chinese minister and suite are to have $40,000; the gentleman who goes to London in place of Mr. Everett will have near $20 000. That gentleman is to be the Secretary of State; and thus $60,000 are to be paid to get him to London! to get a gentleman to London, whose name cannot be submitted to the Senate for that appointment. I repeat it: this whole conception of a Chinese mission, now brought forward for the first time in the history of our country, is a contrivance to vacate the London mission, in the recess of the Senate, in order to fill it with a gentleman who might not be able to pass the Senate. This is the object! and $60,000 for such an object, when the treasury is bankrupt, is attempted—when retrenchment is proclaimed—and when 12½ per centum is proposed to be taken from the salaries of all officers, civil, naval, and military!

I repeat it: this mission is not created for the country, but invented for a man; and he is now waiting to take it, and to go and bump his head nineteen times against the ground, in order to purchase the privilege of standing up before his Celestial Majesty.

And this is our work in the last night of this Congress. It is now midnight: and, like the midnight which preceded the departure of the elder Adams from the Government, the whole time is spent in making and filling offices. Providing for favorites, and feeding out of the public crib, is the only work of those whose brief reign is drawing to a close, and who have been already compelled by public sentiment to undo a part of their work. The bankrupt act is repealed by the Congress that made it; the distribution act has shared the same fate; and, if they had another session to sit, the mandamus act against the States, the habeas corpus against the States, this Chinese mission, and all the other acts, would be undone. It would be the true realization of the story of the queen who unravelled at night the web that she wove during the day. As it is, enough has been done and undone to characterize this Congress—to entitle it to the name of Ulysses' wife—not because (like the virtuous Penelope) it resisted seduction—but because, like her, its own hands unravelled its own work.

Mr. ARCHER desired to say a very few words, in order to allay the apprehensions of the Senator from Missouri, who seemed so exceedingly disturbed at the idea that the formation of commercial relations with China could only be purchased at the price of the sacrifice of the dignity of this country in the person of our ambassador. He could assure the honorable Senator that the sacrifices which his patriotic enthusiasm had led him to apprehend were not likely to be realized. It was perfectly true, as the honorable Senator had stated, (for he was seldom mistaken in historical matters,) that hitherto sacrifices of dignity, amounting to ignominy, had been required by that nation; but he had the pleasure of informing the honorable gentleman from Missouri that the treaty stipulations between that country and Great Britain provide for the abolition of those ceremonies.

[Mr. BENTON. Very good! and our minister can creep in behind the British minister, and claim the protection of Queen Victoria's petticoats.]

The honorable Senator himself, he was sure, if he would condescend to accept the mission, would be enabled to render to this country the signal service of opening a trade with three hundred and fifty millions of people, without any such sacrifice of dignity—without so much as a single bump of the head. But, seriously, he would appeal to the whole Senate to say whether it was not desirable to negotiate commercial arrangements with China, especially as she had expressed a desire to extend to this country the benefits of trade upon equal terms with Great Britain. He put it to the good sense of the honorable Senator from Missouri, how he could reconcile it with his ideas of justice to this country, to throw obstacles in the way of effecting an object so desirable? The expense would not be, in any considerable degree, greater than that of establishing intercourse with other nations. There need be no apprehensions on the score of a misapplication of the money. It was not to be in the character of an ordinary mission; it was an extraordinary mission; and in consideration of the distance, and the peculiar character of the Government, it would be necessary that a larger sum should be appropriated for its expenses than was required for ordinary missions. The Senator must see that the mission, in itself, was a matter of great importance; and, if successful, would result in the attainment of great advantages to this country.

Mr. BENTON thought they had enough to do, without meddling with the Celestial Empire.

Mr. BAYARD moved to lay the bill upon the table.

Upon this motion, the yeas and nays were taken as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bagby, Bayard, Benton, Conrad, Cuthbert, Fulton, Henderson, Linn, McRoberts, Mangum, Miller, Porter, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Sturgeon, Tappan, White, and Wright—18.

NAYS—Messrs. Archer, Barrow, Bates, Berrien, Buchanan, Choate, Clayton, Crafts, Crittenden, Dayton, Evans, Graham, Huntington, Kerr, Morehead, Phelps, Rives, Simmons, Smith of Indiana, Sprague, Tallmadge, Woodbridge, and Woodbury—24.

Mr. BENTON then moved to strike out all after the word "reciprocity"—the effect of which would be to leave the appropriation without any restriction.

Upon this motion, the yeas and nays being taken, resulted as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Bagby, Bayard, Benton, Cuthbert, Fulton, Henderson, King, Linn, McRoberts, Mangum, Miller, Porter, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Sturgeon, Tappan, White, and Wright—19.

NAYS—Messrs. Archer, Barrow, Bates, Berrien, Buchanan, Choate, Clayton, Conrad, Crafts, Crittenden, Dayton, Evans, Graham, Huntington, Kerr, McDuffie, Morehead, Phelps, Rives, Simmons, Smith of Indiana, Sprague, Tallmadge, and Woodbridge—24.

Mr. WOODBURY said, being himself friendly to the passage of the bill, he wished to see it contain certain limitations;—they could, at all events, do no harm. One which he would propose was, to provide that the compensation to be given to any one person should not exceed $9,000.

Mr. ARCHER said he should have no sort of objection to the introduction of such an amendment, except that it would lead to the necessity of sending the bill back to the House of Representatives; and, if the gentleman would refer to the act by which these appropriations were restricted, he would find that his object was already attained by the bill as it stood.

Mr. WOODBURY said the reason why he thought it better to introduce into this bill the specific provision, was, that the act which was referred to had expired.

Mr. WALKER said there could be no possible difference where reference was made to a particular act, whether that act had expired or not. The provisions of the act referred to would apply, by whatever name the agent might be designated;—whether he might be called commissioner, agent, or ambassador, the provisions of the act would apply as strictly as if they were embodied in the new act.

Mr. ARCHER said this was precisely his view, and he did not, therefore, conceive an amendment to be necessary. If, however, it was thought requisite, he had not the slightest objection that it should be so amended.

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. BENTON said the language of the bill was studiously ambiguous. Whether the person to be employed was to be a commissioner, a charge, or an agent, was not expressed. He now desired to know whether it was to be understood that the person or persons to be appointed, were to be appointed by the President without the consent of the Senate.

Mr. ARCHER said he had to answer to that, that the gentleman himself was just as competent to inform the Senate upon this point as he (Mr. ARCHER) was. He had no information regarding it; but he would put it to the honorable Senator to say of what importance the designation of the person was, provided the salary was restricted so as not to exceed $9,000. Would it be any gratification to the gentleman, if he informed him that he was to be called plenipotentiary?

Mr. BENTON said he deemed himself sufficiently justified by the answer of the honorable Senator in making the inquiry. He did not expect that that Senator was cognisant of the counsels of the framers of that bill. He (Mr. B.) had a curiosity to know who it was that was to be sent upon this mission, and it was his right to inquire. He was not disposed to sit there and see the Senate defrauded of the rights which belonged to it, in passing upon an appointment of the highest grade in the gift of the Government, where $40,000 was to be appropriated, and without any accountability.

Mr. CONRAD said he would make a motion, which would obviate the objection of the honorable Senator. He submitted a motion, to the effect that no agent be appointed without the consent of the Senate.

Upon this motion, the yeas and nays were taken, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Archer, Bagby, Bayard, Benton, Calhoun, Conrad, Crafts, Crittenden, Cuthbert, Dayton, Fulton, Graham, Henderson, King, Linn, McRoberts, Mangum, Merrick, Miller, Phelps, Porter, Rives, Sprague, Sturgeon, Tappan, Walker, White, Williams, Woodbury, and Wright—31.

NAYS—Messrs. Barrow, Bates, Choate, Clayton, Evans, Kerr, Smith of Indiana, Tallmadge, and Woodbridge—9.

The bill was then reported to the Senate; and, being engrossed, was read the third time, and passed.

A message was received from the House, informing the Senate that the House adhered to its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate to the civil and diplomatic appropriation bill, and had agreed to a Committee of Conference.

Mr. EVANS, from the Committee of Conference on the part of the Senate, on the disagreeing vote of the House to the amendment of the Senate to the treasury note bill, authorizing the funding of three and a half millions of treasury notes, reported that the conferees on the part of the two Houses had agreed to recommend to the House to recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate; and to the Senate to agree to an amendment to the amendment, providing that any stock issued in lieu of the treasury notes falling due shall be redeemable in ten years.

The Senate concurred in the report of the committee.

Mr. MERRICK now moved that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

BILL NO. 548.

Mr. MOREHEAD hoped the Senator from Maryland would permit him to make a motion to proceed to the consideration of the bill from the House (No. 548) which had been reported from the Committee on Retrenchment, with several amendments. This was the last chance that would offer for taking it up.

Mr. MERRICK said he could not yield; 548 could be disposed of after they had finished the executive business.

[This was the last that the reporters heard of bill No. 548.]

The motion of Mr. MERRICK was then agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider executive business. After some time spent therein, the Senate resumed legislative business.

The door leading to the reporter's gallery not having been opened for some time after the Senate resumed legislative business, the reporters are unable to state precisely what occurred between the resumption of business and the admission of the reporters to the gallery. When they entered,

Mr. KING was on the floor, denouncing, with much warmth, the proposition to give the printers of the present Congress 20 per cent. more for executing the public printing than they had contracted for. He looked upon it as a most corrupt proceeding—a robbery committed upon the pockets of the people.

The reporters now understood that it was the report of the Committee of Conference on the disagreeing votes on the civil and diplomatic bill, that was under discussion.

Mr. EVANS said, if it was the object of gentlemen to defeat the bill, they could no doubt effect it by continuing the discussion. For his part, he had no such object, and should therefore not say another word.

Mr. WRIGHT observed, that having taken a considerable part in this debate last night, he was perhaps obnoxious to the inference to be drawn from the Senator's remarks. He should not, however, now occupy the time of the Senate, except merely to ask if he was right in certain facts which he proposed now to state. And the first fact which he supposed to exist was, that the printers for the House of Representatives of the last Congress were paid 15 per cent. below the rates of printing authorized by the resolution of 1819. The next fact was, that the printers of the House of Representatives of the present Congress contracted to do the printing at 5 per cent. below the rates of printing for the last Congress. And the next fact was, that the provision now introduced into this bill proposes to give the present printers 20 per cent. above the price stipulated by their own contract.

If he was right in these simple facts—and he believed he was—there was another question in reference to compensating the printers of Congress for work other than that of contract work for the House. And that question was in relation to both the present printers of the Senate and the late printers, in connexion with the subject of printing the Compendium of the Census.

The same majority who wish to add 20 per cent. to the contract price of printing for the present printers, deny to the late printers either their contract price, or the expenses out of pocket in doing the work of their contract. And this refusal was grounded, as an honorable Senator had admitted and avowed, on the assumption that the late printers to Congress had made themselves so rich by their contract as printers, at prices 15 per cent. below the rates of the resolution of 1819, that they could have no claim on the charity of Congress to do them even the justice of paying them their due. Now, he believed it was very true that those gentlemen had become rich on the fair profits of their contract as printers for Congress. He was even willing to say, with the gentlemen opposite, that they got all they contracted for, and they deserved nothing from the charity of Congress. But if it be so—that the late printers, at rates 15 per cent. below the rates of 1819, made a fortune out of their contract; and that the present printers of the House of Representatives had, previously, for a period at least five times as long, enjoyed the printing contracts at the rates of 1819, and therefore should have made a fortune as much larger than that of the late printers as their time was longer, and their prices were higher;—on what principle of common sense, or reasonable pretence, did they now come forward asking Congress for this charity?

He was told, indeed, that the argument out of doors was, that their contract with the present Congress was a losing contract—that the prices did not afford them a fair compensation for the work they did. Well, if that really was so, the jobs must have been vastly more extensive, which the late printers had to do, if they enabled them in two or three sessions to make ample fortunes with barely 5 per cent. more than the rates contracted for by the present printers. But here again comes another question of fact: were the printing jobs executed by the printers of the late Congress really more extensive, or of greater magnitude, than those executed by the printers of the present Congress? And he met this question at once, by an unqualified assertion that they were not. He had the fact from an intelligent member of the other House—an observant man, on whose judgment the fullest reliance might be placed—that not only the ordinary printing for this Congress was as extensive as that of any Congress for the last twenty years; but that the extra numbers of copies ordered of documents deemed important, were more frequent and greater than the average of the whole twenty years. So much, then, for the justice, equity, and reasonableness of this claim of 20 per cent. additional on the prices of printing contracted for by the printers of the House of Representatives for this Congress.

Now, he was very willing to admit that the printer of the Senate was not to be considered as standing on the same ground. The rules and practice of the two Houses have not been at all in comparison. He was ready to say, in all candor, that not only had the ordinary printing of the Senate been considerably curtailed, but that, in consequence of the reference of matters heretofore considered subjects for printing to a Committee on Printing, the number of extra copies of general documents was not as great as the printer might have expected. But he believed the usual practice was still pursued in regard to ordering the standard extra copies of particular documents—such as the President's message and accompanying documents, &c.; from which the main profits of the printer were derived.

He would not, however, take up the time of the Senate, further than to say, that it certainly was not unreasonable of those who were unable to perceive any just ground for this claim, to ask to record their names against a proposition to bestow a gift upon printers who have had such opportunities of making their fortunes, merely because they were either neglectful of advantages in their own hands, or improvident in reaping the benefits they were afforded.

Mr. WOODBURY inquired of the Chair who were the Committee of Conference?

The CHAIR replied: On the part of the House, Messrs. FILLMORE, BOTTS, and G. DAVIS. On the part of the Senate, Messrs. EVANS, TALLMADGE, and SEVIER.

Mr. WOODBURY then rose and remarked that his purpose was merely to observe that it appeared to him the Senate now proposed to vote away voluntarily, as a gift, thirty or forty thousand dollars out of borrowed money. It could not even be said that a claim had been set up by anybody for this gift. There was no memorial; no petition; no case proved; no evidence to show that the printers had suffered loss by their contract. There was nothing but a vague and general supposition of gentlemen, who knew nothing of the details of the printing business—resting, merely, on the assertions of the individuals who were to be the beneficiaries of the gift. If there had been a petition or a memorial setting up a claim, it could have been referred to a committee; and some investigation might have been made. There might have been a report from the Committee on Claims; and if a bill was presented, it would have had to go through the ordinary stages of legislation, giving a full opportunity for sifting its merits; and there could be no doubt of justice being done to both the claimant and the public. But, instead of that, as presumptive evidence that the proposition could not stand the test of scrutiny, suddenly, on the last night of the session, it is introduced as a rider on an appropriation bill, which it is well known must be passed; and, without time for deliberation, inquiry, or reflection, a large sum is voted away, without being subjected to practical legislation at all. It was, to say the least of it, exceedingly irregular. If the party had suffered any grievance by transactions with Congress, why not take the course required of every other citizen, and apply in due form, at a seasonable period of the session, by petition and memorial. If the claim was sound and good, it would be sure to meet with a fair report from the proper standing committee. But here nothing of the kind was done, evidently because there was neither just ground of complaint nor reasonable claim. Without that testimony of claim required from every other citizen, by a mere rider on a general appropriation bill, a large gift is made to an individual, (for it is not shown that it is anything else than a gift;) and that, too, under circumstances so suspicious and indefensible, that it cannot fail to meet public condemnation. Gentlemen on the opposite side, under all the circumstances, ought, for their own sakes, to recede at once from their amendment. It is a glaring act of abuse of the legislative powers, of injustice to the public, and of inexcusable burden on the treasury. It could not be defended on the ground that riders were quite common on appropriation bills; for never till now did he recollect of any rider being put upon an appropriation bill, unless it was the substance of a matured, specific bill, thoroughly investigated and previously discussed, or recommended by a report of some committee. Nothing of this kind had been done in regard to this proposition. It was a matter of mere gratuity, kept out of sight till the last moment, and then suddenly pressed forward in a manner that defied either investigation, deliberation, or opposition. No possible injustice can be done to the party by letting the matter lie over, to undergo the ordinary course of legislation hereafter.

Mr. WALKER remarked, that there was a great deal of ordinary legislative business yet to be disposed of, for the despatch of which but a few hours of the session yet remained. He did not even allude to the large quantity of executive business to be disposed of, but to the most important bills of the session, awaiting the action of the Senate. It was plain, then, that the vote should be taken without further debate. He should vote with his friends on this occasion now, as he had done from the beginning, in relation to this proposition. But he prayed that the vote should now be taken.

The question was on concurring with the report of the Committee of Conference.

The report was read. It recommends:

1st. That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate, increasing the pay of the printers to the present Congress to the rates allowed by the joint resolution of 1819.

2d. That the Senate recede from its amendment, increasing the pay of T. Allen, and of Blair & Rives, for printing the Compendium of the Sixth Census. But the committee also recommends the adoption of a clause, providing that nothing contained in this bill shall operate as a bar to the claims of Allen and Blair & Rives, hereafter, for the full amount of compensation for executing the printing of the Compendium.

3d. That the House recede from its disagreement to the Senate's amendment, by which the appropriation for the salaries of the Recorder and Solicitor of the General Land Office is retained.

4th. That the House and Senate recede from the several amounts named by them as the salaries of travelling agents of the Post Office Department; and that the sum of $1,250 be fixed as the annual pay of those officers.

A division of the question was demanded.

The CHAIR said he had examined with much anxiety the subject of the division of a question on the report of a Committee of Conference, and had come to the conclusion, on the reasonableless of the case, that it would be exceedingly embarrassing to admit of any such division. He hoped, therefore, it would meet the approval of the Senate that he should decide that the question did not admit of a division.

The call for the division of the question was not urged; and the yeas and nays having been called for, and ordered, the question was taken on concurring with the report of the Committee of Conference, and decided in the affirmative—yeas 27, nays 17, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Archer, Barrow, Bates, Bayard, Berrien, Choate, Clayton, Conrad, Crafts, Crittenden, Dayton, Evans, Graham, Henderson, Kerr, Mangum, Merrick, Miller, Morehead, Phelps, Porter, Rives, Simmons, Smith of Indiana, Tallmadge, White, and Woodbridge—27.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Bagby, Benton, Buchanan, Calhoun, Cuthbert, Fulton, King, Linn, McRoberts, Sturgeon, Tappan, Walker, Wilcox, Williams, Woodbury, and Wright—17.

On motion by Mr. PORTER, the Senate resumed the consideration, as in committee of the whole, of the bill for the relief of Thomas Weaver and Jacob Heyberger, sureties of the Norristown Railroad Company.

Mr. PORTER withdrew the amendment he proposed, to add, as an additional section to this bill, the bill permitting railroad iron to be imported free of duty.

The bill was then reported to the Senate, and passed.

On motion by Mr. WRIGHT, leave was granted to withdraw from the files the petition and papers of Sarah Barker.

On motion by Mr. ARCHER, leave was granted to withdraw from the files the petition and papers of Richard Harris and Nimrod Farrow.

On motion by Mr. MERRICK, leave was granted to withdraw the papers of William Jones.

On motion by Mr. BUCHANAN, leave was granted to withdraw the papers of Mr. McMurtrie from the files.

On motion, the Senate, about 10 o'clock, proceeded to the consideration of executive business; and whatever of legislative business the Senate transacted after that hour, the reporters had no means of ascertaining, not having had access to the gallery. They remained in and about the vestibule and rotundo till half-past 2 o'clock, a. m., at which hour the doors of the Senate were thrown open; but that body had then closed its labors.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Friday, March 3.

The reading of the journal of yesterday was in part dispensed with.

Mr. LOWELL presented the petition of Byron W. Darling, and 144 other citizens of Blue Hill, Maine, praying Congress for an additional duty on sawed lumber, spars, piles, wood, bark, &c., from the British provinces; which was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

On motions severally made by Messrs. CARUTHERS and BIRDSEYE, the 16th and 17th joint rules were suspended, so as to admit certain private bills to be sent to the Senate and the President.

COTTON RIGGING.

Mr. PICKENS offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy report to the next Congress all the evidence and facts that can be obtained in relation to the fitness and use of cotton as an article for sails and roping in the navy, and shipping of the country; and, also, that the Secretary of War report to the next Congress on the fitness of the same article for tents, &c.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON offered as an amendment the following:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy inform this House what has caused the delay in making the annual statement, required by the resolution of the House of August 24, 1842, showing the "amount of expenditure of each vessel for the preceding year, including all expenses in repair thereof, and for the armament and equipment thereof, and all expenses in keeping her afloat, if afloat; or in dock, if lying up; also, the number of days during the year that each ship was actually at sea; and that a similar report of each ship hereafter built or purchased be made, so as to exhibit an annual and aggregate account of the costs and expenses of each ship, and the service rendered by it to the country; and, also, specifying the amount of materials, as well as the amount for labor in the building or repairing each ship;" which said annual statement is to be made the "first week in January in each year, or as early thereafter as practicable."

Mr. WISE objected to the amendment, and it was not received.

The resolution was then adopted.

Mr. LINN, from the Committee on Public Expenditures, made a report. Mr. L. offered a resolution calling for information as to the number of defaulters since March, 1841; but objection was made.

Mr. STANLY wished the House to take up a bill for the relief of Mrs. Mary W. Thompson, widow of the late Colonel Thompson.

Mr. TALIAFERRO made a speech in behalf of Nancy Poleriski.

The bill for her relief was taken up, and passed; and the rules suspended, so as to permit it to be sent to the President.

Mr. STANLY moved to take up the bill above mentioned, (for the relief of Mrs. Thompson.)

The bill was taken up, and passed.

Mr. J. R. INGERSOLL made a report, from the Committee of Ways and Means, embodying a plan for the classification of the officers and clerks of the Government: laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

PRINTING CHARTS.

Mr. J. R. INGERSOLL offered a resolution, making it the duty of the Clerk to furnish fifty copies of all maps and charts furnished by the Topographical Bureau, to that bureau; and also copies of all scientific documents printed by order of the House.

Mr. I. stated that these officers were in the habit of preparing maps and charts for Congress, which were printed, and they received no copies whatever.

Mr. FILLMORE offered an amendment, authorizing the printing of the charts accompanying the report from the War Department in relation to lake harbors—provided the cost of the same shall not exceed the cost of the paper and press work used.

The amendment was agreed to; and the resolution, as amended, was adopted.

COMMERCIAL AND FINANCIAL STATISTICS.

Mr. SHIELDS offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of State be, and he is hereby, required to procure, through the consular and diplomatic agents of this Government abroad, and such other means as to him may seem most suitable, full and accurate information as to the wholesale and retail prices in foreign markets, during the year commencing on the 1st day of December last, of all commodities upon which duties are levied under existing laws, as well as of such as are imported free of duty—with the rates of insurance, freight, and commissions, usually charged at the places of export upon said commodities, when imported into this country; the modes and terms of sale customary there; the average rates of exchange during each month in said year; and the true par of exchange between this and each foreign country: also, as to the duties of export and import; and, as far as practicable, the various internal taxes levied upon such commodities, either in a crude, partially manufactured, or wholly complete state; together with the rates of wages in the various branches and occupations of labor and of personal service in the business of commerce and trade. And it shall be his duty, also, to procure, from said consuls and diplomatic agents, full and regular files of price-current sheets, for said year, at each of the most important foreign markets; and such other documents and publications as may exhibit truly the information called for in this resolution—which shall be transmitted to this House at the next session of Congress; and from which, together with the reports received from said agents, and such other information as may be obtained, he shall compile, and have printed, for the use of this House, a document, embodying all the information called for, arranged in such manner as to be most convenient for reference and comparison—exercising special care, in all instances, to give said information in Federal currency, weights, and measures.

Mr. BRIGGS offered the following as an amendment:

Resolved, That the Clerk cause to be prepared a general statistical statement of the funding system of the United States and of Great Britain, by Jonathan Elliot, to be accompanied by such tabular facts of other nations, touching the same subject, as may tend to more fully illustrate said statement.

Mr. MERIWETHER wished to know how much less than ten thousand dollars this latter scheme would cost.

No answer was heard

The amendment was agreed to, and the resolution, as amended, adopted.

The SPEAKER submitted a series of executive communications; which were laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

At the instance of Mr. POPE, the bill for the relief of George Harrison was taken up and passed.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. UNDERWOOD called up the bills reported from the Committee for the District of Columbia; and, after some opposition, the following were passed;

The bill to provide for the completion of the lunatic asylum in Washington City.

The bill to provide for the completion of the Potomac bridge.

The bill making an appropriation for the support of the lunatics now in the Baltimore Asylum, until the asylum in this city shall be completed.

The bill incorporating the orphan asylum and female free school in Alexandria.

POST ROUTES.

Mr. W. SMITH moved to take up the bill from the Senate to repeal certain parts of the act of 31st August, 1842, establishing certain post routes; which bill was reported from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, with a recommendation that it be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. FILLMORE objected.

Mr. W. SMITH moved a suspension of the rules; but the motion was not carried.

Mr. S. said he had obtained a decision, and was satisfied.

Mr. GWIN moved that the House go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. A. V. BROWN endeavored to persuade the House to take up and pass the bill for the relief of Walker, Caruthers, & Co.

A message was received from the Senate, announcing the suspension by that body of the 17th joint rule, which prohibits bills which pass to-day from being sent to the President.

The resolution of the Senate suspending this rule was agreed to.

Mr. GWIN still insisting on his motion to go into committee, it was put and lost.

RATES OF POSTAGE.

The act to reduce the rates of postage was taken up; the question being on the disagreement of the Senate to the amendments of the House.

Mr. BRIGGS moved that the House insist on its amendments; and Under the operation of the previous question, the motion was decided in the affirmative.

GENERAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

A message was received from the Senate, by Asbury Dickins, esq., their Secretary, returning the civil and diplomatic appropriation bill, with certain amendments; and,

On motion of Mr. FILLMORE, the same was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. FILLMORE submitted a resolution, providing that all debate in Committee of the Whole on the civil and diplomatic appropriation bill shall cease in one hour after the bill shall be taken up in committee; and that the committee shall then proceed to vote on the amendments of the Senate thereto, together with such amendments as may be made to the same. After which, the bill and amendments shall be reported to the House.

This resolution was adopted.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WISE, from the managers on the part of the Committee of Conference appointed to confer on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments to the naval appropriation bill, made the following report:

The managers on the part of the House of Representatives, on the disagreeing vote of the two Houses on the 6th amendment of the Senate to House bill No. 659, report that they have conferred with the managers on the part of the Senate, and recommend to the House of Representatives to adopt, as a substitute for the said amendment of the Senate, the following provision, to wit:

"And the Secretary of the Navy is hereby directed to cause an examination to be made of the expediency, practicability, and probable expense of constructing a dry-dock in the harbor of New York, upon the plan of using, as an elevating power, the water of the Croton aqueduct, and of sufficient capacity to rebuild or repair a 74-gun ship; and to cause an examination of any other plan or plans of a dry-dock or floating dock in said harbor, deemed worthy by the Secretary to be reported upon; and to report the result of such examination, with his opinion thereon, to the next session of Congress. And all further expenditures, under the appropriations heretofore made for the dry-dock in said harbor, shall be suspended until the 1st day of January next. And the sum of one hundred thousand dollars shall be, and the same hereby is, appropriated for the construction of a floating dry-dock at Pensacola, of capacity sufficient for the repair of frigates of the smaller class, and upon such plan as the Secretary of the Navy shall approve."

Mr. WISE having moved the previous question on adopting the report,

Mr. CALHOUN raised the question of order, that the report must be considered in Committee of the Whole, on the ground that it involved new appropriations.

Mr. WISE denied that any new appropriation was involved in the report; and, after a brief conversation between Messrs. WISE and CALHOUN,

The SPEAKER overruled the point of order.

Mr. FILLMORE called for a division of the question, so as to take it, first, on that part of the report relating to the Brooklyn dry-dock; and, second, on the remainder of the report.

Mr. WISE contended that the report was not susceptible of a division; that, although it embraced two propositions, yet, being the result of a committee of conference, in which one of the propositions would not have been accepted without the other, the report itself was a whole, and could not be divided.

The SPEAKER having decided that the report was susceptible of division,

Mr. WISE called for the yeas and nays; which having been ordered, the question was taken, first, (under the operation of the previous question,) on the first branch of the report, relative to the Brooklyn dry-dock, and decided in the affirmative—yeas 149, nays 20.

The question was then taken on the second branch of the report, and also decided in the affirmative—yeas 100, nays 23.

GENERAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

On motion by Mr. FILLMORE, the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, (Mr. McKENNAN of Pennsylvania in the chair,) and took up the amendments of the Senate to the civil and diplomatic appropriation bill.

The amendments having been read—

Mr. FILLMORE said that he would make an explanation of the several amendments, before passing on them in committee.

The first amendment related to the printing of Congress; simply declaring, by law, that resolutions of the two Houses separately shall not control the settlement of the accounts for this object; and the effect of it is to raise the prices of the printing of the House up to what they were under the law of 1819.

The next amendment related to the appropriation made in the House for defraying the expenses of printing what was called the Compendium of the Sixth Census. This House made an appropriation covering the actual outlay of the persons who did the work; and the Senate had increased that appropriation, providing that the accounts shall be settled and paid for at the rates paid by the House for its printing. He confessed it seemed to him to be but reasonable that these persons should be paid as well for their labor, with some reasonable profit, as for their actual outlay.

He proceeded to notice the other amendments of the Senate in succession, with brief explanatory remarks, which were not heard with distinctness at the reporters' desk.

Mr. PICKENS addressed the committee in opposition to the amendment by which the pay of the printers to this House was to be increased, and showed that the reduction in the price of printing which had been agreed upon at the commencement of the session was reasonable and just, as the printing could now be done with greater cheapness than formerly. He hoped, therefore, that the well-considered retrenchment which the House had effected would not thus be defeated by an item in the civil and diplomatic appropriation bill, at this last hour of the session. He also made some observations expressive of his views on other amendments in the bill, particularly advocating a concurrence in those which proposed to remove the statue of Washington to a place in which it would do credit to the artist and to the country, and to pay just extra compensation to the gallant officers of the exploring expedition, by whom valuable public services were rendered to the country.

Mr. G. DAVIS next obtained the floor; but he was stopped by

The CHAIRMAN, who said there were gentlemen standing near the speaker, [Mr. DAVIS,] in the aisle, who must take their seats.

[Mr. PROFFIT of Indiana was the gentleman particularly alluded to. He was employed, with Mr. WISE and others, at the desk of Mr. FILLMORE, chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, (who had the civil and diplomatic bill in charge,) in an examination of the amendments which the committee had to act upon; the manuscript copy in the care of Mr. FILLMORE being the only one to which the members had access.]

Mr. PROFFIT expressed his astonishment at the peremptory and unusual manner in which the Chairman had commanded him to take his seat. He said that was the only place where he could see the amendments made to the bill; and he thought he had a right to examine those amendments upon which he should be called to give his vote.

The CHAIRMAN (peremptorily:) The gentleman from Indiana must take his seat.

Mr. PROFFIT stood for a moment, evidently in great astonishment, and then said, firmly: Sir, I will not take my seat.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana is ordered to take his seat.

A great sensation was instantaneously created, and much confusion ensued. Some half a dozen gentlemen sprang to the floor, and each addressed the Chair; the Chairman peremptorily ordering the gentleman from Indiana to his seat at the same time. Some observations were made on the hypercriticism of the Chairman, who had corrected the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. PICKENS,] who, in the hurry of debate, addressed the Chairman as "Mr. Speaker," instead of "Mr. Chairman," and on the unusual strictness of discipline which he was so peremptorily enforcing; and others called upon the committee to rise, that the language of the gentleman from Indiana might be reported to the House. Of the latter, there were Mr. G. DAVIS, Mr. A. H. H. STUART, Mr. BRIGGS, and some others.

Mr. BOTTS protested against the conduct of the Chairman. He asserted positively that the gentleman from Indiana was not out of order; and he begged the Chairman to bear in mind that the House of Representatives was not a school-house. [Cries of "order," and confusion.]

Mr. WISE (who was also at Mr. FILLMORE's desk) rose, and, with great blandness of manner, appealed to the House to let this matter drop. He hoped, on this last day of the session, nothing serious would grow out of such a circumstance. He would be responsible for his friend [Mr. PROFFIT] that he would keep order.

Mr. OLIVER, during these proceedings, had drawn Mr. PROFFIT to his desk, and succeeded in pouring oil on the troubled waters; and the affair was allowed to terminate.

Mr. GARRETT DAVIS then proceeded to discuss the amendment which proposed to pay Messrs. Blair & Rives and Mr. Allen for printing the Compendium of the Sixth Census, going over the well-known detailed statement of that business.

Mr. W. SMITH made some explanatory statements.

Mr. J. C. CLARK then replied to the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. G. DAVIS,] and advocated the payment to Mr. Allen of the amount stated in the bill.

Mr. GORDON opposed the item proposing an increase of pay to the printers to this House; and stated that the present printers were instrumental in procuring a reduction of the price of printing to the amount of five per cent. below that at which it had been done by Messrs. Blair & Rives; and that, at that price, they could do the printing at a living profit. They had thus driven other printers from the course of competition; and now, at the close of the session, they were to have the original prices restored, by which at least $25,000 would be put into their pockets. He protested against such a procedure.

After a few remarks from Mr. FILLMORE and Mr. MERIWETHER, the question was taken, by tellers, on the amendment proposing to give additional pay to the printers, and the committee refused to concur; the vote being—ayes 60, noes 66.

The question next recurred on the amendment of the Senate, striking out $15,849 64, as the amount to be paid Thomas Allen for printing 20,000 copies of the Census, and $8,924 82 to be paid to Blair & Rives for printing the same document; and inserting, in lieu thereof, a clause directing a sum not exceeding $43,579 66, to be paid to Thomas Allen, and not exceeding $24,050 to be paid Blair & Rives for printing the same document—with a proviso that neither Thomas Allen nor Blair & Rives shall be paid at a greater rate than that paid for the public printing at the present session of Congress—the charges to be verified by practical printers.

After a verbal amendment by Mr. FILLMORE—

The question was taken upon the amendment of the Senate above stated, and it was lost—ayes 50, noes not counted.

The next amendment of the Senate, legalizing the clerks and officers employed temporarily at present, was rejected.

The next amendment of the Senate, reinstating the appropriation of the salaries of the Recorder and Solicitor of the General Land Office, which had been stricken out by the House, was agreed to—ayes 66, noes 60.

The next amendment, making an appropriation of $40,000 for a custom-house at Wilmington, North Carolina, was taken up.

Mr. BARNARD moved to amend it, by adding thereto a clause making an appropriation of $60,000 for the preservation and repair of works for the improvement of harbors and navigation of rivers heretofore commenced, and for which no appropriation has been made this session.

Mr. W. SMITH contended that the amendment was not in order.

The CHAIR decided it was.

Mr. MERIWETHER moved to amend the amendment by adding $40,000 for a custom-house at Savannah. Rejected.

The amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. BARNARD] was also rejected—ayes 54, noes not counted.

Various amendments to the amendment of the Senate were offered and rejected—by Mr. BOARDMAN, $10,000 for a new light-house at New Haven; by Mr. WASHINGTON, $10,000 for a custom-house at Newbern, North Carolina; by Mr. KING, $20,000 for a custom-house at Savannah, Georgia.

The amendment of the Senate above mentioned was then agreed to.

The next amendment, making an appropriation for three months' extra allowance to the officers of the exploring expedition, was concurred in—ayes 84, noes not counted.

The next amendment, appropriating $1,200 for preserving the botanical specimens brought home by the exploring squadron; and $5,000 for removing the statue of Washington, and erecting a temporary covering over it, in the front grounds of the Capitol, under the direction of Mr. Greenough, was concurred in.

Also, the amendment appropriating $1,000 for an agent to superintend the transmission of the mail from Chagres, across the isthmus, to Panama.

Also, the amendment appropriating $1,454 for pulling down the old furnaces, and erecting new ones, underneath the rotundo of the Capitol, according to the proposition of John Skirving.

Mr. CALHOUN made an ineffectual attempt to obtain an appropriation of $4,000 for completing the ventilation of the Capitol.

The next amendment of the Senate, increasing the salaries of the travelling agents of the Post Office Department from $1,000 to $1,500, was nonconcurred in.

The amendments being all through,

Mr. FILLMORE moved that the committee rise, and report the bill.

Mr. PROFFIT inquired whether it would be in order to move an amendment respecting his refusal, on the order of the Chairman, to take his seat.

The CHAIRMAN proceeded to make a statement.

Mr. PROFFIT wished to know whether the amendment he had intimated would be in order.

The CHAIRMAN said not.

Mr. PROFFIT said he designed to appeal to the House in relation to the manner in which he had been treated.

During the sitting of the committee, several messages were received from the Senate and the President; and several bills returned from the Senate with amendments were committed.

The committee then rose, and reported the bill with the amendments.

Mr. L. W. ANDREWS moved the previous question; which was sustained.

The question first came up on concurring in the amendments of the Senate, providing that neither of the two Houses shall, by resolution of its own, fix the prices of the public printing—the effect of it being to raise the prices of the printing of the two Houses 20 per cent., or what they were under the joint resolution of 1819.

The yeas and nays having been ordered, the question was taken on this amendment, and decided in the negative—yeas 59, nays 88, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Landaff W. Andrews, Barnard, Barton, Birdseye, Blair, Boardman, Borden, Botts, Briggs, Brockway, Thos. J. Campbell, Childs, John C. Clark, Jas. The next question was on concurring in the amendments of the Senate in relation to printing the Compendium of the Sixth Census; and, the proviso adopted in Committee of the Whole having been adopted,

The question was taken on concurring in the amendment as amended, and decided in the negative—ayes 55, noes 94, as follows:

Mr. FILLMORE here moved that the House take a recess from 4 to 6 o'clock; which motion, by general consent, was agreed to.

The question was next taken on the amendment of the Senate, legalizing the employment of certain clerks in the State Department; and it was not concurred in.

The question was then taken on the amendment of the Senate, defraying the expenses of distributing the remaining copies of the printed returns of the Sixth Census—2,500. This amendment was concurred in.

The question was taken on concurring in the amendment of the Senate, restoring the appropriation for the salaries of the Solicitor and Recorder of the General Land Office, which had been struck out by the House.

Mr. GILMER called for the yeas and nays; which were ordered: and, on taking the question, it was decided in the negative—yeas 62, nays 79, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Allen, Barnard, Birdseye, Boardman, Bowne, Childs, Clinton, James Cooper, Cowen, Garrett Davis, Dawson, Everett, Fillmore, Gates, Granger, Holmes, Howard, Charles J. The other amendments were all concurred in.

TREASURY NOTE BILL.

Mr. FILLMORE moved that the House take up the treasury note bill, which had come from the Senate with an additional section as an amendment.

The question was agreed to.

Mr. FILLMORE explained the object of the amendment, and moved the previous question upon it, which was sustained by the House.

The amendment was not concurred in.

MILITARY DIVISIONS OF THE UNITED STATES.

On the motion of Mr. C. H. WILLIAMS, the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. ATHERTON in the chair,) and took up bill No. 792, being a bill to divide the United States into two military districts.

Mr. STANLY addressed the committee on this bill, in opposition to it.

Mr. C. H. WILLIAMS replied to the gentleman from North Carolina, who, he said, had evidently not examined the bill, and did not understand it.

The debate was continued by Mr. JAMES COOPER, who moved that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to, and the House took a recess for two hours—it being now 4 o'clock.

EVENING SESSION.

At 6 o'clock the chairman of the Committee of the Whole [Mr. ATHERTON] resumed the chair.

MILITARY DIVISIONS OF THE U. S.

The pending question was a motion that the committee rise.

Mr. C. H. WILLIAMS hoped that the committee would not rise without reporting the bill.

The question was then taken on the motion to rise. The Chair reported ayes 12, noes 34.

Mr. ADAMS demanded that the fact that there was no quorum present be reported to the House.

Mr. C. H. WILLIAMS called for a count.

Tellers reported ayes 8, noes 69.

Mr. ADAMS insisted upon the fact being reported to the House.

After ineffectual attempts on the part of several gentlemen to prevent the committee from rising—Mr. A. insisting on his demand—

The CHAIRMAN decided that the fact that there was no quorum must be reported to the House.

The committee rose, accordingly, and reported the fact.

Mr. ADAMS moved that there be a call of the House, and called for the yeas and nays on the motion; which were ordered, and resulted—yeas 45, nays 79.

So the House refused to order a call.

Mr. C. H. WILLIAMS offered a resolution, directing that all debate in Committee of the Whole on the bill to divide the United States into two military districts shall cease in fifteen minutes after the House shall go into Committee of the Whole. The resolution was agreed to.

The bill authorizing a re-issue of treasury notes was returned from the Senate—that body adhering to its amendment.

On motion of Mr. FILLMORE, the House adhered to its disagreement; and a committee of conference was ordered to be appointed.

The bill from the Senate, to provide for holding a circuit court of the United States at Williamsport, in the western district of Pennsylvania, was read a third time, and passed.

The joint resolution for the relief of Benjamin Ogle Tayloe, returned from the Senate with an amendment, was next taken up.

Mr. G. DAVIS moved that the bill be laid on the table. After much noise, agreed to—ayes 78, noes 47.

The Senate's amendment to the bill for the relief of John Skirving was concurred in.

Also, the Senate's amendment to the bill granting pensions to certain widows and revolutionary soldiers.

Also, the amendment of the Senate to the bill for the protection of commerce on the western shores of Lake Michigan.

Also, the amendments to the bill in relation to pre-emption rights. [Title not heard.]

The bill from the Senate for the relief of Robert B. Lewis was read three times, and passed.

The bill granting a pension to David Welch failed at first, for want of two-thirds to suspend the rules.

Mr. C. H. WILLIAMS called for tellers, which were ordered; and the motion to suspend was carried—ayes 96, noes 34.

The bill was then passed.

LADIES.

On motion of Mr. WELLER, it was unanimously resolved that, for this evening, ladies should be admitted on the floor of the hall.

The SPEAKER, by general consent, laid before the House several Executive communications.

MILITARY DISTRICTS.

On motion of Mr. C. H. WILLIAMS, at 7 o'clock, the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and resumed the consideration of the military district bill.

After much confusion, and several attempts, ineffectually made, to lay the bill aside, with a view to take up other business, (i. e. the fine bill, &c.) the committee rose and reported it to the House.

Mr. C. H. WILLIAMS moved the previous question.

Mr. WISE moved that the bill be laid on the table.

Mr. YORKE asked the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. WISE withdrew his motion.

And the question recurred on the demand for the previous question; which was seconded.

And the main question was ordered to be taken, (being on the engrossment.)

Mr. W. SMITH asked the yeas and nays, which were ordered; and, being taken, were—yeas 98, nays 69, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Landaff W. Andrews, Arnold, Arrington, Atherton, Babcock, Barton, Beeson, Bidlack, Blair, Boardman, Botts, Bowne, Brewster, Bronson, Aaron V. Brown, Milton Brown, Charles Brown, William Butler, William O. Butler, Green W. Caldwell, John Campbell, Thomas J. Campbell, Caruthers, Cary, Casey, Chapman, John C. Clark, Clinton, Cranston, Cross, Daniel, Richard D. Davis, Dean, Deberry, John C. Edwards, Ferris, Charles A. Floyd, Fornance, Gamble, Gentry, Gilmer, Green, Harris, Hastings, Hays, Hoeston, Charles J. Ingersoll, Cave Johnson, Keim, Lane, Lewis, Littlefield, Lowell, Abraham McClellan, Robert McClellan, McKeon, Mallory, Thomas F. Marshall, John Thomson Mason, Medill, Miller, Morgan, Oliver, Parmenter, Payne, Pickens, Plumer, Pope, Randolph, Rayner, Reding, Reynolds, Riggs, Rodney, Rogers, Shepperd, Sprigg, Steenrod, Stokely, Stratton, John T. Stuart, Summers, Jacob Thompson, Tillinghast, Toland, Triplett, Turney, Underwood, Van Buren, Ward, Washington, Watterson, Weller, Westbrook, Edward D. White, Christopher H. Williams, Joseph L. Williams, and Augustus Young—98.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Allen, Sherlock J. Andrews, Baker, Barnard, Birdseye, Briggs, Jeremiah Brown, Calhoun, Childs, Chittenden, Coles, James Cooper, Cowen, Cravens, Crawford, Cushing, Garrett Davis, Everett, Gates, Patrick G. Goode, Graham, Granger, Hall, Halsted, Hopkins, Houck, Howard, Hudson, William Cost Johnson, John P. Kennedy, King, Linn, McKay, McKennan, Samson Mason, Mathiot, Mattocks, Maxwell, Meriwether, Morris, Osborne, Pearce, Powell, Ramsay, Benjamin Randall, Alexander Randall, Rencher, Ridgway, Roosevelt, William Russell, James M. Russell, Saltonstall, Sanford, Sewell, Shaw, Slade, William Smith, Snyder, Stanly, Tomlinson, Trotti, Van Rensselaer, Joseph L. White, Thomas W. Williams, Winthrop, Wise, Yorke, and John Young—69.

So the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading at this time.

And, having been read a third time, the bill was passed.

Mr. P. G. GOODE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, made a report.

A message was received from the Senate, stating that that body receded from its third amendment to the general appropriation bill, but insisted on its others.

GENERAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

At the request of Mr. FILLMORE, this bill was taken up. The House, on his motion, persisted in its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate, and a Committee of Conference was ordered to be appointed.

THE SPEAKER'S ADMINISTRATION.

Mr. WELLER of Ohio, on leave given, had presented the following resolution:

Resolved, That the thanks of this House be offered to the Hon. JOHN WHITE, for the able, impartial, and dignified manion in which he has discharged the duties of Speaker during the 27th Congress.

And Mr. CHAS. BROWN, having stated that he supposed the yeas and nays would not be taken on the resolution; but that he, for one, could not vote for it, proceeded (amidst much manifest sensation in the hall) to make some remarks.

He did not intend, he said, to make a speech on the resolution, though he was opposed to its adoption. The vote he was about to give was not his own. He was here the representative of some 68,000 of the people of these United States, and when he was asked to vote that the Speaker of this House had acted, as Speaker, in an impartial manner, he could not assent to it.

Mr. McKEON interposed, and, remarking that it was rather early in the evening to enter upon this subject, appealed to the gentleman to permit this subject to lie over until they could dispose of the business before them.

Mr. BROWN declined to comply with the request, and proceeded. The people he represented here, he said, had interests, and they had a right in some way or other to have them represented in this House. In the formation of the committees of this House at the last session, Mr. B. had been placed on a committee that had no relation to any of those interests of his constituents in the most remote manner. He had refused to serve on that committee, and had given his reasons therefor to the House. That committee had no duties to perform in which his constituents had any interest whatever. In the formation of the committees of this House, again his name did not appear.

[A distant voice: "It ought not to appear."]

Mr. B. put it to gentlemen that his name had as good a right there as the gentleman's name, although he did come from Kentucky. That portion of the people of Philadelphia which he represented had as good a right as the people of Kentucky, or as the people of any other place, to be heard, and to have their interests consulted here; and when they were insulted, or at least neglected, he could not stand here in a craven spirit to vote that the Speaker had discharged his duties in an impartial manner. For the Speaker, in all the private relations of life, Mr. B. had the highest respect; but the vote he was about to give was of some public consequence or of no consequence, and he could not vote for the resolution; and he might say that, in many instances, the Speaker had not conducted himself, as Speaker of the House, in an impartial manner; but he left the House to judge for itself. For one, standing here as a Representative of the people, and feeling that the Speaker had not treated them and their representative in this hall with justice, Mr. B. deemed it his duty to pronounce in this House that the Speaker had not done the duties of Speaker of the House of Representatives.

Mr. B. had heard a voice say that he (Mr. B.) ought not to have been placed there.

[A distant voice: "You did; I repeat it. I say it on my own authority and responsibility."]

Mr. B. continued. When he had entered this hall as a Representative of a portion of the people of these United States, he had come in here as a Representative second to none. He was the Representative of 68,000 people; they had thought proper to send him here—to dignify him as a Representative of the American people; and no man here, no matter how old he might be, or how high out of this House, had any better claims to be heard than he had. They were all equal on this floor; and, for one, he had not been sent here to play second fiddle to any man; nor should he do it. He would vote, so far as the personal relations between himself and the Speaker were concerned, in honor of the Speaker; but he could not say that he had acted, with reference to his public duties, in an impartial manner.

Mr. PICKENS rose to make an appeal to those gentlemen with whom it had been his pride and pleasure to act on all great public questions. He hoped they would make no opposition to the present resolution. Mr. P. well remembered when, on a similar occasion, a similar resolution had been tendered to a Speaker who had presided with distinguished ability over the House, that it was assailed with bitterness—I allude to Mr. Speaker Polk. I thought then it was unkind and undignified, and think so still. It was unworthy of the occasion. And let us not now imitate an example set us by our opponents, which it does not become us to follow. Where they acted wrong, let us do right. Let us, on this occasion, in our closing scenes, act with liberality and generosity.

Mr. Speaker, I came here a member in 1834, soon after I was of an age to be eligible; and I can say, without arrogance, that there has been no great public question that has arisen, from that time to the present, in which I have not taken an active and decided part; and on any measure involving vital principle, I think I can say that I would be amongst the last to yield. It has been my habit, on all such measures, to be firm and decided, and even sometimes ultra. But, while it has been my pride to take the highest and most uncompromising grounds upon questions of principle, yet, in everything involving the mere courtesies of life, and personal liberality, it is the glory of my nature to yield, where generosity demands it.

I look upon the present resolution as involving no principle, but as an act of usual compliment, habitually paid in every civilized assembly to its presiding officer; and I trust my friends will not do anything to mar the appropriate harmony of the occasion. Let us remember that it is the lot of humanity to err, and that it is the glory of a magnanimous nature to forgive and to forget. I have been engaged in the fiercest and most bitter conflicts that have occurred upon most of the discussions of the day; and yet I can lay my hand upon my heart, and, as I am about to retire, declare, in the utmost sincerity, that I have at this moment not a single unkind feeling towards any one with whom it has been my pleasure to be thrown together in all the associations of this House.

Mr. Speaker, this Congress has done enough to engender bitter and hostile feelings amongst members upon this floor; and it has also done enough to sow the seeds of discord, wide and deep, throughout the Confederacy. And now that we are about to close our labors, let us not, in our expiring moments, show that (like the savage) we can harbor vengeance and malignity even in the dying hour. Let us seize upon this occasion (which has always been considered fit and proper) to mingle together in harmony, and exhibit all the nobler attributes of magnanimity and generosity.

Sir, we are about to part, and many of us forever. In God's name, let us part in peace; and may every unkind recollection of the past be absorbed in one common feeling—and that, a burning, devoted attachment to our common country, her honor, and her glory. I am ready to vote with cheerfulness for the resolution.

Mr. WELLER said he had no expectation, in bringing forward this resolution, that it would have provoked a discussion; although, if he had reflected upon the character of some in this House, he might have anticipated that it would meet with opposition from certain quarters.

This was an act of courtesy (continued Mr. W.) which had always been extended to the presiding officer of this House at the close of every Congress. He believed there was not a single instance in the history of this American Congress, where a similar resolution had not been presented and passed upon by a majority of this House. Mr. W. did not undertake to say that the presiding officer of this House had always acted, as presiding officer, in conformity with his (Mr. W.'s) views; or that, in the appointment of the committees of this House, or in the decisions of questions of order, the Speaker had pursued such a course, and given such decisions, as he should have given; but he undertook to say that the Speaker had discharged his duty as faithfully as was possible for a man operated upon by the same feelings and influences that operated upon them all. They were all fallible; the Speaker was a party man, and he (Mr. W.) was a party man—an ultra party man. Mr. W. would oppose the Speaker and the majority of this House upon any of the questions involving those great principles on which he stood before the country, as warmly and ardently as the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Brown] would; but he was not willing to carry his opposition so far as that it should degenerate into malignity. He was not willing to stand before this House, and exhibit a personal malignity.

Mr. BROWN asked an opportunity to explain.

The SPEAKER pro tem. [Mr. Bates] called the House (which was at this moment in great confusion) to order, and requested gentlemen to resume their seats and preserve order. It was impossible to proceed with decorum, unless this was done.

Mr. BROWN (Mr. Weller yielding the floor) said he had expressly stated that he had not an unkind feeling towards the Speaker, and he had said so in truth; and no gentleman on this floor had a right to suppose, or to say, that he had any other than kind feelings. But he voted for his constituents; and he could not, in justice to them, vote that the conduct of the Speaker had been impartial, when he believed the contrary.

Mr. WELLER resumed. He had understood the gentleman from Pennsylvania to say that he had not had that place upon the committees of this House that his merits would entitle him to. The gentleman had certainly assigned that as one of the reasons which would influence his vote.

Mr. W. had no wish to prolong this discussion. He hoped—about to separate as they were, many of them never to meet again—that they would separate with the kindest feelings towards each other. He had submitted this resolution upon his own responsibility—though as violently opposed to the Speaker of this House upon political principles as any man within the sound of his voice—as an act of courtesy, of generosity, of magnanimity, which no Congress had ever refused. He was willing, for his part, to take the responsibility of that act here and before the country. Let gentlemen who desired go against it; he should record his vote upon the journal in favor it.

Mr. BURKE (across) was understood to say he should vote against it.

Mr. WELLER. The gentleman might go against it if he chose. Mr. W. did not pretend to dictate to any man as to his vote.

It was for this House (Mr. W. continued) to decide whether, in this case, they would refuse to extend this act of courtesy to the Speaker of this House, at a period when they were about to separate, never again to meet in this hall; and he hoped and trusted that the spirit of magnanimity and generosity which should characterize every true Democrat would be found to actuate every man with whom he associated here.

Mr. CUSHING obtained the floor; but yielded it, for purposes of explanation, at the request of—

Mr. WISE, who said he had not one word to say—and for many reasons—upon the resolution proposed to the House at this time; and he certainly should not have taken the floor, but for some remarks which had been made by the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. Pickens,] in which, although the gentleman had disclaimed intending any personal reproach to him (Mr. W.) or to any other gentlemen, yet (Mr. W. was understood to say) he had seemed to disapprove of the precedent. But the gentleman had undertaken to say that that was a precedent unworthy of example; and had undertaken to say, further, that it had sprung from a spirit of malignity.

Mr. PICKENS said he had stated that he had thought at that time that it was unkind and undignified.

Mr. WISE was understood to say that the opposition to that resolution had not sprung from him. Opposition to such a resolution never could originate with him. But when it had been presented to him at that time, the judgment which many formed was, that either that resolution was a compliment of substance, or of mere form. If it was a compliment of mere form—"yours truly," or "your obedient servant," or "dear sir," to a letter—why, then it was worse than a poor compliment: it was "damning a man with faint praise." But if it was meant to be a serious judgment, (he spoke of the past,) if it was intended to declare as truth the ability, impartiality, and dignity of the Speaker, they were bound to sit in judgment, and to render a verdict; and not a verdict of mere form, but upon their opinions, under their oaths, a verdict upon the conduct, upon the administration of the Speaker, of truth or of untruth, of justice or of injustice; and it had nothing to do with the question of generosity. He cared not how generous a man might be. Though his generosity might be unbounded, no man had a right to vote what he did not think to be true. No man had a right to render a judgment for mere form, which judgment he did not really entertain. This was the principle which had governed that precedent; and it had been regarded as the only mode either of rewarding a faithful, impartial, dignified Speaker, or of punishing one who possessed not those qualities.

In reply to some remarks of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. WELLER,] Mr. WISE had only to say that it would be the meanest malignity for any gentleman to refuse a vote of thanks to a Speaker who, all believed, had tried honestly and conscientiously to discharge his duties—to justify a vote of this kind merely on party grounds. He could not vote either upon one side or the other, although he had always been a party man, like the gentleman from Ohio. He could not vote as a partisan, or act as a partisan, were he Speaker; for that partisan spirit which actuated them in the heat of debate, and in their usual business here, ought entirely to be excluded from the human bosom when an individual took that chair.

Mr. W. remarked, in conclusion, that he had merely risen to vindicate those who, on a former occasion, had voted against a similar resolution, which had been alluded to.

Mr. C. J. INGERSOLL observed that he should not have said one word but for what had fallen from his particular friend and colleague, [Mr. BROWN,] who had first addressed the House. Should he act as a private individual, actuated only by feelings and griefs of a personal nature, he might perhaps as bitterly and as heartily vote against this resolution of thanks as any other member of the House. When he first came here, thirty years ago, he had been placed upon the Committee on the Judiciary, and he confessed he felt not a little repugnance to find himself thrust down by the present Speaker to the tail of that committee. And when he had attempted his maiden speech on the floor of the present Congress, the House would recollect how repeatedly and in how overbearing a manner he had been called to order by the Chair for irrelevancy; so often, indeed, that had he not been rather a cool old gentleman, he should have been quite overcome by it. But Mr. I. entirely agreed with his colleague [Mr. BROWN] that he had here no right to vote as an individual; he acted here as the representative of one hundred thousand men, women, and children, and as a member of the great American family. And as to the charge upon the Speaker of having acted as a party man, did they not all belong to political parties of some description? And did not his colleague know that he was in a minority here? And were they bound to expect from the presiding officer—from any presiding officer—under such circumstances, anything different from what they had received? Mr. I. had been in that hall when one of the most brilliant, powerful, and eloquent men that this or any other country had ever produced presided in that chair; and he had witnessed, at that time, as at all other times had happened, both before and since, the selection of committees made in part on political and party grounds. This was to be looked for; and, unless the Speaker acted on feelings of odious, open, and despicable partiality in distributing the appointments of the House, the members of the House were bound to vote in the belief that he had done no more than to act in conformity to those free Democratic principles in which they all lived, moved, and had their political being as American citizens. Mr. I. was free to confess that, during the first session he had been here, he had for a time felt sore, and felt annoyed by the course of the Chair in regard to him, and considered himself as not without some reason to complain, (though he never complained unless the case was very hard indeed, for it never did any good, or procured a man any respect;) but, during the last two sessions, he thought the course of the Speaker had well entitled him to a vote of thanks like that now proposed, and he should vote it most cheerfully.

He would add that, in his judgment, we owed something, we owed much, to the country; we owed something, we owed much, to our own free institutions; we owed something, too, and very much, to history. He was not at liberty, because he, as an individual, might suppose the composition of the committees of the House to be improper or inexpedient, to refuse, on that account, his vote of thanks to a presiding officer who had, in the general, done his best to preserve impartiality in administering the duties of the Chair; and such he did, in his conscience, believe had been the aim and endeavor of the present Speaker. He had thought, during the last six weeks, that the Speaker had been to blame for many things. For example, Mr. I. had hardly been able to step into the lobby, or even to move into various parts of the House itself, without being interrupted by "lobby members" and other persons. This he presumed to be, at least in part, the fault of the Speaker. But it was a part of their legislation which every gentleman owed to every other gentleman, to say for him, if it could with truth be said, that he had discharged his public duty in an impartial, fair, and dignified manner. And Mr. I. would here say, that he felt entirely free to acknowledge that, had he been placed in that chair, he doubted greatly whether he should have behaved as well, upon the whole, as this Speaker had done. Mr. I. again observed, that he agreed with his colleague [Mr. BROWN] that it was their duty, on occasions like these, to act and vote, not for themselves personally, but for their constituents—for their country—for history, and not for party in any form. Let him ask the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. WISE,] and all others, what had been the consequence of the withholding, by this House, of a vote of thanks from Mr. Speaker Polk? It had made him Governor of one of the most respectable States of this Union. [A voice: "Not at all—not in the least."] He could tell that gentleman that he was mistaken; it had operated greatly in producing that very result.

Mr. TURNEY here interposed, and remarked that the House had not, in point of fact, withheld its vote of thanks from Mr. Speaker Polk; neither had the attempt to do so had any the least influence on the gubernatorial election in Tennessee.

Mr. INGERSOLL resumed. As to that, he had not the honor of being a citizen of that State, and was not, therefore, as well entitled to speak as the gentleman might be. But he had been about to ask what were the feelings of the people in cases of this kind? Did they sympathize with the personal resentments of members here? Members themselves were, while within these walls, in the very focus of most powerful passions; they hated one and loved another, and were often brim full of wrath and resentment; but the moment they stepped without those doors, they got out of the charmed circle in which they had thus been spell-bound, and found that they were in a very different region. The people were always disposed to be generous and forgiving, and they looked with but little approbation on the cherishing of an opposite spirit by gentlemen leaving these halls. For himself, he must in candor say, that while he had voted against most of those political measures which Mr. Speaker White approved, and would have preferred that they should not succeed, he could not find it in his conscience or in his breast, and as a duty he owed to patriotism and to the country, to withhold his vote of thanks on such an occasion; and though the yeas and nays should be ordered, he must continue to act under this conviction, and record his name in favor of the resolution.

Mr. COOPER of Pennsylvania said that he did not know that the refusal of his colleague, [Mr. C. BROWN,] who had first addressed the House, to vote in favor of the pending resolution, would detract anything from the honor which the Speaker might receive from its adoption. He was, indeed, rather inclined to believe that his colleague's vote in its favor would have been understood as casting some degree of suspicion on the Speaker's integrity; and he suspected very much that that officer would rather rejoice that he was without the vote of a man who would refuse to vote a resolution of common courtesy. Mr. C. said he had not risen with any purpose of entering into a quarrel with his colleague. What people was it that he represented on this floor? The citizens of Philadelphia, or a portion of them. And had his constituency been treated unjustly or slightingly by the Speaker in his appointment of the standing committees of that House? Let gentlemen look at the facts, and then the gentleman would find that his vociferous accusations would not go very far against recorded history. The Committee of Ways and Means had a member from Philadelphia placed upon it; the Committee on Commerce had another member from Philadelphia; the Committee on the Judiciary had another gentleman from Philadelphia, and, at the first session of this Congress, had had two; and yet the gentleman could get up here and avail himself of a moment like this to obtrude his private griefs, and pour out on that House the bitterness of his gall. Mr. C. was informed that his colleague had at one time been appointed a member of the Committee on Commerce, but had never once met the committee.

[Mr. BROWN. At the extra session—it met but once.]

Thus it appeared, not only that three of the most weighty and important committees of the House had each a member from the city of Philadelphia, but his colleague himself was placed by the Speaker on the Committee of Private Land Claims. This, however, it seemed, was, in his estimation, a station quite below his merits; he had been most unjustly and injuriously slighted, and so had his constituents in his person, because the Speaker had not placed him at the head of the Committee of Ways and Means, or of the Committee on Commerce. And now, at the closing moment of the session, he was found moved by private griefs, and what Mr. C. (to use no harsher epithet) would call a vain ambition, to pursue a course which Mr. C. would venture to predict was likely to prove less an injury than a relief to him against whom it was aimed. Mr. C. would appeal to the number of times his colleague had occupied the floor during this Congress. What one member, even on the most important committees of the House, had oftener consumed its time? The gentleman might probably have thrown great light upon its deliberations; or, if he had thrown none at all, (which might be the opinion of some,) Mr. C. at any rate remembered to have read in the history of Rome that the gabbling of a goose once saved the capitol. [Laughter.] His colleague, it appeared, was disposed to complain that he had been placed upon what he esteemed too mean a committee for a person of his distinction—the Committee on Private Land Claims; though at the head of that committee was a gentleman from Louisiana, [Mr. MOORE,] to act with whom would be no dishonor to one of far higher claims than his colleague could pretend to.

Mr. BROWN, who had several times attempted to interpose, here obtained the floor for explanation, and said that the whole of his colleague's remarks were based upon what was not a fact. Mr. B. was not on that committee. Let the gentleman confine himself to matter of fact, and not proceed upon mere fiction.

Mr. COOPER, resuming, said he would very soon explain how the matter of fact stood. His colleague had been placed upon that committee by the Speaker, and his name had stood as a member of it for eight months, during all which time Mr. C. doubted if he had once been present at any meeting of the committee—certainly not half a dozen times. [A voice: "Not once."] And because the business of the committee had accumulated through his inattention, his name had been put off from the roll of its members.

The CHAIR here called to order.

After some desultory remarks on the question of order—

Mr. COOPER resumed, and said that he hoped, when an attack like this, and at such an hour, was made upon the presiding officer of that House, he, (Mr. C.,) who felt his State disgraced by the conduct of his colleague, might be permitted to state what were the facts in reference to that gentleman, as well as his colleague to state his allegations in regard to the Speaker. Mr. C. repeated the assertion, that this colleague of his, though a member of a committee of much importance, and on whose hands a vast amount of business was thrown, had not attended the committee half a dozen times in nine months, and that therefore——

Here Mr. C. was again called to order; when, after a good deal of confusion, he said that he had no desire to violate the order of the House, or to proceed out of order; nor did he esteem it to be out of order to state what was a fact—that his colleague had been removed from the committee for neglect and inefficiency.

Here the confusion was greatly increased.

Mr. PAYNE called the gentleman from Pennsylvania to order; and the point which he wished to make was this: Was it in order for a member to speak of another as having, by his conduct, disgraced his State?

Mr. C. BROWN hoped the gentleman from Alabama would not press his point of order. His colleague was a disgrace to the House, and nothing he could say could disgrace him below what he was.

Mr. COOPER said that, as he considered the subject not worth the controversy, he would resign the floor, and resume his seat; which he did.

Mr. CUSHING said he took the floor in the hope that a motion he proposed to make, before he resumed his seat, might have the effect of putting an end to this most unseasonable and very painful debate. He was himself ready to vote this resolution; he should do so, viewing it as an act of courtesy due to the Speaker of the House. They were now approaching the end of a most agitated Congress—a Congress involving the greatest amount of intense political passion of any which had existed in the entire history of our Government; and he deeply regretted that in this, the closing hour, when they were about to bid each other adieu—it might be forever—instead of parting as friends, as fellow legislators, as fellow-citizens of the republic, and, he might say, as gentlemen—they were indulging in these, the expiring moments of their political existence, in a bitter and exasperated personal debate.

If there was any man on that floor who had cause to feel that, in the personal and party contests which had marked the history of this body, during both its present and its past session, injustice had been done to him, Mr. C. was that man. He felt it; he knew it; but he was ready to sacrifice all recollection of personal umbrage at the altar of the common good, and of an affectionate desire for the peace and honor of that House. It might be that he was about to leave that floor but to enter on a still more agitated theatre—to go back to the people again upon questions which agitated the country as much as they did that House, if not more. But he desired to leave that hall with feelings of the kindest regard to every member, and, above all, towards him who had occupied that chair. That charity might be extended to himself, he desired first to show charity towards others. He fully realized for himself, and he called upon the House to realize and to consider, under what unspeakable embarrassments, both political and personal, from the division and subdivision of parties, the duties of the Chair had been performed; and, in view of this, if he, or if other gentlemen, should feel that, on this or on that occasion, their pride of place might not have been gratified by the Chair, he appealed to them, he appealed to himself, to cast from them all such recollections, with all unkind feelings which might be called up by them—so that they might, in parting, press hand to hand, with nothing but emotions of mutual regard and good-will.

Under views like these, he should close the few words he had ventured to present, by moving the previous question.

And, by ayes 69, noes 58, the demand was seconded.

And the main question (i. e., on the adoption of the resolution) was ordered to be taken.

Mr. ANDREWS of Kentucky asked the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. WISE moved to be excused from voting on this occasion; and he did so, in part, that he might obtain the opportunity of occupying a moment in vindicating himself from a charge which had gone the rounds of the country, and which he availed himself of the present opportunity to repel, once and forever. He entertained the most kindly feelings towards the Speaker of that House—a gentleman who had, on all occasions, treated Mr. W. with the utmost urbanity, courtesy, and deference, and with whom he had received and reciprocated the personal courtesies of life; and he now declared here, before God and his country, that the reasons which induced him to ask to be excused from voting on the present resolution, were not reasons of a personal nature. A slander had gone abroad, which represented Mr. W.'s course here to have sprung from a sense of disappointment in not having been able to reach the high station which had been occupied by the Speaker of that House—a station to which there was none under this Government he should prefer. He would not affect to say that he never had desired it: it was a station fit to be the summit of ambition to any man whose bosom was the seat of just and laudable aspirations. But he did here solemnly declare, and with as positive certainty as the infirmity of our nature enabled any man to speak of the motives of his own heart, that in no one act of his public life had he been actuated towards that gentleman by any sense of personal or political disappointment. The contrary, whether whispered secretly by the insidious tongue of slanderous malignity, or openly bruited through the columns of a corrupt and venal press, he here pronounced to be a falsehood. He left this declaration to be remembered—yes, to be remembered; and he was perfectly serious in his request to be excused from voting.

The question being put, the request of Mr. WISE was not complied with.

This question was then taken, and the vote resulted as follows: yeas 141, nays 17.

TREASURY NOTE BILL.

Mr. FILLMORE moved that the House take up the treasury note bill, for the purpose of acting upon an amendment from the Senate, on which a Committee of Conference had made a report.

Mr. MERIWETHER called for the reading of the report.

[Messages were received from the Senate and the President.]

Mr. MERIWETHER rose to make an inquiry. He wished to know whether the report of the Committee of Conference provided that bonds should be issued, in lieu of treasury notes, and redeemable in ten years.

The Clerk read the report of the Conference Committee; but it was not intelligibly heard, above the noise which universally prevailed.

Mr. MERIWETHER moved to lay the report on the table. This motion was rejected.

The previous question was then sustained.

Mr. J. C. INGERSOLL asked for the yeas and nays on concurring with the Conference Committee in their report. They were ordered.

The report of the Committee of Conference was concurred in—yeas 99, nays 73, as follows:

A pile of enrolled bills were signed by the Speaker.

Mr. FILLMORE moved that the House act upon the report of the Conference Committee on

THE CIVIL AND DIPLOMATIC APPROPRIATION BILL.

The report was read. It recommends:

1st. That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate, increasing the pay of the printers to the present Congress to the rates allowed by the joint resolution of 1819.

2d. That the Senate recede from its amendment, increasing the pay of T. Allen, and of Blair & Rives, for printing the Compendium of the Sixth Census. But the committee also recommends the adoption of a clause, providing that nothing contained in this bill shall operate as a bar to the claims of Allen and Blair & Rives, hereafter, for the full amount of compensation for executing the printing of the Compendium.

3d. That the House recede from its disagreement to the Senate's amendment, by which the appropriation for the salaries of the Recorder and Solicitor of the General Land Office is retained.

4th. That the House and Senate recede from the several amounts named by them as the salaries of travelling agents of the Post Office Department; and that the sum of $1,250 be fixed as the annual pay of those officers.

Mr. FILLMORE explained the report, and hoped it would be adopted. He moved the previous question; which was sustained.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON asked the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

A division of the question was called.

The question was therefore taken on the first recommendation of the Committee of Conference, (the effect of which is to increase the pay of the printers to Congress to the prices of 1819.)

This recommendation of the committee was agreed to—yeas 80, nays 78.

Mr. ANDREWS of Kentucky moved a reconsideration of the vote just taken.

Mr. BOTTS moved to lay the motion for reconsideration on the table; which motion was carried—yeas 93, nays 63.

Mr. C. H. WILLIAMS asked leave to offer a resolution suspending the joint rule in relation to the military district bill.

And Mr. J. R. INGERSOLL made a similar motion as to the joint resolution in relation to weights and measures.

Objection being made, the rules were suspended, and the resolution (under the operation of the previous question) was adopted.

On motion of Mr. CUSHING, certain maps of the Northeastern boundary were ordered to be printed.

Mr. GRAHAM asked the House to take up the bill in relation to the preservation of live-oak timber.

Mr. G. moved that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union be discharged from the consideration of said bill; which motion was agreed to.

And the bill was read a third time and passed.

The rule was suspended to enable the bill to be sent to the Senate.

Mr. ANDREWS of Kentucky, remarking that during his service as a member of this House he had not asked a favor in behalf of himself and his constituents, and making an urgent appeal in behalf of the parties concerned, asked leave to offer a resolution providing that the messengers and attendants of the House should be paid the same compensation as those of the Senate.

Mr. SMITH of Virginia objected.

Mr. ANDREWS moved a suspension of the rules.

Mr. MERIWETHER moved to lay the motion on the table.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON asked the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and being taken, resulted in yeas 70, nays 77.

So the rules were not suspended.

APPROPRIATIONS, ORDINARY AND EXTRAORDINARY.

Mr. BEESON offered the following resolution; on which, after being read for information, he moved a suspension of the rules: negatived.

Whereas by a resolution adopted on the 23d ult., the House directed the Secretary of the Treasury, among other things, to report the amount of the appropriations for each year, from the 4th of March, 1829, to the 4th of March, 1843, exclusive of public debt and trust funds:

And whereas it is necessary to a fair and full understanding of the financial economy of the several administrations intervening, that a thorough discrimination should be made between expenditures, ordinary and extraordinary, of that eventful period; and also, between appropriations made of unborrowed and borrowed moneys: therefore,

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to report to this House a statement showing the amount of the appropriations for each year, from the 4th of March, 1829, to the 4th of March, 1843, discriminating between appropriations ordinary—such as those for the support of the civil administration, army and navy, personel and materiel, on the peace establishment—and extraordinary, such as not only public debt and trust funds, but also such as those made on account of the Florida war; purchases of Indian lands; removal of Indians; payment for property taken for public use, and injuries committed during hostilities; donations to objects in the District of Columbia; survey of the coast; claims of States for war debts; taking the census; duties refunded; materials for increase of the navy; durable public buildings, roads, bridges, canals, breakwaters; improvements in rivers and harbors; fortifications, pensions, gratuities; exploring expedition, &c.; distinguishing, also, between appropriations made from unborrowed, and those from borrowed moneys; and that said report be appended to, and published with, the report directed by the House, on the 23d ult., to be made on the subject of public expenditures.

Mr. ATHERTON, from the Committee of Ways and Means, made an unfavorable report on the petition of Amos Wade, praying for remission of duties.

Mr. SMITH of Virginia moved to take up the bill No. 25, for the relief of Mrs. Nourse.

Mr. STEENROD moved to take up the bill No. 32, fixing the compensation of pension agents.

Mr. SMITH moved that the Committee of the Whole be discharged from the further consideration of bill No. 25; and

Mr. STEENROD moved that the Committee of the Whole be discharged from the further consideration of bill No. 32.

All these motions were pronounced out of order.

[During this, time, and, indeed, the whole of the evening session, there was a great deal of noise and confusion; numbers of members trying to obtain the floor, and offering motions which were either out of order, or not heard by the Chair.]

GENERAL JACKSON'S FINE.

Mr. GWIN moved that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole, for the purpose of taking up the bill to refund the fine of General Jackson.

Mr. J. P. KENNEDY called for the yeas and nays.

Great confusion ensued; but ultimately the yeas and nays were taken, and they resulted as follows: yeas 77, nays 83.

Mr. CUSHING submitted the usual resolution for the appointment of a committee to wait upon the President, and inform him that, if he had no further communication to make, the two Houses of Congress were ready to adjourn.

Mr. J. R. INGERSOLL wished, first, to call up a motion for the printing of 5,000 extra copies of the reports of the two committees on the two hundred million national stock projet.

Mr. TALIAFERRO also moved that the Committee of the Whole be discharged from some bill in relation to the Patent Office; but its precise object was not heard.

After some other irregular proceedings, Mr. CUSHING's resolution was adopted.

Mr. PROFFIT offered a resolution to pay extra compensation to the clerks and messengers of the House; but, as it was objected to, it was withdrawn.

Mr. J. P. KENNEDY was understood to move a modification of Mr. J. R. INGERSOLL's motion, so as to fix 3,000 as the extra number of copies of the reports to be printed.

Mr. BEESON offered an amendment; but, as the previous question had been moved on Mr. J. R. INGERSOLL's motion, it was not in order.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON moved to lay the motion on the table; and it was carried.

Various motions were made; but they were objected to, and were not acted upon.

Mr. ADAMS offered a resolution which was understood to be declaratory of some general principles in relation to the capture at Monterey.

As objections were made, he moved a suspension of the rules.

Mr. MALLORY called for the yeas and nays; and, being ordered, they resulted as follows—yeas 74, nays 83.

Mr. BEESON moved a suspension of the rules, in order to enable him to get in his resolution. The motion was rejected.

Mr. C. J. INGERSOLL offered a resolution, directing the Clerk to pay the several pages, messengers, &c., of the House, $100 each in addition to their regular compensation.

Mr. SMITH of Virginia objected to the reception of the resolution.

Mr. C. H. WILLIAMS moved a suspension of the rules, in order to get the resolution in.

Mr. SMITH of Virginia asked for the yeas and nays; which were ordered: thereupon, the resolution was withdrawn.

Mr CAVE JOHNSON asked if the hour of 12 had not arrived? and wished to know if a motion to adjourn was not in order.

The CHAIR requested the gentleman to suspend his motion a moment.

Mr. LEVY attempted to have passed a resolution, calling on the Secretary of the Navy for information in relation to the construction of a marine hospital at Key West, in Florida.

The SPEAKER said the hour of 12 had arrived, and no new business could be introduced.

Mr. T. F. MARSHALL rose and said he moved that there be printed, for the use of the House, 20,000 extra copies of the report of the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. W. C. JOHNSON,] in relation to the $200,000,000 scheme for advancing the credit of the country.

[Many members: "The motion is not in order."]

Mr. MARSHALL said he would withdraw the motion so soon as he had spoken.

After some conversation between the SPEAKER and Mr. MARSHALL, the latter withdrew his motion.

While the House was waiting for action on the part of the Senate, conversation occurred at intervals on various subjects of no interest, on the part of several members, interspersed with sundry pauses. At last,

Mr. PICKENS observed that he had repeatedly known the House to adjourn without hearing from the Senate, which had business apart from its connexion with the House of Representatives. The Senate was now in executive session, and there was no reason why the House should wait for it.

The SPEAKER inquired whether the gentleman proposed to send a separate message to the President from this House?

Mr. PICKENS said he did.

[Here there was another pause.]

Mr PICKENS moved that a committee wait on the President of the United States, and inform him that the House of Representatives, having transacted all the business before it, was ready to adjourn, provided he had no further communication to make to them: carried, and Messrs. PICKENS, WISE, and JOSEPH R. INGERSOLL, were appointed the committee.

After a few moments—

Mr. PICKENS, from the abovementioned committee, returned, and reported that they had performed the duty assigned them, and had received for answer that the President had no further communication to make to this branch of Congress; and he wished them a happy return to their homes, and the enjoyment of the society of their families.

Mr. PICKENS then moved that the House adjourn sine die; which being carried.

The SPEAKER addressed the House as follows:

GENTLEMEN: Before I declare, for the last time, your adjournment, allow me to tender to each and every one of you my grateful thanks for the attention and respect I have invariably received as your presiding officer; and especially for the flattering expression of favorable opinion contained in the resolution ordered to be entered on your journal this night. Yet I cannot but feel that I am more indebted to the kindness of this House, than its justice, in the adoption of this resolution.

I trust, however, I shall ever cherish all those emotions of gratitude and affection which so signal an instance of your generosity ought to inspire. Whilst the censure of this body cannot be considered a trivial punishment, its praise can never be esteemed an ordinary compliment. Next to the satisfaction arising from a consciousness of having discharged my duty, is the approbation of those who have been constant witnesses of my official conduct. It was with diffidence and hesitancy, knowing well the high but just responsibility of this station, that I persuaded myself to engage in the discharge of its delicate and arduous duties. Nothing but the hope that I should receive the cordial support of the liberal of all sides in this House could have induced me to undertake so difficult a task.

I take pleasure in stating that my most sanguine expectations of candor and favor have been more than realized. Amidst all the excitement growing out of animated debates upon the great interests of the country, which have so often and so deeply impressed all our minds, and enlisted the warmest feelings of the heart, I have experienced a uniform politeness from every quarter of this House. When, in the trial of opinion upon questions of importance and difficulty, this House has been equally divided, and my vote has been demanded by the rules, I have invariably found, in that half of the members from whose judgment I have differed, a disposition to allow me the same freedom of deliberation and independence of thought which they asserted for themselves.

The position I have occupied since my elevation to this Chair has made it my duty to scan closely the progress of business in this House; and I owe it to truth and justice to declare, without reference to party, that I have witnessed an industry, a patriotism, and independence, a series of information and eloquence, that would have done honor to any deliberative assembly in any age or country.

Well am I convinced, in despite of the recent efforts that have been made, in various quarters, by misrepresentation and traduction, to weaken the public respect and confidence in the immediate Representatives of the people, that the scrutiny of time will prove this House to be the sanctuary of the Constitution—the citadel of civil liberty—the palladium of this republic. It is here—it is here, in this grand inquest of the nation—here, if anywhere, that resistance will be made to the silent arts of corruption, or to the daring encroachments of power: and if the Constitution, the sacred charter of American freedom, be destined to perish by the ruthless hand of the demagogue or the usurper, (which God avert!) here, upon this floor, it will breathe its last agonies—its dying gasp.

In the course of our deliberations, in a moment of commotion and excitement, I am sensible I may, at times, have wounded the feelings of members. I have never arrested the progress of business, to enter into explanations. My position in this chair made it impossible for me to do so, without endangering the order and dignity of this House. Besides, the moment of irritation is not the most propitious time for satisfactory explanations. I have chosen, at the hazard of injustice to my motives, to leave my justification to the calm and sober reflection of members. On my part, I have no wrongs to complain of from any individual upon this floor. If any have been intended or done, they have long since been forgiven and forgotten. I thank my God I have no memory for injuries.

We are now about to part—many, very many of us, never to meet again. Let us separate as social, moral beings should separate—as friends, as brothers. May the honor of this House, and the honor of this nation, be the paramount ambition of us all. No matter what may be our future destiny—whether in private or public life—let all the ends we aim at be our country's, God's, and Truth's.

With cordial wishes for your health and happiness, and fervent prayers for the peace, prosperity, and lasting liberty of our common country, I pronounce this House adjourned without day.

The address was received with loud expressions of gratification.

And the House, sine die, adjourned.

THE END.

APPENDIX

TO THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

[We commence the Congressional Globe and Appendix for this session of Congress (the 3d and last of the 27th) with the executive proceedings of the Senate, at the last session, on the British treaty made between Mr. WEBSTER and Lord ASHBURTON.

Ratifications of the treaty were not exchanged in time for us to publish the proceedings, correspondence, and speeches thereon, in the Congressional Globe and Appendix for the last session, to which they properly belong.

The Journal of the Senate in secret session, the correspondence in relation to the treaty, and the treaty itself, are contained in the first two numbers of the Congressional Globe for this session.

All the speeches made in secret session on the treaty, which have been, or may be, written out by the Senators, will be published in the Appendix, and will probably fill four or five numbers. This number is occupied entirely by Mr. BENTON'S against the treaty, which is not concluded. It is expected that his speech will nearly fill the next number of the Appendix.

We shall print between four and five thousand surplus copies of the Congressional Globe and Appendix, for the purpose of furnishing complete copies to all persons who may subscribe for those works before the 1st of January, 1843.

This number of the Appendix will be sent to some of our friends, with the hope that they will obtain some subscribers for us. The Congressional Globe and Appendix are $1 each for a session. The extra matter, which we intend to print in them this session, is worth the money.—EDITORS CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE AND APPENDIX.]

BRITISH TREATY.

[SECRET SESSION.]

SPEECH OF MR. BENTON,

OF MISSOURI,

In Senate, Thursday, August 18, 1842—In opposition to the treaty.

Mr. BENTON said: I speak against this treaty not so much for the Senate as for the country. I mean to publish my speech, and that with the full illustrations and quotations which it is unnecessary to make here, where the documents are in every Senator's hand, but which will be necessary to the understanding of the subject by those who have not access to the documents. I am opposed to the treaty on many grounds; and first, because it is not a settlement of all the questions in dispute between the two countries. We were led to believe, on the arrival of the special minister, that he came as a messenger of peace, and clothed with full powers to settle everything; and believing this, his arrival was hailed with universal joy. But here is a disappointment—a great disappointment. On receiving the treaty and the papers which accompany it, we find that all the subjects in dispute have not been settled; that, in fact, only three out of seven are settled; and that the minister has returned to his country, leaving four of the contested subjects unadjusted. This is a disappointment; and the greater, because the papers communicated confirm the report that the minister came with full powers to settle everything. The very first note of the American negotiator—and that in its very first sentence, confirms this belief, and leaves us to wonder how a mission that promised so much, has performed so little. Mr. Webster's first note runs thus: "Lord Ashburton having been charged by the Queen's Government with full powers to negotiate and settle all matters in discussion between the United States and England, and having on his arrival at Washington announced," &c., &c. Here is a declaration of full power to settle everything; and yet, after this, only part is settled, and the minister has returned home. This is unexpected, and inconsistent. It contradicts the character of the mission, balks our hopes, and frustrates our policy. As a confederacy of States, our policy is to settle everything, or nothing; and having received the minister for that purpose, this complete and universal settlement, or nothing, should have been the sine qua non of the American negotiator.

From the message of the President which accompanies the treaty, we learn that the questions in discussion between the two countries were: 1. The Northern boundary. 2. The right of search in the African seas, and the suppression of the African slave-trade. 3. The surrender of fugitives from justice. 4. The title to the Columbia river. 5. Impressment. 6. The attack on the Caroline. 7. The case of the Creole, and of other American vessels which had shared the same fate. These are the subjects (seven in number) which the President enumerates, and which he informs us occupied the attention of the negotiators. He does not say whether these were all the subjects which occupied their attention. He does not tell us whether they discussed any others. He does not say whether the British negotiator opened the question of the State debts, and their assumption or guaranty by the Federal Government! or whether the American negotiator mentioned the point of the Canadian asylum for fugitive slaves (of which twelve thousand have already gone there) seduced by the honors and rewards which they receive, and by the protection which is extended to them. The message is silent upon these further subjects of difference, if not of discussion, between the two countries; and, following the lead of the President, and confining ourselves (for the present) to the seven subjects of dispute named by him, and we find three of them provided for in the treaty—four of them not: and this constitutes a great objection to the treaty—an objection which is aggravated by the nature of the subjects settled, or not settled. For it so happens that, of the subjects in discussion, some were general, and affected the whole Union; others were local, and affected sections. Of these general subjects, those which Great Britain had most at heart are provided for; those which most concerned the United States are omitted: and of the three sections of the Union which had each its peculiar grievance, one section is quieted, and two are left as they were. This gives Great Britain an advantage over us as a nation: it gives one section of the Union an advantage over the two others, sectionally. This is all wrong, unjust, unwise, and impolitic. It is wrong to give a foreign power an advantage over us: it is wrong to give one section of the Union an advantage over the others. In their differences with foreign powers, the States should be kept united: their peculiar grievances should not be separately settled, so as to disunite their several complaints. This is a view of the objection which commends itself most gravely to the Senate. We are a confederacy of States, and a confederacy in which States classify themselves sectionally, and in which each section has its local feelings and its peculiar interests. We are classed in three sections; and each of these sections had a peculiar grievance against Great Britain; and here is a treaty to adjust the grievances of one, and but one, of these three sections. To all intents and purposes, we have a separate treaty—a treaty between the Northern States and Great Britain; for it is a treaty in which the North is provided for, and the South and West left out. Virtually, it is a separate treaty with a part of the States; and this forms a grave objection to it in my eyes.

Of the nine Northern States whose territories are coterminous with the dominions of her Britannic Majesty, six of them had questions of boundary, or of territory, to adjust: and all these are adjusted. The twelve Southern slaveholding States had a question in which they were all interested—that of the protection and liberation of fugitive or criminal slaves in Canada and the West Indies: this great question finds no place in the treaty, and is put off with phrases in an arranged correspondence. The whole great West takes a deep interest in the fate of the Columbia river, and demands the withdrawal of the British from it: this large subject finds no place in the treaty, nor even in the correspondence which took place between the negotiators. The South and the West must go to London with their complaints: the North has been accommodated here. The mission of peace has found its benevolence circumscribed by the metes and boundaries of the sectional divisions in the Union. The peace-treaty is for one section: for the other two sections there is no peace. The non-slaveholding States coterminous with the British dominions are pacified and satisfied: the slaveholding and the Western States, remote from the British dominions, are to suffer and complain as heretofore. As a friend to the Union—a friend to justice—and as an inhabitant of the section which is both slaveholding and Western, I object to the treaty which makes this injurious distinction amongst the States.

This objection, great in itself, receives emphasis from a cotemporaneous act of British legislation. While diplomacy on this side the Atlantic was giving a separate treaty to the Northern States, legislation on the other side of that sea was giving them a separate trade. This results from the new corn law just passed by the British Parliament, and the great difference which is made in the rate of duties on foreign and colonial products, and the admission of American grain and provisions as colonial productions when they pass through Canada. Of course, this partial legislation, like the title of the one-sided treaty, is in general terms; it speaks generally, and professes nothing of what it effects. But, in admitting American grain and provisions as Canadian when they pass through Canada, it, of course, admits none but of the States coterminous with Canada; for from none of the rest can it go. In admitting this wheat at a fraction of the duty it would pay, if it went from an American port, a discrimination is made between the neighboring States and those distant from Canada. This is the fact now. The rate of duty on wheat exported from an American or Canadian port sets out with a difference of four to one in favor of the Canadian, rises as high as fifteen to one, and averages ten or twelve to one. This is effected by the discrimination between foreign and colonial wheat, and the sliding scale, which makes the duties fall as the price of the wheat rises, and which fixes the foreign duty at twenty shillings the quarter (eight bushels) when the colonial is at five shillings; at fifteen when the colonial is at one; and when fixes one shilling as the ordinary and common duty on the colonial wheat; while the foreign is only admitted at that rate when the price of the wheat reaches the maximum price of seventy-three shillings a quarter. One shilling duty on the quarter, is only a penny halfpenny (or three cents) on the bushel—a mere nominal duty on what is selling at from seven to nine shillings (150 to 200 cents) the bushel. At this rate, our Northern citizens can send their wheat to England; so that, virtually, they have a free trade, as well as a separate trade, with Great Britain in this great staple; while to the rest of the Union her ports are nearly closed against the same article, by the heaviness of the duty. As it is with wheat, so it is with flour, and with all other grains and their manufactures, and with beef and pork. I have merely taken wheat for the illustration which a single article affords. It is the same with all the rest. Barley, rye, oats, Indian corn, beans, peas, corn-meal, buckwheat, buckwheat flour, rice, and salted provisions—all have their place in the same sliding scale, and with the same proportionate difference of duty between the foreign and the colonial. Thus a separate trade, and virtually a free trade, in the great staples of grains, flour, and provisions, is granted to our Northern citizens by British legislation in London, at the same time that British diplomacy in Washington gives them a separate treaty!

I do not mention these things because I repine at the advantages of our Northern brethren: on the contrary, I wish them all possible prosperity. But I mention them because they are facts; because they are strange coincidences; because they are novelties in our Union; and because of the effect which they should have in our judgment upon this treaty. The Senate is a body representing all the States. They have the harmony and the unity of the confederacy to preserve; and it may be their duty to correct the error into which a sectional negotiator may have fallen.

The failure to settle all the matters in dispute between the two countries, aggravated as that failure is by the sectional and invidious distinction which it makes among the States, is a circumstance badly calculated to recommend the treaty to the indulgence or to the partiality of the Senate. What it does contain must be good indeed to overbalance so great an objection; but if, instead of being good, its contents are bad—if the sins of commission are to be added to those of omission, then there is no redeeming quality about it, and unqualified condemnation should be its fate. This I hold to be the case. I look upon the treaty to be about equally bad for what it contains, and, for what it omits; and, under these two aspects I shall proceed to give it the close and careful examination which the magnitude of the subject requires.

The treaty comes to us recommended by a message from the President of the United States, in which, among other advantages gained for us, he presents an acquisition of four millions of valuable mineral land on the western shore of Lake Superior. I begin with this part of the message, because it involves a fallacy which it is necessary to detect, in order to appreciate the recommendations which are made in favor of the treaty. The fact is, not an acre of these four millions has either been acquired or secured by this treaty; the line between the Lake Superior and the Lake of the Woods is changed for the worse, not for the better, by this treaty; and our Secretary negotiator, who drew up the message of the President, has led him to sign a recommendation which has no foundation in fact. The message is in these words:

"From the imperfect knowledge of this remote country at the date of the treaty of peace, some of the descriptions in that treaty do not harmonize with its natural features, as now ascertained. "Long Lake" is nowhere to be found under that name. There is reason for supposing, however, that the sheet of water intended by that name is the estuary at the mouth of Pigeon river. The present treaty, therefore, adopts that estuary and river, and afterward pursues the usual route, across the height of land by the various portages and small lakes, till the line reaches Rainy Lake; from which the commissioners agreed on the extension of it to its termination, in the northwest angle of the Lake of the Woods. The region of country on and near the shore of the lake, between Pigeon river on the north, and Fond du Lac and the river St. Louis on the south and west, considered valuable as a mineral region, is thus included within the United States. It embraces a territory of four millions of acres northward of the claim set up by the British commissioner under the treaty of Ghent."

The message, in this passage, faintly sketches a dispute where no grounds for one existed, and celebrates an acquisition where nothing had been gained. The line from the Lake Superior to the Lake of the Woods never was susceptible of a dispute. That from the Lake of the Woods to the head of the Mississippi was disputable, and long disputed; and it will not do to confound these two lines, so different in themselves, and in their political history. The line from Lake Superior was fixed by landmarks as permanent and notorious as the great features of nature herself—the Isle Royale, in the northwest of Lake Superior, and the chain of small lakes and rivers which led from the north of that isle to the Lake of the Woods. Such were the precise calls of the treaty of 1783, and no room for dispute existed about it. The Isle Royale was a landmark in the calls of the treaty; and a great and distinguished one it was—a large rocky island in Lake Superior, far to the northwest, a hundred miles from the southern shore; uninhabitable, and almost inaccessible to the Indians in their canoes; and for that reason believed by them to be the residence of the Great Spirit, and called, in their language, Menong. This isle was as notorious as the lake itself, and was made a landmark in the treaty of 1783, and the boundary line directed to go to the north of it, and then to follow the chain of small lakes and rivers called "Long Lake," which constituted the line of water communication between Lake Superior and the Lake of the Woods; a communication which the Indians had followed beyond the reach of tradition, which was the highway of nations, and which all travellers and traders have followed since its existence became known to our first discoverers. A line through the Lake Superior, from its eastern outlet to the northward of the Isle Royale, leads direct to this communication; and the line described was evidently so described for the purpose of going to that precise communication. The terms of the call are peculiar. Through every lake and every watercourse, from Lake Ontario to the Lake Huron, the language of the treaty is the same: the line is to follow the middle of the lake. Through every river it is the same: the middle of the main channel is to be followed. On entering Lake Superior, this language changes. It is no longer the middle of the lake that is to constitute the boundary, but a line through the lake to the "northward" of Isle Royale—a boundary which, so far from dividing the lake equally, leaves almost two-thirds of it on the American side. The words of the treaty are these:

"Thence through Lake Superior, northward of the isles Royale and Philippeaux, to the Long Lake; thence through the middle of said Long Lake, and the water communication between it and the Lake of the Woods, to the Lake of the Woods," &c.

These are the words of the call; and this variation of language, and this different mode of dividing the lake, were for the obvious purpose of taking the shortest course to the Long Lakes, or Pigeon river, which led to the Lake of the Woods. The communication through these little lakes and rivers was evidently the object aimed at; and the call to the north of Isle Royale was for the purpose of getting to that object. The island itself was nothing, except as a landmark. Though large, (for it is near one hundred miles in circumference,) it has no value, neither for agriculture, commerce, nor war. It is sterile, inaccessible, remote from shore, and fit for nothing but the use to which the Indians consigned it—the fabulous residence of a fabulous deity. Nobody wants it—neither Indians nor white people. It was assigned to the United States in the treaty of 1783, not as a possession, but as a landmark, and because the shortest line through the lake, to the well-known route which led to the Lake of the Woods, passed to the north of that isle. All this is evident from the maps, and all the maps are here the same; for these features of nature are so well defined that there has never been the least dispute about them. The commissioners under the Ghent treaty, (Gen. Porter for the United States, and Mr. Barclay for Great Britain,) though disagreeing about several things, had no disagreement about Isle Royale, and the passage of the line to the north of that isle. In their separate reports, they agreed upon this; and this settled the whole question. After going to the north of Isle Royale, to get out of the lake at a known place, it would be absurd to turn two hundred miles south, to get out of it at an unknown place. The agreement upon Isle Royale settled the line to the Lake of the Woods, as it was, and as it is: but it so happened that, in the year 1790, the English traveller and fur-trader, Mr. (afterwards Sir Alexander) McKenzie, in his voyage to the Northwest, travelled up this line of water communication, saw the advantages of its exclusive possession by the British, and proposed in his "History of the Fur Trade," to obtain it by turning the line down from Isle Royale, near two hundred miles, to St. Louis river in the southwest corner of the lake. The Earl of Selkirk, at the head of the Hudson's Bay Company, repeated the suggestion; and the British Government, forever attentive to the interests of its subjects, set up a claim, through the Ghent commissioner, to the St. Louis river as the boundary. Mr. Barclay made the question, but too faintly to obtain even a reference to the arbitrator; and Lord Ashburton had too much candor and honor to revive it. He set up no pretension to the St. Louis river, as claimed by the Ghent commissioner: he presented the Pigeon river as the "long lake" of the treaty of 1783, and only asked for a point six miles south of that river; and he obtained all he asked. His letter of the 17th of July is explicit on this point. He says:

"In considering the second point, it really appears of little importance to either party how the line be determined through the wild country between Lake Superior and the Lake of the Woods, but it is important that some line should be fixed and known.

"I would propose that the line be taken from a point about six miles south of Pigeon river, where the Grand Portage commences on the lake, and continued along the line of the said portage, alternately by land and water, to Lac la Pluie—the existing route by land and by water remaining common by both parties. This line has the advantage of being known, and attended with no doubt or uncertainty in running it."

These are his Lordship's words: Pigeon river, instead of St. Louis river! making no pretension to the four millions of acres of fine mineral land supposed to have been saved between these two rivers; and not even alluding to the absurd pretension of the Ghent commissioner! After this, what are we to think of the candor and veracity of an official paper, which would make a merit of having saved four millions of acres of fine mineral land, "northward of the claim set up by the British commissioner under the Ghent treaty?" What must we think of the candor of a paper which boasts of having "included this within the United States," when it was never out of the United States! If there is any merit in the case, it is in Lord Ashburton—in his not having claimed the 200 miles between Pigeon river and St. Louis river. What he claimed, he got; and that was the southern line, commencing six miles south of Pigeon river, and running south of the true line to Rainy lake. He got this; making a difference of some hundreds of thousands of acres, and giving to the British the exclusive possession of the best route, and a joint possession of the one which is made the boundary. To understand the value of this concession, it must be known that there are two lines of communication from the Lake Superior to the Lake of the Woods, both beginning at or near the mouth of Pigeon river; that these lines are the channels of trade and travelling, both for Indians and the fur-traders; that they are water communications; and that it was a great point with the British, in their trade and intercourse with the Indians, to have the exclusive dominion of the best communication, and a joint possession with us of the other. This is what Lord Ashburton claimed—what the treaty gave him—and what our Secretary negotiator became his agent and solicitor to obtain for him. I quote the Secretary's letter of the 25th of July to Mr. James Ferguson, and the answers of Mr. Ferguson of the same date, and also the letter of Mr. Joseph Delafield, of the 20th of July, for the truth of what I say. From these letters, it will be seen that our Secretary put himself to the trouble to hunt estimony to justify his surrender of the northern route to the British; that he put leading questions o his witnesses, to get the information which he wanted; and that he sought to cover the sacrifice, by depreciating the agricultural value of the land, and treating the difference between the lines as a hing of no importance. Here is the letter. I read an extract from it:

"What is the general nature of the country between the mouth of Pigeon river and the Rainy lake? Of what formation is it, and how is its surface? and will any considerable part of its area be fit for cultivation? Are its waters active and running streams, as in other parts of the United States? Or are they dead lakes, swamps, and morasses? If the latter be their general character, at what point, as you proceed westward, do the waters receive a more decided character as running streams?

"There are said to be two lines of communication, each partly by water and partly by portages, from the neighborhood of Pigeon river to the Rainy lake: one by way of Fowl lake, the Saganaga lake, and the Cypress lake; the other by way of Arrow river and lake; then by way of Saganaga lake, and through the river Maligne, meeting the other route at Lake la Croix, and through the river Namekan to the Rainy lake. Do you know any reason for attaching great preference to either of these two lines? Or do you consider it of no importance, in any point of view, which may be agreed to? Please be full and particular on these several points."

Here are leading questions, such as the rules of evidence forbid to be put to any witness, and the answers to which would be suppressed by the order of any court in England or America. They are called "leading," because they lead the witness to the answer which the lawyer wants; and thereby tend to the perversion of justice. The witnesses are here led to two points: first, that the country between the two routes or lines is worth nothing for agriculture; secondly, that it is of no importance to the United States which of the two lines is established for the boundary. Thus led to the desired points, the witnesses answer. Mr. Ferguson says:

"As an agricultural district, this region will always be valueless. The pine timber is of high growth, equal for spars, perhaps, to the Norway pine, and may, perhaps, in time, find a market; but there are no alluvions, no arable lands, and the whole country may be described as one waste of rock and water.

"You have desired me also to express an opinion as to any preference which I may know to exist between the several lines claimed as boundaries through this country, between the United States and Great Britain.

"Considering that Great Britain abandons her claim by the Fond du Lac and the St. Louis river; cedes also Sugar island, (otherwise called St. George's island,) in the St. Marie river; and, agrees, generally, to a boundary following the old commercial route, commencing at the Pigeon river, I do not think that any reasonable ground exists to prevent a final determination of this part of the boundary."

And Mr. Delafield adds:

"As an agricultural district, it has no value or interest, even prospectively, in my opinion. If the climate were suitable, (which it is not,) I can only say that I never saw, in my explorations there, tillable land enough to sustain any permanent population sufficiently numerous to justify other settlements than those of the fur-traders; and, I might add, fishermen. The fur-traders there occupied nearly all those places; and the opinion now expressed is the only one I ever heard entertained by those most experienced in these Northwestern regions.

"There is, nevertheless, much interest felt by the fur-traders on this subject of boundary. To them, it is of much importance, as they conceive; and it is, in fact, of national importance. Had the British commissioner consented to proceed by the Pigeon river, (which is the Long Lake of Mitchell's map,) it is probable there would have been an agreement. There were several reasons for his pertinacity, and for this disagreement; which belong, however, to the private history of the commission, and can be stated when required. The Pigeon river is a continuous watercourse. The St. George's island, in the St. Marie river, is a valuable island, and worth as much, perhaps, as most of the country between the Pigeon river and Dog river route, claimed for the United States, in an agricultural sense."

These are the answers; and while they are conclusive upon the agricultural character of the country between the two routes, and present it as of no value; yet, on the relative importance of the routes as boundaries, they refuse to follow the lead which the question held out to them, and show that, as commercial routes, and, consequently, as commanding the Indians and their trade, a question of national importance is involved. Mr. Delafield says the fur-traders feel much interest in this boundary: to them, it is of much importance; and it is, in fact, of national importance. These are the words of Mr. Delafield; and they show the reason why Lord Ashburton was so tenacious of this change in the boundary. He wanted it for the benefit of the fur-trade, and for the consequent command which it would give the British over the Indians in time of war. All this is apparent; yet our Secretary would only look at it as a corn and potato region! And finding it not good for that purpose, he surrenders it to the British! Both the witnesses look upon it as a sacrifice on the part of the United States, and suppose some equivalent in other parts of the boundary was received for it. There was no such equivalent: and thus this surrender becomes a gratuitous sacrifice on the part of the United States, aggravated by the condescension of the American Secretary to act as the attorney of the British minister, and seeking testimony by unfair and illegal questions, and then disregarding the part of the answers which made against his design.

Sir, I have dwelt long upon this point, because it was necessary to detect the fallacy which the President has been made to sign, and to expose the subserviency of our Secretary to the interests of Great Britain. He has sacrificed an important boundary—important for war and commerce; and, while making this sacrifice, and surrendering all the country between the two routes, he makes the President sign a statement which leads the country to believe that he has made an acquisition of four millions of acres of fine mineral land. The detection of this fallacy, and the exposure of this subserviency, are not only necessary to save us from gross error about these four millions of acres; but also to show us the spirit in which the treaty was made, and the faith with which the papers submitted to us have been drawn. Other occasions will occur for similar detections and exposures. And here I wish to say, once for all, that I consider this message, which the President has signed, as being the work of his Secretary; and that his fault consists in not having verified its statements before he signed it.

I have stated one general objection to the treaty—that of not settling all the questions in dispute. I pass over other general objections at present, for the purpose of getting at once to the consideration of its details. These other general objections are numerous and weighty; but I pass them over at present with a mere enumeration, to be attended to hereafter. I name them now, without stopping to dwell upon them. They are: That such a negotiation should have been committed to a sole negotiator, and one not subjected to the approval of the Senate, nor furnished with presidential instructions to limit and guide him, and the citizen of an interested State;—the assumption of this negotiator to treat the question of national boundaries, not as a question of rights under the treaty of independence, but as a matter of bargain and sale, or of grants and equivalents, in the hands of the negotiators;—the omission of the American negotiator to keep minutes, or protocols, of his conferences and propositions;—the obscurity and mystery which rest upon the origin and progress of the different propositions;—the assumption of the American negotiator to act for the British negotiator, in presenting the British proposition for the Maine boundary as the American proposition; and the unjustifiable and unfounded arguments with which he pressed that proposition upon the commissioners of the State of Maine, until he succeeded in victimizing that deserted and doomed State;—the mixing up of incongruous subjects in the same treaty;—the irregular manner in which the ratification of the treaty has been forestalled by private consultations and conferences with Senators before it was submitted to the Senate;—the solemn and mysterious humbuggery by which Dr. Franklin has been made to play a part in ravishing this ratification from our alarms, and screening the negotiator from responsibility for his gratuitous sacrifices;—the awful apparition of the disinterred map discovered by Mr. Jared Sparks in Paris, with the red marks upon it, and which was showed about to Senators to alarm them into prompt action;—the impressive invocation to secrecy and despatch, lest the British should get wind of the aforesaid map and letter, and thereupon renounce the treaty; when it was perfectly clear, from Lord Ashburton's letter of the 11th of July, that the sagacious old gentleman had already scented out these secret papers, and was ready to claim the benefit of them if new negotiations commenced;—the war-cry which is raised if the treaty is not ratified—a cry which addresses itself to our fears, and not to our judgment, and which would make merchandise of national honor and national rights. I pass over all these additional general objections to the treaty for the present, intending to revert to them in good time, and proceed at once to the consideration of the treaty itself.

The northern boundary is the first subject in the treaty; and on this question, (abandoning all claims of right and title under the treaty of independence—with what propriety will hereafter be seen,) the negotiators proceeded to adjust this boundary upon the principle of compromise and accommodation, ceding and conceding, granting and compensating, until they brought it to the condition in which we find it in the treaty. Waiving, for the present, all remarks upon this assumption of power over our national boundaries, and this demolition of the work of our ancestors, who established these boundaries at the expense of so much blood and treasure, and for the wise purpose of covering their country by a proper frontier: waiving, for the present, all remarks upon this point, I proceed to state the grants and equivalents which were made on each side, and shall consider the value and importance of each. These are, on the side of the British—1. Sugar or St. George's island, in the State of Michigan, between the lakes Huron and Superior. 2. Rouse's Point, and a strip of territory in the State of New York. 3. A strip of territory in the State of Vermont. 4. A hundred thousand acres of land in the State of New Hampshire. 5. The qualified navigation of the St. John river, within the British dominions. 6. The amount of money received by the British for timber cut and sold on the disputed territory. These are the grants and compensations on the part of the British. On the part of the United States, they are: 1. The important national boundary between the Lake Superior and the Lake of the Woods, so necessary to the fur-trade and to the control of the Indians. 2. The four thousand one hundred and nineteen square miles of territory in the State of Maine, being the same and the whole that was awarded to Great Britain by the King of the Netherlands. 3. Eight hundred and ninety-three square miles in Maine, being so much over and above the award of the King of the Netherlands. 4. The establishment of the new boundary, on this side of the awarded line, from lake Pohenagamook to Metjarmette pass, one hundred and ten miles in length, and wholly within the ancient and natural boundaries of Maine. 5. The surrender of the mountain boundary which covered the State of Maine and commanded the road to Quebec, from the head of the St. Francis to the Metjarmette pass—say 150 miles in length—and being so much over and above the award of the King of the Netherlands. 6. The navigation of the St. John river within the State of Maine. 7. A right of way over the territory of Maine, to reach the river. 8. The sum of $300,000 to be paid to the States of Maine and Massachusetts for their loss of territory. 9. The sum of about $200,000 to be paid to the same States, to reimburse their expenses in protecting the disputed territory against Great Britain. 10. A naval alliance and co-operation with Great Britain for the suppression of the African slave-trade. 11. A diplomatic alliance with the same power, for remonstrating with nations against the slave-trade, and for closing the markets of the world against the traffic in slaves. 12. The delivery of fugitive criminals.

This is the list of the grants and equivalents—these the concessions on each side; the value of which I now proceed to examine, beginning with those on the part of Great Britain.

1. The first of these concessions, as they are called, is the island in St. Mary's river, between the lakes Huron and Superior; called by us Sugar island, by the British St. George's. This island has been in our possession, and under our jurisdiction, since the treaty of peace of 1783; our people make sugar upon it; our Indians inhabit it; and for upwards of a quarter of a century we have exercised proprietory rights over it. It was ours by the treaty of 1783, and by fifty years' possession; but the British commissioner under the Ghent treaty (Mr. Barclay) set up a claim to it which Lord Ashburton was too candid to enforce. He readily threw it up to us. In his letter of the 16th of July, he says:

"The other things connected with this boundary being satisfactorily arranged, a line shall be drawn so as to throw this island within the United States."

This was prompt and handsome. His Lordship knew very well what he was about, and how insignificant was a rich island compared to a commanding boundary. Sugar island had no military importance. It was good for sugar and grain, but not for cannon. Its 26,000 acres of fertile soil was a great object in the eyes of an agricultural people, but nothing in the eyes of a domineering monarchy. The cession enured to the benefit of Michigan, and sweetened the treaty to the palate of that young State. It was a large object in the eyes of a young State; the little island of 200 acres in the mouth of the Detroit river was a much larger one in the eyes of the British! The little island of Bois Blanc, opposite Malden, and commanding the river Detroit and its entrance into the Lake Erie, was worth many sugar islands to them; and this they took good care to save.* In June 1822, Mr. Barclay, the British commissioner under the 6th article of the Ghent treaty, wrote thus to General Porter, the American commissioner:

"The undersigned, therefore, is ready to cede Sugar, Fox, and Stony islands to the United States, provided the commissioner of the United States agrees to appropriate the island of Bois Blanc to his Majesty, and to establish the line in the water passage between Bois Blanc and the three beforementioned islands."

The little island was accordingly so appropriated; the offer of three others for it being reinforced by a threat to refer the question of right to the King of the Netherlands, if it was not given up. It was given up in 1822; and I mention the circumstance to show how the British do these things. A large island, excellent for raising cabbages and potatoes, and making sugar and sirup, is readily thrown up to us: a small one, on which cannon could be planted, was pertinaciously retained by them! The taste of both countries was accommodated—ours for agriculture, theirs for dominion! Like a sagacious negotiator, who knew where to concede, Lord Ashburton surrendered Sugar island to Michigan; conciliated that State in favor of his treaty, and marched straight on to the grand object of his mission.

2. Rouse's Point, in the State of New York, and the narrow slip of land which includes it. This point is now hailed as an invaluable acquisition, sufficient of itself to pass the treaty. I remember very well when it was assigned to us by the King of the Netherlands, and when it stood for nothing in favor of the award. That award was rejected, not by the will of President Jackson, but under the action of the Senate and the two interested States, although it gave us this now prized point, cost us no money, took so much less from the State of Maine, and left us the long and lofty line of mountain frontier opposite to Quebec. Rouse's Point gained us not a vote in this body in favor of that award: it now becomes a gigantic consideration in favor of a treaty so much worse than the award. Be it so. The author of the present treaty was the enemy of the award, and will doubtless see the propriety of explaining the reason for the strange contradiction which his conduct presents. Historical recollections attach some interest to this point, which is now more imaginary than real. It has been the scene of some military operations, which the growth of the country will carry to a more distant theatre in future wars. By the peace of 1783, this point fell within our limits, and that by the British ascertainment of the 45th parallel of latitude before the Revolution. That parallel was the boundary, in that quarter, between the United States and Canada: its rectification, under the treaty of Ghent, left out Rouse's Point, and the little fort which had been commenced upon it, to command the entrance into Lake Champlain. The same rectification of the line showed an error of half a mile wide in the northern boundary of the States of New Hampshire and Vermont, giving that much off of each to Great Britain. But it was an acquisition which Great Britain did not want; which she has refused to touch, though entitled to it since the treaty of Ghent; which has remained in our possession ever since, and would doubtless so remain forever. Great Britain wanted none of our republican population added to her Canadian possessions. This she has shown by near thirty years' refusal to receive them; and her minister was the correct interpreter of her policy when he readily threw up this point, and the strip along with it; taking care to make the easy concession an item in the accomplishment of his great design on Maine. All this the British negotiator admits, with a readiness and good feeling which does him much credit. He says:

"The question here at issue between the two countries, was as to the correct determination of the parallel of latitude, and the true source of the Connecticut river. Upon both these points decisions were pronounced in favor of Great Britain; and I might add that the case of America, as matter of right, was but feebly and doubtingly supported by her own authorities. I am, nevertheless, disposed to surrender the whole of this case, if we should succeed in settling, as proposed, the boundary of Maine.

"This concession, considered with reference to the value of the land ceded, which is generally reported to be fertile, and contains a position at Rouse's Point much coveted in the course of the controversy, would, under ordinary circumstances, be considered of considerable importance. The concession will, however, be made by Great Britain without reluctance, not only to mark the liberal and conciliatory spirit by which it is desired to distinguish these negotiations, but because the case is, in some respects, analogous to that of the Madawaska settlement, before considered. It is believed that the settlers on the narrow strip (which would be transferred to Great Britain by rectifying the 45th parallel of latitude, which was formerly incorrectly laid down, are principally from the United States; and that their opinions and habits incline them to give a preference to that form of government under which, before the discovery of the error in question, they supposed themselves to be living. It cannot be desired by her Majesty to acquire any addition of territory under such circumstances, whatever may be the weight of her rights; but it will be observed that the same argument applies almost exactly to the Madawaska settlement, and justifies the reservation I am there obliged to make. In these days, the convenience and happiness of the people to be governed will ever be the chief guide in transactions of this description, between such Governments as those of Great Britain and the United States."

In this paragraph his Lordship shows a considerate regard for the compromised inhabitants, citizens of the United States, living on this strip of land. He is willing to give them up for a consideration, though he declares it could not be desirable to her Majesty to acquire them. His benevolence is still subordinate to his policy; and he is willing to leave these Republicans in the United States, provided the main object is accomplished on the frontiers of Maine. It is clear the British would never accept these inhabitants; yet, to sign a treaty denationalizing them, would have been revolting to the public feeling. To quiet them where they were, was to gain friends for the treaty. The strip was narrow, and of no great length—half a mile at one end, a point at the other, and some fifty miles in length. An area of twelve or fifteen square miles, (some eight or ten thousand acres,) and a few thousand inhabitants, constituted its totality of population and territory. Except the people, it was no great object; but to sign a treaty leaving them out of the United States, would have been unjust and unpopular.

Rouse's Point is the prominent object in this concession; and to this object, historical recollections attach some degree of military importance. It is a point for commanding the entrance into Lake Champlain—the best, but not the only point for that purpose. Further within our line, two batteries from opposite shores will do the work of one battery at this point. It is the best for commanding the entrance, because the outlet is there the narrowest; but its only advantage is in the difference between two batteries and one. The British could not take it, except as part of the strip in New York and Vermont, which would bring her the people she did not want. That she attached no military importance to it, either for her own defence or our annoyance, is evident from her total refusal to touch it for so long a time, when indisputably hers; from her readiness to give it up, under the award, without compensation, while endeavoring to ravish from us the real military positions which were indisputably ours—namely, the islands of Bois Blanc, Campo Bello, and Grand Menan, and the mountain frontier of Maine. To us, it can be of no moment in any future wars with Great Britain. We can hardly repeat the folly of border warfare; of summer operations; of isolated invasions; and of petty detachments hung upon a line of a thousand miles. Instead of that, a large movement will probably be organized. A hundred thousand men concentrated upon the heart, instead of diffused upon the extremities of Canada—marching upon the ice, as Pichegru marched upon Holland—going to Quebec instead of going to the little posts which line the lakes; in such a movement, neither forts nor ships would be wanting. Rivers and lakes, instead of obstacles, would become bridges to the invader; and Rouse's Point would cease to have a place in any man's mind. Still, old ideas give it some value. Its name is connected with the battle of Plattsburg, and with McDonough's victory on Lake Champlain. It is considered the key to the lake which washes two States; and it is not to be dissembled that its recovery gratifies the public feeling, propitiates two States in favor of the treaty, and facilitates the grand object of the British mission. The British negotiator conducted skilfully in conceding for a price what he had no wish to retain—what had been given up without price in the award—what had an illusive value in our eyes, and no value at all in his; and the concession of which was smoothing his way to Maine. The only thing worthy of observation in this acquisition, is the importance attached to it now, when it costs $500,000 in money, and an additional slice off of Maine, by those who rejected it when obtained under Jackson's administration for nothing.

3. The cession of territory in Vermont. This is a narrow strip, ninety miles in length, three-quarters of a mile wide at one end, half a mile at the other; giving an area of some fifty square miles, or about 30,000 acres. It is a slip made by the same rectification of the line on the 45th parallel, which cut off Rouse's Point and the strip in New York; and is subject to all the remarks which were applied to it. This strip in Vermont was given up by the British negotiator, for the same reason he had given up the other: it could have no national consideration, except for the people upon it. His Government did not want these people, and would not have them; still it would be wrong to disquiet them by signing a treaty which should leave them on the British side. The concession which quiets them, strongly recommends the treaty to the State of Vermont; and, taken in conjunction with Rouse's Point, which is at the outlet of their lake, assures its favorable reception in that border State. Two votes more for the treaty!

4. The 100,000 acres assured to New Hampshire between Hall's creek and Perry's creek. This cannot be called a cession, or a concession. The State of New Hampshire has always possessed it, and always exercised jurisdiction over it. She was in no danger of ever losing that possession, or that jurisdiction, whether the Ghent commissioners were right or wrong in retiring the boundary from Hall's creek to Perry's creek. The British never availed themselves of the unacceptable acquisition, and never would. They no more wanted New Hampshire Republicans, than New York or Vermont Republicans, within their dominions. The 100,000 acres, and the population upon it, have been just as much the territory and population of New Hampshire since the Ghent treaty as before it. The concession of the British minister changes nothing; but, while changing nothing, it prevents an objection, and conciliates support for the treaty in the State of New Hampshire.

5. The qualified privilege to a part of the inhabitants of Maine to navigate a part of the river St. John. This is the last of the British concessions, and one much boasted of by the advocates of the treaty. The analysis of the article which grants this vaunted privilege will show it to be restricted to a very narrow benefit, and counterbalanced by rights of navigation granted to the people of New Brunswick to the same river within the State of Maine, with the important addition of a right of way to it. The river St. John, politically considered, is divided into three parts: the lower part wholly in the British province of New Brunswick; the middle part, by the new treaty, a boundary between Maine and New Brunswick; the upper part wholly within the State of Maine. The rights of navigation in this river are thus conferred: so far as it is a common boundary, both parties living upon the waters of the river possess it: so far as it is within the limits of New Brunswick, the people of Maine, living on the waters of the river, may use it for the transportation of the products of the forest, and such of the products of agriculture as are not manufactured, subject to the regulations of the British authorities to establish the origin and character of the articles: so far as it is within the limits of Maine, the neighboring inhabitants of New Brunswick have the same privilege of navigation, with the addition of a territorial right of way to reach the river—a privilege not granted to the people of Maine on the lower part of the river. This is the analysis of this privilege: and what does it amount to? Not as much as the law of nations would give Maine without the treaty. For the law of nations gives to the people on the upper waters of navigable streams the right of passing through foreign dominions to reach the ocean—the highway of nations. This is what we asserted against Spain, in the case of the Mississippi: it is what the American negotiator of this treaty now admits in relation to the Red river, the Sabine, and the Mississippi, in favor of Texas. Reduced and restricted as the privilege is, it is but a small matter for Maine to receive; nothing for Great Britain to grant; and is counterbalanced by privileges of navigation and of way granted to her. But a question arises here. The privilege of navigation granted is limited to the inhabitants of the countries watered by the river St. John. It does not extend to the citizens of the United States generally, nor even to the citizens of Maine generally; but to those who live upon the waters of the St. John. Is this within the competency of the treaty-making power? Can a treaty be made for the benefit of the people of a single State, or of part of a State? If so, the "supreme law" may be very unequal, and the Union cease to be a unit in regard to its foreign relations.

*"It is, in my opinion, of very great importance that the right of passage be secured for American vessels, between the island of Bois Blanc, in the river Detroit, (opposite Fort Malden,) and the British shore; the channel is only 200 to 300 yards wide, and is entirely commanded both by the island and Fort Malden. At present, there is no other passage for our larger class of vessels, steamboats, &c., and it will require much time and expense to render the old passage south of Gros Isle available. In short, the right of using the British channel is, in my opinion, absolutely necessary."—Mr. Robert Stewart's letter to Mr. Webster, July 27.

This completes my view of the grants and concessions made by Great Britain to the United States by this treaty. They are all of the same character—nothing for Great Britain to grant, trifles for us to receive, and better given up than retained; because undesirable to Great Britain in themselves, and facilitating, by their surrender, the grand object on Maine. Sugar island in Michigan—Rouse's Point in New York—the ninety-mile strip in Vermont—the 100,000 acres in New Hampshire—though no more desirable to the British than the wooden horse was to the Trojans, are all yielded in a way to conciliate those States, and to leave Maine standing alone, to make head against the British designs upon her territory and boundaries. I say standing alone; for even her mother, the old Bay State, was purchased off from her defence by a pecuniary indemnity for her proprietary rights, and by the honor of furnishing the sole negotiator to meet the extraordinary British special mission. Everything along the line, from the four millions of fine mineral land beyond Lake Superior to the long sheep-walk in Vermont, is promptly thrown up; and, from the alacrity with which these concessions (as they are called) are made, and from the anxiety of the sagacious negotiator to please the border States, it may be almost inferred that it was matter of regret that there was no fine mineral land—no sweet little island—no commanding point—no long narrow slip—no pretty little creeks—along the confines of Pennsylvania and Ohio, to be flung up to those two States, in the like gracious manner. In that event, the border States might have been unanimous; and not a chance for a vote against the treaty from the Lake of the Woods to Massachusetts Bay.

Such are the grants and concessions from Great Britain to the United States: few in number, small in value, nothing for her to yield, injurious to her to retain, and already ours as effectually without the treaty as with it. Except the restricted and compensated navigation of the lower St. John, all the rest was already ours—ours by the treaty of 1783, and by the fact that Great Britain wanted none of these slips, or islands, or points of land, with the incumbrance of their republican inhabitants, which she makes a merit of yielding to us. Not so with our grants to her, They are large and valuable—material for her to receive—dangerous and injurious for us to yield—and involving, not only territory, but natural boundaries; and admitting a foreign power within the limits which Nature herself and the treaty of '83 had prescribed for the frontier of an independent nation. And here I frankly accost the subject, and say that, if our negotiator, in forming a general treaty for all the States, and in settling all the subjects in dispute between the two countries, had yielded to the British Crown all that the award of the King of the Netherlands granted, I should have said not a word. But, in transcending that award, which he himself opposed as yielding too much—in giving up more now than the British Government demanded at the time of that award—in doing this, I find reasons for amazement and disapprobation. I am astonished at what I behold; and shall proceed to state the number and the magnitude of the sacrifices we have made; and demand, from the friends of the negotiator, the causes and the reasons for such extraordinary concessions.

These concessions are:

1. The boundary between the Lake Superior and the Lake of the Woods; and all the territory between the true and important boundary abandoned, and the false and insignificant one adopted. The amount of territory sacrificed is large—several hundred thousand acres—and as good for fine minerals as any of the four millions pretended to have been acquired. But it is not as territory that the loss is felt. It is in giving the British fur-traders the great water-line, which facilitates the trade with the Indians, and gives control over them in time of war. By the treaty of 1783, this water-line was the boundary between the two countries; and its use common to the citizens and subjects of each. By this treaty, it becomes exclusively British! A new and inferior line is established further south, encroaching upon our territory; and of this the British have the common use jointly with ourselves!

2. All the country awarded by the King of the Netherlands—being 2,119 square miles, or 2,636,160 acres in extent—all this is given up; and, since the evaporation of the four millions of acres of fine mineral land on the west of Lake Superior, there is not a pretext of an equivalent for it. That award gave Rouse's Point as the equivalent: this treaty pays money for that point, and makes a gift to the British of these 2,119 square miles. To mitigate the enormity of this barefaced sacrifice, our Secretary negotiator enters into a description of the soil, and avers it to be unfit for cultivation. What if it were so? It is still rich enough to bear cannon, and to carry the smuggler's cart; and that is the crop Great Britain wishes to plant upon it. Gibraltar and Malta are rocks; yet Great Britain would not exchange them for the deltas of the Nile and of the Ganges. It is not for growing potatoes and cabbages that she has fixed her eye, since the late war, on this slice of Maine; but for trade and war—to consolidate her power on our northeastern border, and to realize all the advantages which steam power gives to her new military, and naval, and commercial station in Passamaquoddy bay, and her new route for trade and war through Halifax and Maine to Quebec. She wants it for great military and commercial purposes; and it is pitiful and contemptible in our negotiator to depreciate the sacrifice as being poor land, unfit for cultivation, when power and dominion, not potatoes and cabbages, is the object at stake. But the fact is, that much of this land is good; so that the excuse for surrendering it without compensation is unfounded as well as absurd.

3. Eight hundred and ninety-three square miles of territory, equal to 571,520 acres, on this side of the line awarded by the King of the Netherlands. And here our amazement becomes intense, and the want of protocols and minutes of conferences becomes manifest, in leaving us in total darkness as to the origin, progress, and inducements to this unexpected and gratuitous sacrifice. Let the Senate remember that, immediately on the rendition of the award, the British Government declared their assent to it, filed their acceptance with the arbitrator, notified the Government of the United States of what she had done, and formally demanded its fulfilment. It was in the summer of 1831, and immediately after the promulgation of the award, that Sir Charles Vaughan (the then British minister) gave this notification to the American Government, and called upon it to execute the award. President Jackson was not the author of the reference to the King of the Netherlands. It was made before he came into power, and by virtue of a clause in the Ghent treaty, which, instead of following the former treaties, and referring the difference as to the highlands (if any arose between the commissioners appointed to run the line) to another commissioner appointed on the spot to decide between the two opinions;—instead of following this old and plain course, the Ghent treaty directed the difference to be referred to a friendly sovereign. The King of the Netherlands was that sovereign; and his award was adverse to the title of Maine. President Jackson disapproved the reference; but, having been made by his predecessor in office, he felt bound in honor to acquiesce in the award. That was his individual feeling; but, in a case of so much magnitude, he deemed it right to have the opinion of the Senate. This opinion he asked in a formal message of the 7th of December, 1831. On the 27th of January ensuing, he transmitted to the Senate the official demand of the Government of Great Britain for the immediate execution of the award, and a remonstrance against the delay which had occurred. In that official demand, the British charge (Mr. Bankhead) thus remonstrated with our Government on that delay:

"Mr. Livingston is doubtless aware that his predecessor in office was informed verbally, by Mr. Vaughan, that the King his master, upon the receipt of the instrument by which the award of the King of the Netherlands was communicated to the British Government, had considered himself bound, in fulfilment of the obligations which he had contracted by the terms of the convention of arbitration of September 29, 1827, to express to his Netherland Majesty his Majesty's assent to that award. * * * * * It appears to his Majesty's Government that the time is now arrived when a final understanding between the British and American Governments on the subject of that award, and on the measures necessary to be taken for carrying it into effect, ought no longer to be delayed; and the undersigned is accordingly directed, in making to the Secretary of State the present more formal communication of the assent of his Majesty to the decision of his Netherland Majesty, to inquire of Mr. Livingston whether the Government of the United States are now ready to proceed, conjointly with that of Great Britain, to the nomination of commissioners for marking out the boundary between the possessions of his Majesty in North America and those of the United States, agreeable to his Netherland Majesty's award? * * * * * On every ground, therefore, his Majesty feels confident that the Government of the United States will not hesitate to enable the undersigned to apprize his Majesty's Government of their acquiescence in the decision of the King of the Netherlands. * * * * * The grounds on which his Majesty's acceptance of that decision was founded, have been fully explained by the undersigned; and he is commanded to add, that among the motives which influenced his Majesty on that occasion, there was none more powerful than the anxious desire which his Majesty feels to improve and confirm the harmony which so happily exists on other subjects between Great Britain and the United States, by thus settling, once for all, a question of great difficulty, and for which his Majesty is unable to see any other solution."

This demand, thus repeatedly and solemnly made by Great Britain for the execution of the award, establishes a great point in the character of this treaty. It is, that the British Government was then entirely satisfied with that award—asked nothing more—insisted upon its execution; and declared its non-execution to be the only obstacle to the harmony of the two countries, and presented the execution of this award as being the only solution to the existing difficulties. Now what was that award? It was, that the British should have the country north of the St. John and the St. Francis, and that we should have Rouse's Point. This was the whole amount of the award. Not an inch of territory or boundary yielded on this side of the St. John and St. Francis—not a cent in money or territory, as a compensation for Rouse's Point! After this, how comes it that a belt of territory, one hundred and ten miles in length, is yielded on this side those rivers? How comes it that a mountain boundary, one hundred and fifty miles in length, is yielded opposite Quebec? How comes it that a conventional line in the low lands of Maine is substituted for this natural frontier, and so guarded as to be kept at a certain distance from Quebec? And how comes it that Rouse's Point becomes a purchase from Great Britain, for which the United States must pay half a million to Maine and Massachusetts? These are questions to which the mind instantly reverts—upon which it demands light; and upon which the want of protocols leaves it entirely in the dark. The British Government could see no obstacle to harmony but the non-compliance with the award: they could see no solution to the difficulties between the countries, but in the execution of the award. Our Secretary negotiator has found another solution; and that is, to give them double as much as the award gave, and pay for Rouse's Point besides! and that, after rejecting the award because it gave too much!

But to go on with the award, and President Jackson's application to the Senate for their advice and consent to its execution. His message, and the British demand, were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations. That committee, Mr. Tazewell being the chairman, reported in favor of the award. But the report was opposed and defeated; and even a proposition for opening new negotiations with Great Britain shared the same fate. The party in the Senate then in opposition to General Jackson, would neither execute the award, nor treat further for settling the line with Great Britain.* Nothing would then do them, but the treaty of 1783. Defeated in the Senate, and still anxious to execute the award, President Jackson applied himself to the two States interested. To overcome their opposition, he proposed an indem-

*The journals of the Senate prove these statements, and justice to President Jackson requires them to be known. The resolve of Mr. Tazewell was in these words:

"Resolved, That the Senate do advise the President to express to the King of the Netherlands the assent of the United States to the determination made by him, and consent to the execution of the same."

This resolution was defeated by side blows; and the award being thus frustrated, an attempt was made in the Senate to open new negotiations for settling the boundary. The following was the resolution for the new negotiations, and the vote upon its adoption:

"Resolved, That the Senate advise the President to open a new negotiation with his Britannic Majesty's Government, for the ascertainment of the boundary between the possessions of the United States and those of the King of Great Britain, on the Northeastern frontier of the United States, according to the treaty of peace of 1783."

nity of a million of acres of good land in Michigan. The indemnity was scouted. Nothing would do but the true line!—the true line along the highlands!—and that by the 4th day of a certain July! and if not peaceably, then by force! And in this patriotic and warlike ebullition, the negotiator of this treaty boiled hottest and longest; declaring loudly that he would clap a musket upon his shoulder, and march straight to the northwest corner of Nova Scotia himself, and there fight for the line of '83. After all this, he signed this treaty; and the process by which this revolution was effected in his mind and spirit, so desirable to be known, remains a profound secret for want of the protocols.

To soften the effect of this inexplicable sacrifice, the absurd pretext of sterile and poor land is resorted to. These 893 square miles, surrendered on this side the awarded line, are depreciated as unfit for cultivation. If so, what does Great Britaid want with it, except for a purpose more valuable than cultivation? Why is poor land more desirable to her than to us? Why does she want our poor land, (and the question of peace or war depend upon her getting it,) unless it is for war purposes, and to gain a military advantage over us? And here let me say, once for all, that it is but a poor compliment to American intelligence to be turning a question of national boundaries into a question of cornfields. Every child knows that we want mountains, rivers, rocks, and deserts for the former—level and rich land for the latter; and that the nation is a fool that thinks of acres and cultivation, when the question is one of boundaries and dominion.

3. The establishment of the low-land boundary in place of the mountain boundary, and parallel to it. This new line is 110 miles long. It is on this side of the awarded line—not a continuation of it, but a deflexion from it; and evidently contrived for the purpose of weakening our boundary, and retiring it further from Quebec. It will be called in history the Webster line. It begins on the awarded line, at a lake in the St. Francis river; breaks off at right angles to the south, passes over the valley of the St. John in a straight line, and equidistant from that river and the mountain, until it reaches the northwest branch of the St. John, when, approaching within forbidden distance of Quebec, it deflects to the east; and then holds on its course to the gorge in the mountain at the head of Metjarmette creek. A view of the map will show the character of this new line; the words of the treaty show how cautiously it was guarded; and the want of protocols hides its paternity from our view. The character of the line is apparent; and it requires no military man, or military woman, or military child, to say to whose benefit it enures. A man of any sort—a woman of any kind—a child of any age—can tell that! It is a British line, made for the security of Quebec. Follow its calls on the map, and every eye will see this design. These are the calls:

"Beginning at the outlet of the Lake Pohenagamook; thence, southwesterly, in a straight line to a point on the northwest branch of the river St. John, which point shall be ten miles distant from the main branch of the St. John, in a straight line, and in the nearest direction; but if the said point shall be found to be less than seven miles from the nearest point of the summit or crest of the highlands that divide those rivers which empty themselves into the river St. Lawrence from those which fall into the river St. John, then the said point shall be made to recede down the said northwest branch of the river St John, to a point seven miles in a straight line from the said summit or crest; thence, in a straight line, in a course about south eight degrees west, to the point where the parallel of latitude of 46 deg. 25 min. north intersects the southwest branch of the St. John; thence, southerly, by the said branch, to the source thereof in the highlands at the Metjarmette portage."

4. The surrender of the mountain boundary between the United States and Great Britain on the frontiers of Maine. This is a distinct question from the surrender of territory. The latter belonged to Maine: the former to the United States. They were national, and not State boundaries—established by the war of the Revolution, and not by a State law or an act of Congress; and involving all the considerations which apply to the attack and defence of nations. So far as a State boundary is coterminous with another State, it is a State question, and may be left to the discretion of the States interested: so far as it is coterminous with a foreign power, it is a national question, and belongs to the national authority. A State cannot be permitted to weaken and endanger the nation by dismembering herself in favor of a foreigner, by demolishing a strong frontier, delivering the gates and keys of a country into the hands of a neighboring nation, and giving them roads and passes into the country. The boundaries in question were national, not State; and the consent of Maine, even if given, availed nothing. Her defence belongs to the Union; is to be made by the blood and treasure of the Union; and it was not for her, even if she had been willing, to make this defence more difficult, more costly, and more bloody, by giving up the strong, and substituting the weak line of defence. Near three hundred miles of this strong national frontier have been surrendered by this treaty—being double as much as was given up by the rejected award. The King of the Netherlands, although on the list of British generals, and in the pay of the British Crown, was a man of too much honor to deprive us of the commanding mountain frontier opposite to Quebec; and besides, Jackson would have scouted the award if he had attempted it. The King only gave up the old line to the north of the head of the St. Francis river; and for this he had some reason, as the mountain there subsided into a plain, and the ridge of the highlands (in that part) was difficult to follow: our negotiator gives up the boundary for one hundred and fifty miles on this side the head of the St. Francis, and without pretext; for the mountain ridge was there three thousand feet high. The new part given up, from the head of the St. Francis to Metjarmette portage, is invaluable to Great Britain. It covers her new road to Quebec, removes us further from that city, places a mountain between us, and brings her into Maine. To comprehend the value of this new boundary to Great Britain, and its injury to us, it is only necessary to follow it on a map—to see its form—know its height, the depth of its gorges, and its rough and rocky sides. The report of Capt. Talcott will show its character—three thousand feet high: any map will show its form. The gorge at the head of the Metjarmette creek—a water of the St. Lawrence—is made the terminus ad quem of the new conventional lowland line: beyond that gorge, the mountain barrier is yielded to Great Britain. Now, take up a map. Begin at the head of the Metjarmette creek, within a degree and a half of the New Hampshire line—follow the mountain north—see how it bears in upon Quebec—approaching within two marches of that great city, and skirting the St. Lawrence for some hundred miles. All this is given up. One hundred and fifty miles of this boundary is given up on this side the awarded line; and the country left to guess and wonder at the enormity and fatuity of the sacrifice.* Look at the new military road from Halifax to Quebec—that part of it which approaches Quebec, and lies between the mountain and the St. Lawrence. Even by the awarded line, this road was forced to cross the mountain at or beyond the head of the St. Francis, and then to follow the base of the mountain for near one hundred miles, with all the disadvantages of crossing the spurs and gorges of the mountain, and the creeks and ravines, and commanded in its whole extent by the power on the mountain. See how this is changed by the new boundary! the road permitted to take either side of the mountain—to cross where it pleases—and covered and protected in its whole extent by the mountain heights, now exclusively British. Why this new way, and this security for the road, unless to give the British still greater advantages over us than the awarded boundary gave? A palliation is attempted for it. It is said that the mountain is unfit for cultivation; that the line along it could not be ascertained; and that Maine consented. These are the palliations—insignificant if true, but not true in their essential parts. And, first, as to the poverty of the mountain, and the slip along their base, constituting this area of 893 square miles surrendered on this side the awarded line: Captain Talcott certifies it to be poor, and unfit for cultivation. I say, so much the better for a frontier. As to the height of the mountains, and the difficulty of finding the dividing ridge, and the necessity of adopting a conventional line: I say all this has no application to the surrendered boundary on this side the awarded line at the head of the St. Francis. On this side of that point, the mountain ridge is lofty, the heights attain three thousand feet; and navigable rivers rise in them, and flow to the east and to the west—to the St. Lawrence and the Atlantic. Hear Captain Talcott, in his letter to Mr. Webster:

"The territory within the lines mentioned by you contains eight hundred and ninety-three square miles—equal to five hundred and seventy-one thousand five hundred and twenty acres. It is a long and narrow tract upon the mountains or highlands, the distance from Lake Pohenagamook to the Metjarmette portage being one hundred and ten miles. The territory is barren, and without timber of value; and I should estimate that nineteen parts out of twenty are unfit for cultivation. Along eighty miles of this territory the highlands throw up into irregular eminences of different heights, and, though observing a general northeast and southwest direction, are not brought well into line. Some of these elevations are over three thousand feet above the sea.

"The formation is primitive siliceous rock, with slate resting upon it around the basis. Between the eminences are morasses and swamps, throughout which beds of moss, of luxuriant growth, rest on and cover the rocks and earth beneath. The growth is such as is usual in mountain regions on this continent in high latitudes. On some of the ridges and eminences birch and maple are found; on others, spruce and fir; and in the swamps, spruce intermixed with cedar; but the wood everywhere is insignificant, and of stinted growth. It will readily be seen, therefore, that for cultivation, or as capable of furnishing the means of human subsistence, the lands are of no value."

This letter was evidently obtained for the purpose of depreciating the lost boundary, by showing it to be unfit for cultivation. The note of the Secretary negotiator which drew it forth is not given, but the answer of Captain Talcott shows its character; and its date (that of the 14th of July) classes it with the testimony which was hunted up to justify a foregone conclusion. The letter of Captain Talcott is good for the Secretary's purpose, and for a great deal more. It is good for the overthrow of all the arguments on which the plea for a conventional boundary stood. What was that plea? Simply, that the highlands in the neighborhood of the northwest corner of Nova Scotia could not be traced; and that it was necessary to substitute a conventional line in their place. And it is the one on which the award of the King of the Netherlands turned, and was, to the extent of a part of his award, a valid one. But it was no reason for the American Secretary to give one hundred and fifty miles of mountain line on this side of the awarded line, where the highlands attained three thousand feet of elevation, and turned navigable rivers to the right and left. Lord Ashburton, in his letter of the 13th of June, commences with this idea: that the highlands described in the treaty could not be found, and had been so admitted by American statesmen, and quotes their declarations. He says:

"In the year 1802, Mr. Madison, at that time Secretary of State for the United States, in his instructions to Mr. Rufus King, observed that the difficulty in fixing the northwest angle of Nova Scotia 'arises from a reference in the treaty of 1783 to highlands which, it is now found, have no definite existence.' And he suggests the appointment of a commission, to be jointly appointed, 'to determine on a point most proper to be substituted for the description in article II of the treaty of 1783.' Again: Mr. President Jefferson, in a message to Congress on the 17th of October, 1803, stated that 'a further knowledge of the ground in the northeastern and northwestern angles of the United States has evinced that the boundaries established by the treaty of Paris, between the British territories and ours, in those points, were too imperfectly described to be susceptible of execution.'"

Here it is very clear that it is not the line itself, in its whole extent, between Canada and Maine, that cannot be fixed for want of finding these highlands; but merely the northeastern corner, as determined by the northwestern corner of Nova Scotia. This idea, sufficiently clear in the few words quoted from Mr. Madison, becomes still more so when we refer to the whole paragraph in his letter of June 8, 1802, to Mr. Rufus King. In that paragraph he says:

"In fixing the point at which the line is to terminate, (the due-north line from the head of the St. Croix to the highlands which divide the waters of the St. Lawrence from those of the Atlantic,) and which is referred to as the northwest corner of Nova Scotia, the difficulty arises from a reference of the treaty of 1783 to the highlands, which, it is now found, have no definite existence. To remove this difficulty, no better expedient occurs than to provide for the appointment of a third commissioner, as in article 5 of the treaty of 1794; and to authorise the three to determine on a point most proper to be substituted for the description in the 2d article of the treaty of 1783, having due regard to the general idea that the line ought to terminate on the elevated ground dividing the rivers falling into

* Mr. Featherstonhaugh, formerly employed by the British Government in researches upon this boundary, thus displays the military importance of the new boundary, in a late speech in England:

"The treaty of 1783 proposed to establish the boundary between the two countries along certain highlands. The Americans claimed these highlands to run in a northeasterly direction from the head of the Connecticut river, in a course which would have brought the boundary within the distance of twenty miles from the river St. Lawrence, and which, besides cutting off the posts and military routes leading from the province of New Brunswick to Quebec, would have given them various military positions to command and overawe that river and the fortress of Quebec.

"Now, gentlemen, if you will divert your attention for a moment from the conflicting statements you may have read in regard to the merits of the compromise which has been made, I will explain them to you in a few words. The American claim, instead of being maintained, has been altogether withdrawn and abandoned; the territory has been divided into equal moieties, as nearly as possible; we have retained that moiety which secures to us every object that was essential to the welfare of our colonies; all our communications, military and civil, are forever placed beyond hostile reach; and all the military positions on the highlands claimed by America are, without exception, secured forever to Great Britain."

the Atlantic from those emptying themselves into the St Lawrence. The commissioners may also be authorized to substitute for the description of the boundary between the point so fixed, and the northwesternmost head of the Connecticut river, namely, a line drawn along the said highlands; such a reference to intermediate sources of rivers, or other ascertained or ascertainable points, to be connected by straight lines, as will admit of easy and accurate execution hereafter, and as will best comport with the apparent intention of the treaty of 1783."

From this full quotation of Mr. Madison's letter, it is still more clear than in Lord Ashburton's note—1. That the part at which the treaty could not be executed, for want of finding highlands, was the point to be constituted by the intersection of the due-north line from the head of the St. Croix with the line drawn along the highlands. 2. That this point might be substituted by a conventional one agreed upon by the three commissioners. 3. That from this point, so agreed upon, the line was to go to the highlands, and to follow them wherever they could be ascertained, to the head of the Connecticut river. This is the clear sense of Mr. Madison's letter and Mr. Jefferson's message; and it is to be very careless to confound this point (which they admitted to be dubious, for want of highlands at that place) with the line itself, which was to run near 300 miles on the elevations of a mountain reaching 3,000 feet high. The King of the Netherlands took a great liberty with this point when he brought it to the St. John river: our Secretary-negotiator took a far greater liberty with it when he brought it to the head of the Metjarmette creek; for it is only at the head of this creek that our line under the new treaty begins to climb the highlands. The King of the Netherlands had some apology for his conventional point and conventional line to the head of the St. Francis—for the highlands were sunk into table-land where the point ought to be, and which was the terminus a quo of his conventional line: but our negotiator had no apology at all for turning this conventional line south, and extending it 110 miles through the level lands of Maine, when the mountain highlands were all along in sight to the west. It is impossible to plead the difficulty of finding the highlands for this substitution of the lowland boundary, in the whole distance from the head of the St. Francis, where the King of the Netherlands fixed the commencement of our mountain line, to the head of the Metjarmette, where our Secretary fixed its commencement. Lord Ashburton's quotation from Mr. Madison's letter is partial and incomplete: he quotes what answers his purpose, and is justifiable in so doing. But what must we think of our Secretary-negotiator, who neglected to quote the remainder of that letter, and show that it was a conventional point, and not a conventional line, that Mr. Jefferson and Mr. Madison proposed? and that this conventional point was merely to fix the northwest angle of Nova Scotia where, in fact, there were no highlands; after which, the line was to proceed to the elevated ground dividing the waters, &c., and then follow the highlands to the head of the Connecticut? Why did our Secretary omit this correction of the British minister's quotation, and thus enable him to use American names against us?

The consent of Maine is the next palliation for this great sacrifice; and here I have to repeat that, even if such consent had been given, it would signify nothing. The boundaries in question are not State, but national: they are not in the custody of Maine, but of the whole Union. But Maine did not consent. She was victimized into conditional submission by the arts and arguments of the Secretary negotiator! And here the strangest part of this inexplicable negotiation opens itself to our view. The consent of Maine! What was that consent? How obtained? And how used? She is said to have consented to this great dismemberment of her territory; surrender of her natural boundaries; the establishment of new boundaries within her old and natural limits; and the consolidation of the British military and naval power around her and within her. To all this she is said to have assented; and this is the short answer which is given for the enormous sacrifices she has been made to suffer. Did she consent? No more than the victim consents to its execution, because it walks, instead of being dragged, to the scaffold! Isolated from her sister States—from Massachusetts, New Hampshire, Vermont, New York, and Michigan—all of which were conciliated in favor of the treaty; pressed upon by her own Government, which presented the British proposition, and urged its acceptance; informed her that nothing better could be expected; warned her that this might be the last chance for settling the question by agreement; presented her as the sole obstacle to the peace and happiness of two great nations:—thus isolated, urged, and menaced, the Maine commissioners so far assented as to agree to the sacrifice, upon condition that the Senate of the United States, on mature consideration, should advise and consent to the ratification of the treaty. The whole question was referred to our mature consideration: and yet, no sooner was conditional consent and reference to us obtained, than the full and absolute consent of Maine was heralded forth to forestal the public mind—to silence Maine herself; and is now incontinently repeated on this floor, to preclude our consideration of the subject. That I state this conditional consent correctly, I will show by presenting it to the Senate. After stating that it was this, or nothing; that Massachusetts had assented; that the General Government was anxious; that it was the last chance, and so on,—the Maine commissioners proceed to say:

"Thus situated, the commissioners of Maine, invoking the spirit of attachment and patriotic devotion of their State to the Union, and being willing to yield to the deliberate convictions of her sister States as to the path of duty, and to interpose no obstacles to an adjustment which the general judgment of the nation shall pronounce as honorable and expedient, even if that judgment shall lead to a surrender of a portion of the birthright of the people of their State, and prized by them because it is their birthright,—have determined to overcome their objections to the proposal, so far as to say, that if, upon mature consideration, the Senate of the United States shall advise and consent to the ratification of a treaty, corresponding in its terms with your proposal, and with the conditions in our memorandum accompanying this note, (marked A,) and identified by our signatures, they, by virtue of the power vested in them by the resolves of the Legislature of Maine, give the assent of that State to such conventional line, with the terms, conditions, and equivalents herein mentioned."

And this is her consent! Pressed by the President of the United States—pressed by the American negotiator—menaced—abandoned by her mother State—isolated from other States—presented as sole obstacle to the general peace—warned that it was the last chance: thus situated, this devoted State so far subdues herself as to say, through her commissioners, that she submits to the sacrifice, if, upon mature consideration, the Senate of the United States shall approve it. And no sooner is this reluctant, painful, conditional assent to the decision of the Senate obtained from Maine, than it is proclaimed as free and unqualified acquiescence! and the Senate, and the whole Union, are required to approve the treaty, because Maine had approved it! This is adding insult to injury, and serving the Senate but little more fairly than Maine herself has been served. The part which the Secretary negotiator has acted in bringing things to this pass; his arts and his arguments in victimizing a State which he should have defended; his wonderful change since the rejection of the award—all these belong to my general objections to the treaty, and will be examined in another part of my speech. At present, I limit myself to showing that Maine did not consent to the wrong which was done to her, and done to the United States; but made that consent dependent and conditional on the judgment of the Senate, after mature consideration.

I do not argue the question of title to the territory and boundaries surrendered. That work has been done in the masterly report of the Senator from Pennsylvania, [MR. BUCHANAN,] and in the resolve of the Senate, unanimously adopted, which sanctioned it. That report and that resolve were made and adopted in the year 1838—seven years after the award of the King of the Netherlands—and vindicated our title to the whole extent of the disputed territory. After this vindication, it is not for me to argue the question of title. I remit that task to abler and more appropriate hands—to the author of the report of 1838. It will be for him to show the clearness of our title under the treaty of 1783—how it was admitted in Mr. Jay's treaty of 1794, in Mr. Liston's correspondence of 1798, in Mr. King's treaty of 1803, in Mr. Monroe's treaty of 1807, and in the conferences at Ghent—where, after the late war had shown the value of a military communication between Quebec and Halifax, a variation of the line was solicited as a favor, by the British commissioners, to establish that communication. It will be for him also to show the progress of the British claim, from the solicited favor of a road, to the assertion of title to half the territory and all the mountain frontier of Maine; and it will further be for him to show how he is deserted now by those who stood by him then. It will be for him to expose the fatal blunder at Ghent, in leaving our question of title to the arbitration of a European sovereign, instead of confiding the marking of the line to three commissioners, as proposed in all the previous treaties, and agreed to in several of them. To him, also, it will belong to expose the contradiction between rejecting the award for adopting a conventional line, and giving up part of the territory of Maine; and now negotiating a treaty which adopts two conventional lines, gives up all that the award did, and more too, and a mountain frontier besides; and then pays money for Rouse's Point, which came to us without money under the award. It will be for him to do these things. For what purpose? some one will say. I answer, for the purpose of vindicating our honor, our intelligence, and our good faith, in all this affair with Great Britain; for the purpose of showing how we are wronged in character and in rights by this treaty; and for the purpose of preventing similar wrongs and blunders in time to come. Maine may be dismembered, and her boundaries lost, and a great military power established on three sides of her; but the Columbia is yet to be saved! There we have a repetition of the Northeastern comedy of errors on our part, and of groundless pretension on the British part, growing up from a petition for joint possession for fishing and hunting, to an assertion of title and threat of war; this groundless pretension dignified into a claim by the lamentable blunder of the convention of London in 1818. We may save the Columbia by showing the folly, or worse, which has dismembered Maine.

I proceed with the enumeration and consideration of the American concessions to the British.

6. The navigation of the St. John within the limits of the State of Maine. This results from the new line—the Webster line—which brings the British into the valley of the St. John, on the upper part of that river, and this side of the awarded line. The privilege of navigation is granted to the new neighbors which this line gives to Maine; and may be considered as a set-off to the navigation granted below to the inhabitants of Maine where the river is exclusively within the British dominions. It is navigation against navigation, and deprives the privilege granted to Maine of the benevolent and meritorious character claimed for it. We grant as much navigation as we receive, with the superaddition of a territorial right of way to the river where it is exclusively within our limits; a right which is denied to us where the river is wholly within the British limits.

7. The territorial right of way granted to these new neighbors to cross the Webster line, and travel over-land to the upper St. John, to enjoy their navigation within the exclusive limits of Maine. It is a privilege of no mean value, being new in principle, extensive in territory, and not reciprocated by a similar privilege to the inhabitants of Maine on the lower part of the river. On this lower part the settlements of Maine skirt the St. John for one hundred miles, often approaching within five or ten miles of it. It would be very convenient to these settlements to cross the British line, and go straight to the river; but this advantage is denied them. They must get to the river by water, of which there is but one channel (the Aroostook;) or they must enter above, where the river is a mutual boundary, and from which they will have the exercise of carrying round, or pitching their saw-logs over, a second Niagara falls, eighty feet in the perpendicular plunge. The British on the Webster line are to have this privilege of over-land transit to and from the river, where it is within the exclusive dominion of Maine; and that, to the whole extent of the line—one hundred and ten miles. Reciprocity would have required a similar privilege to the Maine people below. Not having received it, this territorial right of way becomes a gratuitous concession, as important for its principles and consequences as for its novelty and inequality.

8. The sum of $300,000 to be paid to Maine and Massachusetts for their territorial losses under the treaty. This is to be paid by the United States, and is a concession most lamely and impotently accounted for by the American negotiator. The want of protocols deprives us of a knowledge of its history. We only find it, for the first time, in its full-grown form, in the letter of the United States negotiator of the 15th of July to the commissioners of Maine, where it appears as an equivalent for British concessions. Speaking of it in this sense, our Secretary says:

"These cessions on the part of England would enure partly to the benefit of the States of New Hampshire, Vermont, and New York, but principally to the United States. The consideration on the part of England, for making them, would be the manner agreed upon for adjusting the Eastern boundary. The price of the cession, therefore, whatever it might be, would in fairness belong to the two States interested in the manner of that adjustment.

"Under the influence of these considerations, I am authorized to say, that if the commissioners of the two States assent to the line as described in the accompanying paper, the United States will undertake to pay to these States the sum of two hundred and fifty thousand dollars, [increased to three hundred thousand dollars,] to be divided between them in equal moieties; and, also, to undertake for the settlement and payment of the expenses incurred by those States, for the maintenance of the civil posse; and, also, for a survey which it was found necessary to make."

This is the brief history of this strange item—an item strange in itself, and coming to us in a strange way. We find it in the proposition made by the American negotiator, in the name of his Government, to the commissioners of Maine: Lord Ashburton (for aught that is seen) having nothing to do with it. We find it as an American proposition; and an inconceivable one it is. Maine and Massachusetts lose 3,207,800 acres of land! Great Britain gets it! and the United States pay for it! How make the United States paymaster in a case where she was receiving nothing, and where she was losing the invaluable national boundaries established by the treaty of '83? How do this? By what legerdemain? The Secretary negotiator says it is for cessions on the part of England, which enure partly to the benefit of New Hampshire, Vermont, and New York, and partly to the United States; and also as a consideration on the part of Great Britain for adjusting the Northeastern boundary. Adjustment of boundary! What a delicate phrase for the demolition of the great boundaries purchased for us by the blood and treasure of the Revolutionary war! But the cessions enure partly to the benefit of the United States; and thus, being partly benefited, she must pay all the money. But how this benefit? What these cessions? and how enure to the national benefit? What are they? Not Rouse's Point; for that belongs to New York, and must be purchased from that State if wanted by the United States. But why pay Great Britain for Rouse's Point? The award of the King of the Netherlands gave it to us without pay, and we would not have it. It has been a derelict these twenty-five years, neither the United States nor Great Britain touching it. Why this sudden value in the eyes of those who repulsed it when given by the King of the Netherlands? The same of the slips in New Hampshire and Vermont. They belong to those States. Not an inch of their soil enures to the benefit of the United States. It is not public land, but State property, which they constitute; and we have nothing to do with them. Besides, they are not cessions. They are, and always have been, and forever would be, the property of the States within whose revolutionary boundaries they lie. Great Britain would not receive them as a gift, much less demand money for their sale. No, sir, no. This mystification will not do. The United States becomes paymaster in a case where she receives nothing—where Great Britain gains—and where Maine and Massachusetts lose. This is the short and the long of the story: and the $300,000 is put into the treaty to coerce Congress to pay it. If not to coerce Congress, why put it there? It is an ugly interposition of a foreign Government between the Government of the Union and a couple of its members; and if not put there for coercion, why is it put there? The equal division of this money between Maine and Massachusetts is another awkward circumstance: they divide equally while selling unequally. Massachusetts sells nothing but land which she wished to sell: Maine parts with land against her will—parts with jurisdiction—parts with boundaries—parts with cherished and long defended objects—and parts from all with grief and shame, and under the duresse of actual moral and menaced physical force from two powerful Governments. And, after all this, she divides equally with Massachusetts, who only sells what she wishes to sell, and with the advantage of selling to a sovereign ready-money purchaser in the mass, instead of doling out the acres in driblets, and on credits, to private individuals. One thing only is clear in this inexplicable transaction; and that is, that Maine and the United States are losers, and Massachusetts and Great Britain gainers.

9. The sum of about $200,000 to be paid to Massachusetts and Maine for their expenses in defending the disputed territory against Great Britain. This is an article more strange than the other to find a place in the treaty. If right to pay it, it should have rested on the faith of Congress: if wrong, it is made worse, by being put in a treaty with a foreign power. It is a dangerous practice in confederacies to have foreign powers interposing between the confederacy and its members. Payments to States for expenditures in their proper defence is a domestic concern, and a legislative question. It belongs to our own authorities, and to the legislative department of those authorities. If these $200,000, thus stipulated to be paid to Maine and Massachusetts were for military expenses, properly incurred in their own defence through the neglect or default of the General Government, the question of reimbursement would still be one of exclusive legislative consideration. It would address itself to Congress. But it is not even a question of that kind, but of police and surveying expenses. The treaty says, vaguely, for protecting the disputed territory, and making a survey thereof: the correspondence explains this protection to be for the maintenance of a civil posse, and for a survey necessary to be made. Congress itself cannot pay States for maintaining civil posses and making surveys. It must be for defence against invasion or insurrection. This is the Constitution; and the treaty-making power is not above the Constitution, but subordinate to it. The supremacy of the treaty is not over the Constitution, but over the subjects falling within the scope of that power. It is for Congress to say whether a case has occurred to authorize Maine and Massachusetts to be reimbursed for expenses incurred in resisting invasion. The treaty-making power has nothing to do with it, and it is an invasion of the legislative power to put it into a treaty. In the light of a civil posse and a survey, Congress itself cannot pay these $200,000. The President, the Senate, and Queen Victoria cannot extend our Constitution, or bind the Congress to pass unconstitutional acts. The payment of this sum for a civil posse and a survey, unjustifiable in itself, becomes aggravated by this unconstitutional attempt to control and coerce Congress. It was evidently put in for that purpose, and should be struck from the treaty. It is a question for legislation, and not for diplomacy; and Lord Ashburton evidently looks to this, in his ultimate note, washing his hands of all these payments to Maine and Massachusetts.

10. The naval alliance for the suppression of the slave-trade. This alliance is a part of the treaty, and evidently an indissoluble part of it. The motion to strike it out is to be resisted; and is already resisted as a motion to destroy the treaty, to prevent its ratification by Great Britain, and as exposing us to war with that power. All this is an admission that the treaty is a unit; that the alliance is a part of it; and that this alliance cannot be refused without exciting the resentment of Great Britain. I do not discuss the merits of this alliance at present; a proper time will be found for that discussion when I come to the article which stipulates for the naval co-operation. At present, I only mention it as one of the considerations which make up the price which we pay for the treaty, as one of the American concessions and equivalents, and therefore proper to be enumerated in the catalogue of grants and sacrifices on our part. I shall move to strike it out, both as wrong in itself, and as being in a wrong place, even if it was right.

11. The diplomatic alliance for remonstrances with foreign Governments which still admit the trade in African slaves. This is an undertaking of the same character with the naval alliance, subject to the same remarks, as an American consideration for making the treaty; and only mentioned now, for the sake of enumeration in the list of our grants and equivalents. Its merits will be discussed under the proper head.

12. The delivery of fugitive criminals. This stipulation is another of the American concessions in favor of Great Britain. The design of it is to get hold of fugitive "rebels" from Canada, under the pretext of getting hold of fugitives from justice. The design is political, though cloaked with the name of justice; and though equal in its terms, is unequal in its operation. Fugitive American slaves will not be given up; fugitive British subjects will be. Our slaves will still be enticed into Canada by the honors, the rewards, and the protection which await them there; and I only mention this fugitive stipulation now, as one of our concessions to Great Britain, and one to which late events in Canada have given great importance. I will discuss it when I come to the 10th article.

Such is the catalogue, and such the comparative value of the grants and equivalents (as they are called by our negotiator) which are made by this treaty. It is a long and heavy list on the part of the United States—a short and a light one on the part of Great Britain. So far as the Maine boundary is concerned, I have no more to say; but the other parts of the treaty—what it contains—what it omits—the general objections to it—and the various questions which arise upon the correspondence,—all these demand attention, and I proceed to give it.

The suppression of the African slave-trade is the second subject included in the treaty; and here the regret renews itself at the absence of all the customary lights upon the origin and progress of treaty stipulations. No minutes of conference; no protocols; no draughts or counterdraughts; no diplomatic notes; not a word of any kind from one negotiator to the other. Nothing in relation to the subject, in the shape of negotiation, is communicated to us. Even the section of the correspondence entitled "Suppression of the slave-trade"—even this section professedly devoted to the subject, contains not a syllable upon it from the negotiators to each other, or to their Governments; but opens and closes with communications from American naval officers, evidently extracted from them by the American negotiator, to justify the forthcoming of preconceived and foregone conclusions. Never since the art of writing was invented could there have been a treaty of such magnitude negotiated with such total absence of necessary light upon the history of its formation. Lamentable as is this defect of light upon the formation of the treaty generally, it becomes particularly so at this point, where a stipulation new, delicate, and embarrassing, has been unexpectedly introduced, and falls upon us as abruptly as if it fell from the clouds. In the absence of all appropriate information from the negotiators themselves, I am driven to glean among the scanty paragraphs of the President's message, and in the answers of the naval officers to the Secretary's inquiries. Though silent as to the origin and progress of the proposition for this novel alliance, they still show the important particular of the motives which caused it. The President says:

"The treaty obligations subsisting between the two countries for the suppression of the African slave trade, and the complaints made to this Government within the last three or four years (many of them but too well founded) of the visitation, seizure, and detention of American vessels on that coast, by British cruisers, could not but form a delicate and highly important part of the negotiations which have now been held.

"It is known that, in December last, a treaty was signed in London, by the representatives of England, France, Russia, Prussia, and Austria, having for its professed object a strong and united effort of the five powers to put an end to the traffic. This treaty was not officially communicated to the Government of the United States, but its provisions and stipulations are supposed to be accurately known to the public. It is understood to be not yet ratified on the part of France.

"No application or request has been made to this Government to become party to this treaty; but the course it might take in regard to it, has excited no small degree of attention and discussion in Europe, as the principle upon which it is founded, and the stipulations which it contains, have caused warm animadversions and great political excitement.

"In my message at the commencement of the present session of Congress, I endeavored to state the principles which this Government supports respecting the right of search and the immunity of flags. Desirous of maintaining those principles fully, at the same time that existing obligations should be fulfilled, I have thought it most consistent with the honor and dignity of the country, that it should execute its own laws, and perform its own obligations, by its own means and its own power. The examination or visitation of the merchant vessels of one nation, by the cruisers of another, for any purpose, except those known and acknowledged by the law of nations, under whatever restraints or regulations it may take place, may lead to dangerous results. It is far better, by other means, to supersede any supposed necessity, or any motive, for such examination or visit. Interference with a merchant vessel by an armed cruiser, is always a delicate proceeding, apt to touch the point of national honor, as well as to affect the interests of individuals. It has been thought, therefore, expedient, not only in accordance with the stipulations of the treaty of Ghent, but at the same time as removing all pretext on the part of others for violating the immunities of the American flag upon the seas, as they exist and are defined by the law of nations, to enter into the articles now submitted to the Senate."

The recitals in this paragraph are of momentous importance. They are conclusive to show that the stipulations into which we have entered, are the price which we have agreed to pay for the privilege of going unsearched upon the coast of Africa, and for the favor of not being officially required to join the quintuple alliance for the suppression of the slave-trade. The two first paragraphs are pregnant of these inferences: the concluding sentences of the last paragraph are conclusive of their truth. The first paragraph recites the fact of the seizure, detention, and visitation of our ships on the coast of Africa by British cruisers: the second ambiguously refers to the five powers alliance, and raises surmises of their designs, which it does not satisfy: the concluding sentences of the last paragraph are sufficiently explicit in the declaration that we join Great Britain to avoid a junction with the five powers! and that we search ourselves, to avoid being searched by British cruisers! Studiously ambiguous, and profuse of phrases to deceive, while stinted of facts to inform, the message still lets out enough to betray these hidden and momentous meanings. The treaty has not been officially communicated to our Government. But may it not have been unofficially? and if so, by whom? for what purpose? and what are its contents? Instead of answering these pertinent inquiries, so naturally suggested by the declaration of the non-official communication, the sentence obliques off into the empty supposition that the contents are well known to the public! Why tell us this? why tell us what the public knows? We want to know what the Government knows—how it obtained its information—and what it is required to do. Instead of that, it tells us of the public: and then flies off to France, and informs us what we well knew before—that France had not signed. All this is foreign to the point. We want to know what concerns ourselves—whether the five powers are occupied with our affairs—and whether they have shown us their treaty—and for what purpose? The message says: "No application has been made to the United States to become a party to this quintuple alliance, but . . . but . . . but . . . the course we may take is the subject of attention, and discussion, and warmth, and excitement in Europe!" But what all this tends to, and what is required of us to allay this excitement, the message does not say. Instead of satisfying the curiosity which it excited as to the course of things in relation to us in Europe, it flies back to this continent—reverts to the President's message at the commencement of the session—denies the right of search—asserts the immunity of flags—and then most ominously declares that it is better to execute our own laws, and perform our own obligations; and do this by our own means, and by our own power. Why this declaration? Were others about to execute our laws, and perform our obligations, and to use means and powers upon us, not our own? Was this the state of the case? and, if so, why not tell us? Why this paltering and equivocation, unless to hide a damned conclusion which must be suffered, but cannot be told? The next sentence, however, approaches the point. "It is better to supersede the motive and supposed necessity for this delicate and dangerous search." And, finally, in the last words of the last sentence, the fatal secret is let out—that the articles now before the Senate were entered into for the purpose of "removing all pretext on the part of others for violating the immunities of the American flag in the African seas!" This is the secret; and after this, it stands confessed that our naval and diplomatic alliance with Great Britain is the price which we pay for five years' exemption from search, and for the favor of not being made a party to the quintuple alliance. The alliance with Great Britain is a substitute for these penalties: and a more ignominious purchase of exemption from outrage never disgraced the annals of an independent nation.

We will now see what is the price we have contracted to pay for these exemptions; and for that purpose I read the 8th and 9th articles of the treaty:

"ARTICLE VIII. The parties mutually stipulate that each shall prepare, equip, and maintain in service, on the coast of Africa, a sufficient and adequate squadron, or naval force of vessels, of suitable numbers and descriptions, to carry in all not less than eighty guns, to enforce separately and respectively the laws, rights, and obligations of each of the two countries, for the suppression of the slave trade; the said squadrons to be independent of each other, but the two Governments stipulating, nevertheless, to give such orders to the officers commanding their respective forces, as shall enable them most effectually to act in concert and co operation, upon mutual consultation, as exigencies may arise, for the attainment of the true object of this article; copies of all such orders to be communicated by each Government to the other respectively.

"ARTICLE IX. Whereas, notwithstanding all efforts which may be made on the coast of Africa for suppressing of the slave-trade, the facilities for carrying on the traffic, and avoiding the vigilance of cruisers by the fraudulent use of flags, and other means, are so great, and the temptations for pursuing it, while a market can be found for slaves, so strong, as that the desired result may be long delayed, unless all markets be shut against the purchase of African negroes; the parties to this treaty agree that they will unite in all becoming representations and remonstrances with any and all powers within whose dominions such markets are allowed to exist; and that they will urge upon all such powers the propriety and duty of closing such markets effectually at once and forever."

This is the price! naval and diplomatic alliance with Great Britain! And the eleventh article stipulates that the naval alliance is to continue for five years, and afterwards until one of the parties shall give notice for its cessation. Of course, Great Britain will never give the notice. Of course, also, the American Administration which makes it, will never give the notice. The alliance is eternal, unless we break down the party which made it. And this is the course of all revolting and dangerous innovations. It is as temporary measures they are introduced. They are continued imperceptibly; and finally made permanent, and fastened irrevocably upon the country. This will be the case with this alliance, unless the elections of 1844 relieve us from the dominion of the party now in power. And now let us see the extent of the obligations we have incurred to purchase this exemption from search, and to be excused from signing the quintuple treaty. They are: First, to prepare, equip, and maintain in service on the coast of Africa, a squadron of "at least" eighty guns, to coöperate with a British squadron in suppressing the slave trade. Secondly, to unite with Great Britain in diplomatic remonstrances and representations against the purchase of African negroes, with all the powers which still admit such purchases, and urging them to cease the practice, and to close the door against such purchases at once and forever. These are the obligations; and it is seen at once that they constitute an alliance—a double alliance—between the United States and Great Britain. The first sensation of an American in discovering this ominous conjunction, is that of astonishment, indignation, and shame. The farewell words of Washington rush to the mind. He warned us against entangling ourselves in foreign alliance: and here we are deeply entangled, and that with the very nation which, of all the others in the world, is the most to be dreaded.

The consequences of this entanglement are beyond the reach of human foresight, or of mental divination. It is the commencement of involving our America, and with it the whole New World, in the systems and vortex of European politics. We begin with going to Africa to join Great Britain, Russia, Prussia, and Austria, (for France declines the favor,) in redressing the grievances of the Old World; after that, it is a natural step for these great powers to come over here to redress the wrongs of the New World. If this fatal policy is suffered to continue; if we go on to mix ourselves in the affairs of Europe; if we quit our own, to stand upon foreign ground; if we hitch our cockboat to the grand navies of Europe, and tie on our little ministers behind the gorgeous representatives of mighty monarchs;—if we do this, then it is in vain that Providence isolated us, and that Washington warned us. We are doomed to foreign connexions, and to foreign interference; and may expect to see the affairs of the two Americas, from Baffin's Bay to Cape Horn, regulated by the sovereign congresses of Vienna, St. Petersburg, and London; and the fleets and armies of Europe sent here to enforce their decrees.

Passing from the political consequences of this entanglement—consequences which no human foresight can reach—I come to the immediate and practical effects which lie within our view, and which display the enormous inexpediency of the measure. First: the expense in money—an item which would seem to be entitled to some regard in the present deplorable state of the treasury—in the present cry for retrenchment—and in the present heavy taxation upon the comforts and necessaries of life. This expense for 80 guns will be about $750,000 per annum, exclusive of repairs and loss of lives. I speak of the whole expense, as part of the naval establishment of the United States, and not of the mere expense of working the ships after they have gone to sea. Nine thousand dollars per gun is about the expense of the establishment; 80 guns would be $720,000 per annum, which is $3,600,000 for five years. But the squadron is not limited to a maximum of 80 guns; that is the minimum limit: it is to be 80 guns "at the least." And if the party which granted these 80 shall continue in power, Great Britain may find it as easy to double the number, as it was to obtain the first eighty. Nor is the time limited to five years; it is only determinable after that period by giving notice; a notice not to be expected from those who made the treaty. At the least, then, the moneyed expense is to be $3,600,000; if the present party continues in power, it may double or treble that amount; and this, besides the cost of the ships. Such is the moneyed expense. In ships, the wear and tear of vessels must be great. We are to prepare, equip, and maintain in service, on a coast 4,000 miles from home, the adequate number of vessels to carry these 80 guns. It is not sufficient to send the number there; they must be kept up and maintained in service there; and this will require constant expenses to repair injuries, supply losses, and cover casualties. In the employment of men, and the waste of life and health, the expenditure must be large. Ten men and two officers to the gun, is the smallest estimate that can be admitted. This would require a complement of 960 men. Including all the necessary equipage of the ship, and above 1,000 persons will be constantly required. These are to be employed at a vast distance from home; on a savage coast; in a perilous service; on both sides of the equator; and in a climate which is death to the white race. This waste of men—this wear and tear of life and constitution—should stand for something in a Christian land, and in this age of roaming philanthropy; unless, indeed, in excess of love for the blacks, it is deemed meritorious to destroy the whites. The field of operations for this squadron is great; the term "coast of Africa" having an immense application in the vocabulary of the slave-trade. On the western coast of Africa, according to the replies of the naval officers Bell and Paine, the trade is carried on from Senegal to Cape Frio—a distance of 3,600 miles, following its windings, as the watching squadrons would have to go. But the track of the slavers between Africa and America has to be watched, as well as the immediate coast; and this embraces a space in the ocean of 35 degrees on each side of the equator, (say four thousand miles,) and covering the American coast from Cuba to Rio Janeiro; so that the coast of Africa—the western coast alone—embraces a diagram of the ocean of near 4,000 miles every way, having the equator in the centre, and bounded east and west by the New and the Old World. This is for the western coast only: the eastern is nearly as large. The same naval officers say that a large trade in negroes is carried on in the Mahometan countries bordering on the Red sea and the Persian gulf, and in the Portuguese East India colonies; and, what is worthy to be told, it is also carried on in the British presidency of Bombay, and other British Asiatic possessions. It is true, the officers say the American slavers are not yet there; but go there they will, according to all the laws of trading and hunting, the moment they are disturbed, or the trade fails, on the western coast. Wherever the trade exists, the combined powers must follow it: for good is not to be done by halves, and philanthropy is not to be circumscribed by coasts and latitudes. Great is the field of enterprise which presents itself to the British-American squadrons; great, also, is the field of labor for their diplomatic remonstrants. Spain, Portugal, Brazil; Cuba, Porto Rico, and other American islands; the Mahometan, Portuguese, and British possessions in southern Asia;—all these will require the presence of the Anglo-American embassies. Great will be the expense of these embassies; for the ambassadors must not only be paid, but go loaded with costly presents when barbarians are to be treated with. And here the treating is to be double—with the savage negro chiefs who tolerate the sale, and with Christian or Mahometan kings who tolerate the purchase. Even if no unlucky consequence supervenes, the expense of these embassies must still be great; but if our ministers chance to be assassinated by the negro chief, or insulted by the Christian or Mahometan king—what then? Shall we resent the injury, at a good loss of men and money? or shall we count the cost, and pocket the outrage? What if the Emperor of Brazil, boy as he is; or the Queen of Spain, child as she is; or the Queen of Portugal, lady as she is, should give our minister advice to return home and free his own country from slaves before he went about to close the markets of the world against them? True, there is a difference between purchasing, and the purchased. The intellect can detect the difference. But still it is a case for a sarcasm, and for an insult; and the American minister who should go upon these expeditions should look out for answers very different from what may be given to the representative of Great Britain. She, having liberated her own slaves, may stand up and speak. But how will it be with the American minister, when he commences rehearsing his remonstrance? This business of remonstrating is a delicate operation between individuals; more so when a sovereign is in the case; and becomes exceedingly critical when the remonstrant is about in the condition himself which he attacks in others. Among all the strange features in the comedy of errors which has ended in this treaty, that of sending American ministers abroad, to close the markets of the world against the slave-trade, is the most striking. Not content with the expenses, loss of life, and political entanglement of this alliance, we must electioneer for insults, and send ministers abroad to receive, pocket, and bring them home.

In what circumstances do we undertake all this fine work? What is our condition at home, while thus going abroad in search of employment? We raise 1,000 men for foreign service, while reducing our little army at home! We send ships to the coast of Africa, while dismounting our dragoons on the frontiers of Missouri and Arkansas! We protect Africa from slave-dealers, and abandon Florida to savage butchery! We send cannon, shot, shells, powder, lead, bombs, and balls, to Africa, while denying arms and ammunition to the young men who go to Florida! We give food, clothes, pay, to the men who go to Africa, and deny rations even to those who go to Florida! We cry out for retrenchment, and scatter $3,600,000 at one broad cast of the hand! We tax tea and coffee, and send the money to Africa! We are borrowing and taxing, and striking paper money, and reducing expenses at home, when engaging in this new and vast expense for the defence of Africa! What madness and folly! Has Don Quixotte come to life, and placed himself at the head of our Government, and taken the negroes of Africa, instead of the damsels of Spain, for the objects of his chivalrous protection?

The slave-trade is diabolical and infamous; but Great Britain is not the country to read us a lesson upon its atrocity, or to stimulate our exertions to suppress it. The nation which, at the peace of Utrecht, made the asiento—the slave contract—a condition of peace, fighting on till she obtained it; the nation which entailed African slavery upon us—which rejected our colonial statutes for its suppression*—which has many, many ten millions of white subjects in Europe and in Asia in greater slavery of body and mind, in more bodily misery and mental darkness, than any black slaves in the United States;—such a nation has no right to cajole or to dragoon us into alliances and expenses for the suppression of slavery on the coast of Africa. We have done our part on that subject. Considering the example and instruction we had from Great Britain, we have done a wonderful part. The Constitution of the United States, mainly made by slaveholding States, authorized Congress to put an end to the importation of slaves by a given day. Anticipating the limited day by legislative action, the Congress had the law ready to take effect on the day permitted by the Constitution. On the 1st day of January, 1808, Thomas Jefferson being President of the United States, the importation of slaves became unlawful and criminal. A subsequent act of Congress, following up the idea of Mr. Jefferson in his first draught of the Declaration of Independence, qualified the crime as piratical, and delivered up its pursuers to the sword of the law, and to the vengeance of the world, as the enemies of the human race. Vessels of war cruising on the coast of Africa, under our act of 1819, have been directed to search our own vessels—to arrest the violators of the law, and bring them in—the ships for confiscation, and the men for punishment. This was doing enough—enough for a young country, far remote in the New World, and whose policy is to avoid foreign connexions and entangling alliances. We did this voluntarily, without instigation, and without supervision from abroad; and now there can be no necessity for Great Britain to assume a superiority over us in this particular, and bind us in treaty stipulations, which destroy all the merit of a voluntary action. We have done enough; and it is no part of our business to exalt still higher the fanatical spirit of abolition, which is now become the stalking-horse of nations and of political powers. Our country contains many slaves, derived from Africa; and, while holding these, it is neither politic nor decent to join the crusade of European powers to put down the African slave-trade. From combinations of powers against the present slave-takers, there is but a step to the combination of the same powers against the present slaveholders; and it is not for the United States to join in the first movement, which leads to the second. "No entangling alliances" should be her motto! And as for her part in preventing the foreign slave-trade, it is sufficient that she prevents her own citizens, in her own way, from engaging in it; and that she takes care to become neither the instrument, nor the victim, of European combinations for its suppression.

The past administrations have been careful to save us from the entanglement of these connexions: they have been as careful to save us from these dangerous connexions, as the English have been anxious to involve us in them. Mr. Van Buren rejected, as "unauthorized by instructions, and contrary to the established and well-known principles and policy of the Government," the arrangement made by the commander of the United States schooner Grampus with the commander of her Britannic Majesty's sloop the Wolverine, on the 11th of March, 1840, authorizing the British commander "to detain all vessels under American colors found to be fully equipped for and engaged in the slave-trade, handing over to the American commander the vessels found to be American." Mr. Van Buren rejected this arrangement (the seminal principle of the present treaty) as contrary to the PRINCIPLES and the POLICY of the Government; and now this treaty comes to carry out on a great scale, what he wisely condemned on a small one.

The papers communicated do not show at whose instance these articles were inserted; and the absence of all minutes of conferences leaves us at a loss to trace their origin and progress in the hands of the negotiators. The little that is seen would indicate its origin to be wholly American; evidence aliunde proves it to be wholly British; and that our Secretary negotiator was only doing the work of the British minister in assuming the ostensible paternity of the articles. In the papers communicated, there is not a syllable upon the subject from Lord Ashburton. His finger is not seen in the affair. Mr. Webster appears as sole mover and conductor of the proposition. In his letter of the 30th of April to Captains Bell and Paine of the United States navy, he first approaches the subject, and opens it with a series of questions on the African slave-trade. This draws forth the answers which I have already shown. This is the commencement of the business. And here we are struck with the curious fact, that this letter of inquiry, laying the foundation for a novel and extraordinary article in the treaty, bears date 44 days before the first written communication from the British to the American negotiator! and 47 days before the first written communication from Mr. Webster to Lord Ashburton! It would seem that much was done by word of mouth before pen was put to paper; and that in this most essential part of the negotiations, pen was not put to paper at all, from one negotiator to the other, throughout the whole affair. Lord Ashburton's name is never found in connexion with the subject: Mr. Webster's only in the notes of inquiry to the American naval officers. Even in these he does not mention the treaty, nor allude to the negotiation, nor indicate the purpose for which information was sought! So that this most extraordinary article is without a clew to its history, and stands in the treaty as if it had fallen from the clouds, and chanced to lodge there! Even the President's message, which undertakes to account for the article, and to justify it, is silent on the point, though laboring through a mass of ambiguities and obscurities, evidently calculated to raise the inference that it originated with us. From the papers communicated, it is an American proposition, of which the British negotiator knew nothing until he signed the treaty. That is the first place where his name is seen in conjunction with it, or seen in a place to authorize the belief that he knew of it. Yet, it is certainly a British proposition; it is certainly a British article. Evidence aliunde establishes the fact; and as it is an important fact, and the more so from its studious concealment, I will examine that evidence; and for that purpose will have to go back near forty years in this branch of our diplomatic intercourse with Great Britain.

Sir, this is no new project with the British. They have been at it near forty years; but never found an Administration before to answer their purpose. As far back as the year 1806, when Mr. Monroe and Mr. Pinckney were ministers in London, the British commenced this business; but in a form so gentle and innocent, that one is at a loss to understand, except as now explained, their anxiety to obtain a treaty stipulation for it. The request then was, for an intercommunication of laws against the slave-trade; and for co-operation to procure the consent of other powers to the abolition of the trade by law, as Great Britain and the United States had abolished it. It was an innocent request, and would have been complied with, without the compulsion of a treaty obligation. We send our laws and public documents now to all the powers which have ministers here. Great Britain sends us all her parliamentary papers, and a valuable present they are. All this is done by virtue of the comity of nations, and from the civilization of the age, and not by virtue of national compacts. Yet, to obtain a page or two of our laws on a particular subject, and to get us to join her in requesting other nations to abolish the slave-trade, nothing short of a treaty stipulation would content her extreme anxiety. The article was put into a treaty in 1806, and here it is:

"The high contracting parties engage to communicate to each other, without delay, all such laws as have been, or shall be hereafter, enacted by their respective Legislatures; as also all measures which shall have been taken for the abolition or limitation of the African slave trade; and they further agree to use their best endeavors to procure the co-operation of other powers for the final and complete abolition of a trade so repugnant to the principles of humanity and justice."

This is the article. And what more harmless! To give copies of our laws, and to request other nations to abolish the trade by law, as we had done. This was the extent of the stipulation. The British proposed it, and pressed its adoption with zeal. The protocols show it; for, in those days, treaties were not negotiated without showing how; and the American ministers, in their correspondence with their Government, stated explicitly that the British proposed it, and pressed it upon them. Their words are: "The British commissioners proposed the article, and showed a great desire that we should accede to it." Now, why this great desire, unless for some ulterior purpose? The article was nothing in itself; and this anxiety about it can only be accounted for from a desire to lay a nest-egg, to be hatched into life by the diplomatic incubation of future negotiators. The alliances, naval and diplomatic, of 1842, show the depth and character of their long-sighted policy.

The treaty of 1806 was not ratified; it was rejected by Mr. Jefferson, without communication to the Senate; and for a reason which I shall have occasion to mention in another part of my speech. The treaty fell, and with it the agreed article on the slave-trade. But the desires of the British did not fall, nor did they abate; and at the treaty of Ghent their instances were renewed for some stipulation on this point, with all the warmth of a first love, and with all the pertinacity of a settled design. Advancing beyond the nugatory stipulations of 1806, pretermitting the unnecessary engagement for the communication of laws, and endeavoring to substitute actions for words, the British commissions at Ghent proposed an article requiring the United States "to exert every means in their power" to accomplish the suppression of this trade. The American commissioners found this proposition too strong. Though indefinite in its terms, and binding us to nothing specific, it was still deemed too strong; and, upon their objection, it was diluted into a blank engagement—"to use their best endeavors." In this diluted form, the article was agreed to; and now stand thus, as article 10 of the Ghent treaty:

"Whereas the traffic in slaves is irreconcilable with the principles of humanity and justice; and whereas, both his Majesty and the United States are desirous of continuing their efforts to promote its entire abolition; it is hereby agreed that both the contracting parties shall use their best endeavors to accomplish so desirable an object."

This is the article—certainly a faint one, and binding the United States to nothing. But it was a nest egg; and out of that egg, and by the maternal incubation of the present American Secretary of

* He has waged cruel war against human nature itself, violating its most sacred rights of life and liberty in the persons of a distant people who never offended him, captivating and carrying them into slavery in another hemisphere, or to incur miserable death in their transportation thither. This piratical warfare—the opprobrium of infidel powers—is the warfare of the Christian king of Great Britain, determined to keep open a market where men should be bought and sold. He has prostituted his negative for suppressing every legislative attempt to prohibit or restrain this execrable commerce; and, that this assemblage of horrors might want no fact of distinguished die, he is now exciting the very people to rise in arms among us, and to purchase that liberty of which he has deprived them, by murdering the people on whom he has obtruded them; thus paying off former crimes committed against the liberties of one people, with crimes which he urges them to commit against the lives of another."—[Original draught of the Declaration of Independence, as drawn by Mr. Jefferson, and before it was altered by the committee.]

tate, twenty-eight years thereafter, an alliance for ie suppression of the slave-trade, by arms and remonstrances, was negotiated between the two powers. The President of the United States, in his message to the Senate, and in that part of it which relates to the African articles, three times refers to the article in ie Ghent treaty; and so refers to it as to make it ie cause and the justification for the present stipulations. He says:

"The early and prominent part which the Government of ie United States has taken for the abolition of this unawful and inhuman traffic, is well known. By the 10th rticle of the treaty of Ghent, it is declared that the traffic in aves is irreconcilable with the principles of humanity and ustice, and that both his Majesty and the United States are deeous of continuing their efforts to promote its entire aboli on: and it is thereby agreed that both the contracting parties hall use their best endeavors to accomplish so desirable an obect."

"In my message at the commencement of the present session of Congress, I endeavor to state the principles which this Government supports, respecting the right of search and the mmunity of flags. Desirous of maintaining those principles illy, at the same time that existing obligations should be ulfilled, I have thought it most consistent with the honor and ignity of the country, that it should execute its own laws, and erform its own obligations, by its own means and its own ower.

"It has been thought, therefore, expedient, not only in accordance with the stipulations of the treaty of Ghent, but t the same time as removing all pretext on the part of others or violating the immunities of the American flag upon the eas, as they exist and are defined by the law of nations, to enter into the articles now submitted to the Senate."

Here the Ghent treaty is quoted—three times quoted—to justify this alliance. The stipulation for the eighty-gun squadron is presented as growing out of the Ghent treaty—as fulfilling the obligations of that treaty—as being in accordance with the stipulations of that treaty; when a recurrence to the treaty shows that it contains no such obligation—no such stipulation. That treaty was made near thirty years ago; and certainly this is very late in the day to find out a new meaning in it. But no such meaning is there; and our Secretary of State has taken a great liberty with the President, in getting him to sign what the facts will not justify.

The next piece of evidence to which I refer, to show that the British are the authors of the alliance articles in the present treaty, is the engagement entered into between a British and an American captain on the coast of Africa, in 1840; and which was so promptly rejected by Mr. Van Buren. That engagement was in these words:

"Commander William Tucker, of her Britannic Majesty's sloop Wolverine, and senior officer on the west coast of Africa, and Lieutenant John S. Paine, commanding the United States schooner Grampus, in order to carry into execution, as far as possible, the orders and views of their respective Governments respecting the suppression of the slave-trade, hereby request each other, and agree to detain all vessels under American colors found to be fully equipped for and engaged in the slave-trade; that, if proved to be American property, they shall be handed over to the United States schooner Grampus, or any other American cruiser; and that, if proved to be Spanish, Portuguese, Brazilian, or English property, to any of her Britannic Majesty's cruisers employed on the west coast of Africa for the suppression of the slave-trade, so far as their respective laws and treaties will permit.

"Signed and exchanged at Sierra Leone, this 11th day of March, 1840."

This engagement, as I have said before, was the seminal principle of the present alliance; and the promptitude with which it was disavowed and rejected by Mr. Van Buren, as contrary to the principles and policy of this Government, gives us the fullest assurance that, if he had continued President, the double alliance which we now have, and of which that little Sierra Leone agreement was the seed, would not have taken place. The 8th and 9th articles of the Washington city treaty, of 1842, are nothing but the enlarged edition of the Sierra Leone engagement of 1840; and the British negro colony on the coast of Africa was a very proper place to commence the entanglement in which we are now involved, and from which a wise and patriotic President temporarily relieved us. Truly, the British had many reasons for interfering in our late Presidential election, and seconding the Federal cry of—change! change! change!

I crown these historical facts in favor of my assertion, that the British minister was the author of the articles in the present treaty, by recurring again to the studied and ominous ambiguities of the President's message. I recur to them, to prove the contrary of their intention. Their intention was to establish the alliance as being of American origin, and voluntary: I recur to them to prove its origin to be British, and compulsory. Without reading the passages over again, I refer to the phrases: "Seizure and detention of American vessels by British cruisers on the coast of Africa: treaty signed in London by the five powers: not officially communicated to this Government: no application to become party to it: but the five powers attentive to our course: discussion, warmth, and excitement in Europe about our course: better to execute our laws, by our own means, and our own power: delicacy of the right of search: immunity of flags: visitation by cruisers lead to dangerous results: as removing all pretext on the part of others for violating the immunities of the American flag: therefore, entered into the articles now submitted to the Senate." I point to these phrases in the President's message, so ambiguous and so unsatisfactory, always raising a curiosity which they do not satisfy; and the second member of each sentence always turning off from the conclusions to which the first member of it would lead. I point to these as the crowning evidences of my assertion, and as betraying what they were intended to conceal—that these anti-slave-trade stipulations are of British origin, were given to our Secretary by the special minister, and by our Secretary presented to the American public as his own. This is my opinion; and if anybody wants any further evidence, they may have it in the magnitude and openness of the kindred movements—the abolition movements—now going on in London. Abolitionism is the father of these articles: that father resides in London, but his children are here. Conscious of the dangerous ground upon which he was treading, the President has endeavored to shield his work behind the stipulations of the Ghent treaty. Three times, in the course of a few brief paragraphs, he has invoked that treaty, and called it in for the justification of his own. Three times he has called it to his help. But, stop. Let the message speak for itself. Hear it.

"By the tenth article of the treaty of Ghent, it is declared that the traffic in slaves is irreconcilable with the principles of humanity and justice; and that both his Majesty and the United States are desirous of continuing their efforts to promote its entire abolition; and it is, therefore, agreed that both the contracting parties shall use their best endeavors to accomplish so desirable an object. The Government of the United States has, by law, declared the African slave trade piracy," &c. * * * Desirous of maintaining those principles fully, at the same time that existing obligations should be fulfilled, I have thought it most consistent with the honor and dignity of the country that it should execute its own laws, and perform its own obligations, by its own means, and its own power. * * * * It has been thought, therefore, expedient, not only in accordance with the stipulations of the treaty of Ghent, but, at the same time, as removing all pretext on the part of others for violating the immunities of the American flag upon the seas, as they exist and are defined by the law of nations, to enter into the articles now submitted to the Senate."

This is the message—this its appeal to the Ghent treaty, to its obligations, its stipulations: as if it contained any stipulation or any obligation in favor of this alliance! Vain invocation! and more insidious than vain! The Ghent treaty can give them no help. It has no aid or countenance to lend them. Though weak and reprehensible as is this tenth article, yet it binds us to nothing, and was harmless under the previous administrations. It was an imprudent concession to dormant abolitionism at the time it was made; but it is impossible to charge it with the crime of this alliance. We are fulfilling no existing obligation arising under it, in raising this subsidiary fleet, or in sending forth our Quixotic ambassadors. There is no accordance, in these naval and diplomatic engagements, with anything in the vague stipulations of the Ghent treaty. This fighting on the coast of Africa, and remonstrating through Europe, Asia, Africa, and the two Americas, is no continuation of the statutory enactments against the slave-trade contemplated by the treaty of Ghent. That treaty cannot father the eighty guns, and the remonstrating ambassadors; and the appeal to it to justify these measures, was an admission that justification was wanted, and could not be found. And here we must pause, to remark the disingenuousness of this invocation. Always remembering that I consider the message the work of the Secretary, I point out, to the reprehension of the Senate and the country, the errors of fact which it contains, to mislead the public mind; and, among these, I now have to point out these three invocations of the Ghent treaty to justify this British alliance, when that treaty contains not a syllable which can justify the invocations.

The French Government has taken care of itself: it has refused to sign the quintuple alliance, or the substitute for it. We have signed the substitute; and may thank the French Chamber of Deputies, and the pamphlet of General Cass, that it is no worse. The debates of that chamber, the arguments of that pamphlet, and the refusal of France to sign, have doubtless prevented the "official" communication of the five-powers treaty to us, and the formal application to us to become parties to it. Such a communication, and such an application, in the present deplorable constitution of the Federal Executive—diseased dread of war, and cankered love of peace—must have been indescribably calamitous.

One more view of this eighty-gun squadron, and I dismiss it from my speech.

I am no man to invoke our Constitution on every petty occasion, and to eke out all arguments with a cry of a violation of that sacred instrument. The Salaminian galley was only launched on great occasions. I am slow to cheapen our Constitution by appealing to it in doubtful or frivolous circumstances. But it does seem to me that here there is room neither for doubt nor frivolity; and that the raising this squadron for the defence of Africa, and for the redress of moral evils in that remote region, is an act wholly without the pale of our Constitution. To Congress alone it belongs to raise fleets—and that, for the defence of our own country: but here is a fleet to be raised, not by Congress, but by the President, the Senate, and the Queen of Great Britain; and this fleet for the defence, not of these confederated States, but of African tribes; and for the suppression, not of political, but of moral evils. It does seem to me that Congress itself could have no power to do this—still less the President, Senate, and Queen Victoria. To provide and maintain navies, is a power specifically granted to Congress: it is a legislative power—and properly so; because, with us, the questions of war and peace, of fleets and armies, of loans and taxes, are all legislative powers, and peculiarly under the charge of the people's immediate representatives. It will not do to deceive ourselves by analogies to other governments. Ours is a government of limitations, and of separate departments. Each department must keep within its own sphere. It must not transcend its own limits—much less invade those of another. The treaty-making power is a distinct power, and its acts are the supreme law of the land. But it is not everything which the President and Senate, and a foreign prince, or an Indian chief, may choose to insert in a treaty, that is this supreme law. Were it so, there would soon be no power in our country but that of the President and Senate, acting with some foreign kings, or with savage tribes. To gain this character of supreme law, or even of law at all, the subject-matter of the treaty must be within the competency of the treaty-making power: it must be a subject for treaty regulation, and not for legislative, judicial, or executive action. And this competency must be tried by our own Constitution, and not by the constitutions or practices of European monarchs. What is fit matter for treaty regulation in one country, is not so in another; and in no country is the treaty-making power more limited and circumscribed than in our own. The mass of the powers of our Government are given to Congress; and whatever is given to Congress is taken away from all other powers. Now, apply these principles to the act in question. This treaty stipulates to prepare, equip, and maintain a squadron—to keep it up for five years, and afterwards, until the President of the United States, or the British Government, gives notice for it to be withdrawn—to employ it, in conjunction with a British squadron, for the defence of Africans, and for suppressing the moral evil of slave-taking; the squadron to be of eighty guns at the least. Now, the preparing, equipping, and maintaining in service this squadron, is a legislative act, specifically given by the Constitution to Congress. Thus far, it is an invasion of the legislative department. All the rest is sheer usurpation, such as Congress itself could not make legal. Congress itself cannot create a squadron for five years; for the same, or any other Congress, may repeal the law. It cannot make the continuance of the squadron dependent upon the will of the President, or of a foreign prince; but it must depend upon the will of Congress itself. It cannot raise fleets for objects foreign to the objects of the Union—as the defence of Africa; or for redressing moral wrongs—as the suppression of the African custom of selling one another; but the fleet must be raised for the defence of the Union, or of the rights and interests of its citizens abroad. Thus, the treaty stipulation for this squadron is, in its first step, an invasion of the legislative authority, and is void: in every subsequent step, it is sheer usurpation, and such as Congress could not legalize if it would. I wish to be understood; and what I mean to say is, that Congress itself cannot legalize this treaty!—that Congress itself cannot raise this squadron for five years, for this foreign object!

The Constitution names this subject, and gives to Congress a certain degree of power over it: it was to prohibit the importation of slaves after the year 1808. That power has been exercised; it has been exhausted; and it is fair to infer that it was all that was intended to be granted. In a government of limited powers, when a certain quantum is given, it is all that is to be taken. In this case, the authority to prohibit the importation of slaves after a given period, was an authority obtained by compromise, and after much hesitation and difficulty in the convention. It was a long time before even this much, on a subject so differently viewed in different sections of the Union, could be agreed upon. After this, is it to be supposed that a clause could have been obtained to clothe Congress—to clothe the Representatives of the people themselves, much less the President, Senate, and a foreign prince—with power to raise fleets for terms of years, to put down the slave-trade in Africa itself? Certainly not! No one that reads the Madison Papers on this head can suppose, for an instant, that this power ever would have been granted. Then how is it obtained? By assuming the illimitability, as well as the supremacy of the treaty-making power! by assuming that that power is as large here as it is in Great Britain! by assuming that it may absorb the legislative power—that it may transcend the legislative power—that it may do what Congress can, and what Congress cannot—that it may employ arms for the suppression of moral evils, and send the ships and armies of the United States quixotting through the world to redress the wrongs of the human race. As part of the treaty-making power, I, for one, deny the constitutionality of this squadron engagement; and shall vote against the ratification of this treaty. As part of the legislative power, I again deny its constitutionality; and shall vote against the appropriations to carry it into effect. I shall have two chances at the unconstitutional, dangerous, and improvident scheme; and shall make the best use of both. I will fight the appropriations annually, through so many of the five years they are to continue as I shall have to remain here.

But it is not so much on this floor, as in the other end of the Capitol, that these appropriations should be fought. That duty belongs especially to the immediate Representatives of the people. If they give up to these eighty guns, and five years, and this redress of moral wrongs in Africa, they give up everything. The President and Senate, with a king or a savage that can sign a writing and call it a treaty, may send as many ships as they please, to as many countries as the please, for as many years as they please, and for any object that suits the pleasure or interest of the moment.

I shall move to strike these articles from the treaty. Even if proper in themselves, (which they are not,) they are improperly placed in this treaty, and made to play an undue part in its ratification. The Senators from the non-slaveholding States can hardly be expected to vote against a treaty that contains stipulations which, in the present state of the abolition question, presents itself so powerfully to the sympathies of so many. It is presented as an indissoluble part of the treaty, involving the loss of the whole in its own loss; and war, horrid war, is denounced if the treaty fails. Of course, all the lovers of peace, be it what sort of peace it may, must retain the articles, to save the treaty. They act a great and undue part in assuring the ratification; and, therefore, are wrongly placed, even if proper in themselves. But it is a stipulation which is not proper in itself, but hideously and frightfully wrong. It is unconstitutional and impolitic, novel and dangerous. It entangles us in a foreign alliance for a foreign object. It engages us in a foreign, distant, dangerous, and expensive service. It requires money which we have not to spare, and men who are wanted on our own frontiers. It hitches on our little navy to the great navy of Great Britain, and threatens us with a realization of the fabled alliance of the giant and he dwarf. It deprives us of our independence for five years certain, and longer if the present party shall continue in power. If I fail in my motion to strike out—if this stipulation is retained in the treaty, and ratified, and the appropriations voted by the two Houses—if all this is done, I do not say, tear up the Declaration of Independence! But I do say, Take it down; dislodge it from its conspicuous place on our walls; carry it away; hide it in a dark chamber; cover it with a black veil! and let it hang in shame, shrouded in gloom and mourning, until some new Jacksonian President shall retrieve his country's disgrace, break the chains which bind us to England, and let America again be free.

I proceed to the third subject and last article in the treaty—the article which stipulates for the mutual surrender of fugitive criminals. And here again we are at fault for these same protocols. Not one word is found in the correspondence upon this subject, the brief note excepted of Lord Ashburton of the 9th of August—the day of the signature of the treaty—to say that its ratification would require the consent of the British Parliament, and would necessarily be delayed until the Parliament met. Except this note, not a word is found upon the subject; and this gives no light upon its origin, progress, and formation—nothing to show with whom it originated—what necessity for it in this advanced age of civilization, when the comity of nations delivers up fugitive offenders upon all proper occasions—and when explanations upon each head of offences, and each class of fugitives, is so indispensable to the right understanding and the safe execution of the treaty. Total and black darkness on all these points. Nor is any ray of light found in the President's brief paragraphs in relation to it. Those paragaphs (the work of his Secretary, of course) are limited to the commendation of the article, and are insidiously deceptive, as I shall show at the proper time. It tells us nothing that we want to know upon the origin and design of the article, and how far it applies to the largest class of fugitive offenders from the United States—the slaves who escape with their masters' property, or after taking his life—into Canada and the British West Indies. The message is as silent as the correspondence on all these points; and it is only from looking into past history, and cotemporaneous circumstances, that we can search for the origin and design of this stipulation, so unnecessary in the present state of international courtesy, and so useless, unless something unusual and extraordinary is intended. Looking into these sources, and we are authorized to refer the origin and design of the stipulation to the British minister, and to consider it as one of the objects of the special mission with which we have been honored.* Be this as it may, I do not like the article. Though fair upon its face, it is difficult of execution. As a general proposition, atrocious offenders, and especially between neighboring nations, ought to be given up; but that is better done as an affair of consent and discretion, than under the constraints and embarrassments of a treaty obligation. Political offenders ought not to be given up; but, under the stern requisitions of a treaty obligation, and the benefit of an ex parte accusation, political offenders may be given up for murder, or other crimes, real or pretended; and then dealt with as their Government pleases. Innocent persons should not be harassed with groundless accusations; and there is no limit to these vexations, if all emigrants are placed at the mercy of malevolent informers, subjected to arrest in a new and strange land, examined upon ex parte testimony, and sent back for trial if a probable case is made out against them.

This is a subject long since considered in our country, and on which we have the benefit both of wise opinions and of some experience. Mr. Jefferson explored the whole subject when he was Secretary of State under President Washington, and came to the conclusion that these surrenders could only be made under three limitations: 1. Between coterminous countries. 2. For high offences. 3. A special provision against political offenders. Under these limitations, as far back as the year 1793, Mr. Jefferson proposed to Great Britain and Spain (the only countries with which we held coterminous dominions, and only for their adjacent provinces) a mutual delivery of fugitive criminals. His proposition was in these words:

"Any person having committed murder of malice prepense, not of the nature of treason, or forgery, within the United States or the Spanish provinces adjoining thereto, and fleeing from the justice of the country, shall be delivered up by the Government where he shall be found, to that from which he fled, whenever demanded by the same."

This was the proposition of that great statesman: and how different from those which we find in this treaty! Instead of being confined to coterminous dominions, the jurisdiction of the country is taken for the theatre of the crime; and that includes, on the part of Great Britain, possessions all over the world, and every ship on every sea that sails under her flag. Instead of being confined to two offences of high degree—murder and forgery—one against life, the other against property—this article extends to seven offences; some of which may be incurred for a shilling's worth of property, and another of them without touching or injuring a human being. Instead of a special provision in favor of political offenders, the insurgent or rebel may be given up for murder, and then hanged and quartered for treason; and in the long catalogue of seven offences, a charge may be made, and an ex parte case established, against any political offender which the British Government shall choose to pursue.

To palliate this article, and render it more acceptable to us, we are informed that it is copied from the 27th article of Mr. Jay's treaty. That apology for it, even if exactly true, would be but a poor recommendation of it to the people of the United States. Mr. Jay's treaty was no favorite with the American people, and especially with that part of the people which constituted the Republican party. Least of all was this 27th article a favorite with them. It was under that article that the famous Jonathan Robbins, alias Thomas Nash, was surrendered—a surrender which contributed largely to the defeat of Mr. Adams, and the overthrow of the Federal party, in 1800. The apology would be poor, if true: but it happens to be not exactly true. The article in the Webster treaty differs widely from the one in Jay's treaty—and all for the worse. The imitation is far worse than the original—about as much worse as modern Whigery is worse than ancient Federalism. Here are the two articles; let us compare them:

MR. WEBSTER'S TREATY.

Article 10.

"It is agreed that the United States and her Britannic Majesty shall, upon mutual requisitions by them, or their ministers, officers, or authorities, respectively made, deliver up to justice all persons who, being charged with the crime of murder, or assault with intent to commit murder, or piracy, or arson, or robbery, or forgery, or the utterance of forged papers committed within the jurisdiction of either, shall seek an asylum, or shall be found, within the territories of the other: provided, that this shall only be done upon such evidence of criminality as, according to the laws of the place where the fugitive or person so charged shall be found, would justify his apprehension and commitment for trial, if the crime or offence had there been committed; and the respective judges and other magistrates shall have power, jurisdiction, and authority, upon complaint made under oath, to issue a warrant for the apprehension of the fugitive or person so charged, that he may be brought before such judges, or other magistrates, respectively, to the end that the evidence of criminality may be heard and considered, and if, on such hearing, the evidence

*Since the ratification of the treaty by the United States Senate, a conference has taken place in New York between the British minister and the executive committee of the American and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society, which supplies part of the information wanted. The following is an extract:

"Lord Ashburton went into an explanation of the 10th article, and mentioned several particulars of the discussion that took place, both on that topic and others relating to slaves. He said that it was very desirable to have an article in the treaty to meet cases similar to that of Holmes, who fled from Canada into Vermont; and the cases that would frequently arise, considering the extent of the bordering lines, and the temptation for criminals to flee across the lines, in hope of securing themselves from arrest and punishment. The Governor of Canada was anxious that deserters should be included; but as Lord A. learned that a claim would be put in for the delivering up of fugitive slaves, he abandoned the question of deserters from her Britannic Majesty's possessions. He was also very desirous to secure the delivery of mutineers; but did not press it, lest it should involve, on the part of his Government, the delivery of slaves situated as were those on board the Creole. With regard to the case of the slave Hackett, he did not know all the facts. Sir Charles Bagot was known to him, and he did not believe he would do anything intentionally wrong. But he had just entered upon his duties, and was probably desirous, at that juncture, of promoting good feeling with his great neighbor. The fact that the slave had taken his master's watch, was a circumstance that probably went against him. 'Had he only taken the horse,' said Lord A., (looking at Gerrit Smith significantly, though he could not be supposed ever to have read the advice of that gentleman to fugitive slaves,) 'he would not, probably, have been surrendered; for you know the horse was necessary for his escape.' Lord Ashburton said that, in framing the 10th article, great care had been taken to provide that inferior magistrates in Canada should have no authority to surrender fugitives as had been urged by the other party; and that only the Governor himself could perform an act of so great importance. Great care would be taken, he had no doubt, to protect the innocent; and that the taking of any article necessary to effect an escape, would not be considered felonious. If, said he, the operation of the 10th article proves injurious, he had no doubt the British Government would put an end to it, agreeably to another provision of the treaty, viz: 'The 10th article shall continue in force until one or the other party shall signify its wish to terminate it, and no longer.' Lord A. said that when the delegation came to read his correspondence with Mr. Webster, they would see that he had taken all possible care to prevent any injury being done to the people of color; that, if he had even been willing to introduce an article including cases similar to that of the Creole, his Government would never have ratified it, as they will adhere to the great principles they have so long avowed and maintained; and that the friends of the slave in England would be very watchful to see that no wrong practice took place under the 10th article."

e deemed sufficient to sustain the charge, it shall be the duty f the examining judge, or magistrate, to certify the same o the proper executive authority, that a warrant may issue or the surrender of such fugitive. The expense of such pprehension and delivery shall be borne and defrayed by the arty who makes the requisition, and receives the fugitive."

MR. JAY'S TREATY.

Article 27.

"It is further agreed that his Majesty and the United States, n mutual requisitions by them, respectively, or by their respective ministers, or officers, authorized to make the same, will deliver up to justice all persons who, being charged with murder, or forgery, committed within the jurisdiction of either, shall seek an asylum within any of the countries of the other: provided, that this shall only be done on such evidence of criminality as, according to the laws of the place where the fugitive or person so charged shall be found, would justify his apprehension and commitment for trial if the offence had there been committed. The expense of such apprehension and delivery shall be borne and defrayed by those who make the requisition, and receive the fugitive."

These are the two articles, and the difference between them is great and striking. First, the number of offences for which delivery of the offender is to be made, is much greater in the present treaty. Mr. Jay's article is limited to two offences —murder and forgery: the two proposed by Mr. Jefferson; but without his qualification to exclude political offences, and to confine the deliveries to offenders from coterminous dominions. The present treaty embraces these two, and five others; making seven in the whole. The five added offences are—assault, with intent to commit murder; piracy; robbery; arson; and the utterance of forged paper. These additional five offences, though high in name, might be very small in degree. Assault, with intent to murder, might be without touching or hurting any person; for, to lift a weapon at a person within striking distance, without striking, is an assault: to level a fire-arm at a person within carrying distance, and without firing, is an assault; and the offence being in the intent, is difficult of proof. Mr. Jefferson excluded it, and so did Jay's treaty; because the offence was too small and too equivocal to be made a matter of international arrangement. Piracy was excluded, because it was absurd to speak of a pirate's country. He has no country. He is hostis humani generis—the enemy of the human race; and is hung wherever he is caught. The robbery might be of a shilling's worth of bread; the arson, of burning a straw shed; the utterance of forged paper, might be the emission or passing of a counterfeit sixpence. All these were excluded from Jay's treaty, because of their possible insignificance, and the door they opened to abuse in harassing the innocent, and in multiplying the chances for getting hold of a political offender for some other offence, and then punishing him for his politics.

Striking as these differences are between the present article and that of Mr. Jay's treaty, there is a still more essential difference in another part; and a difference which nullifies the article in its only material bearing in our favor. It is this: Mr. Jay's treaty referred the delivery of the fugitive to the executive power. This treaty intervenes the Judiciary, and requires two decisions from a judge or magistrate before the Governor can act. This nullifies the treaty in all that relates to fugitive slaves guilty of crimes against their masters. In the eye of the British law, they have no master, and can commit no offence against such a person in asserting their liberty against him, even unto death. A slave may kill his master, if necessary to his escape. This is legal under British law; and, in the present state of abolition feeling throughout the British dominions, such killing would not only be considered fair, but in the highest degree meritorious and laudable. What chance for the recovery of such a slave under this treaty? Read it—the concluding part—after the word "committed," and see what is the process to be gone through. Complaint is to be made to a British judge or justice. The fugitive is brought before this judge or justice, that the evidence of the criminality may be heard and considered—such evidence as would justify the apprehension, commitment, and trial of the party, if the offence had been committed there. If, upon this hearing, the evidence be deemed sufficient to sustain the charge, the judge or magistrate is to certify the fact to the executive authority; and then, and not until then, the surrender can be made. This is the process; and in all this the new treaty differs from Jay's. Under his treaty, the delivery was a ministerial act, referring itself to the authority of the Governor: under this treaty, it becomes a judicial act, referring itself to the discretion of the judge, who must twice decide against the slave (first, in issuing the warrant; and next, in trying it) before the Governor can order the surrender. Twice judicial discretion interposes a barrier, which cannot be forced; and behind which the slave, who has robbed or killed his master, may repose in safety. What evidence of criminality will satisfy the judge, when the act itself is no crime in his eyes, or under his laws, and when all his sympathies are on the side of the slave? What chance would there be for the judicial surrender of offending slaves in the British dominions, under this treaty, when the provisions of our own Constitution, within the States of our own Union, in relation to fugitive slaves, cannot be executed? We all know that a judicial trial is immunity to a slave pursued by his owner, in many of our own States. Can such trials be expected to result better for the owner in the British dominion, where the relation of master and slave is not admitted, and where abolitionism is the policy of the Government, the voice of the law, and the spirit of the people? Killing his master in defence of his liberty, is no offence in the eye of British law or British people; and no slave will ever be given up for it.

[Mr. WRIGHT here said, that counterfeiting American securities, or bank notes, was no offence in Canada; and the same question might arise there in relation to forgers.]

Mr. BENTON resumed. Better far to leave things as they are. Forgers are now given up in Canada, by Executive authority, when they fly to that province. This is done in the spirit of good neighborhood; and because all honest Governments have an interest in suppressing crimes, and repelling criminals. The governor acts from a sense of propriety, and the dictates of decency and justice. Not so with the judge. He must go by the law; and when there is no law against the offence, he has nothing to justify him in delivering the offender.

Conventions for the mutual surrender of large offenders, where dominions are coterminous, might be proper. Limited, as proposed by Mr. Jefferson in 1793, and they might be beneficial in suppression of border crimes and the preservation of order and justice. But extended as this is to a long list of offenders—unrestricted as it is in the case of murder—applying to dominions in all parts of the world, and to ships in every sea,—it can be nothing but the source of individual annoyance and national recrimination. Besides, if we surrender to Great Britain, why not to Russia, Prussia, Austria, France, and all the countries of the world? If we give up the Irishman to England, why not the Pole to Russia, the Italian to Austria, the German to his prince; and so on throughout the catalogue of nations? Sir, the article is a pestiferous one; and as it is determinable upon notice, it will become the duty of the American people to elect a President who will give the notice, and so put an end to its existence.

Addressing itself to the natural feelings of the country, against high crimes and border offenders, and in favor of political liberty, the message of the President communicating and recommending this treaty to us, carefully presents this article as conforming to our feelings in all these particulars. It is represented as applicable only to high crimes—to border offenders; and to offences not political. In all this, the message is disingenuous and deceptive, and calculated to ravish from the ignorant and the thoughtless an applause to which the treaty is not entitled. It says:

"The surrender to justice of persons who, having committed high crimes, seek an asylum in the territories of a neighboring nation, would seem to be an act due to the cause of general justice, and properly belonging to the present state of civilization and intercourse. The British provinces of North America are separated from the States of the Union by a line of several thousand miles; and, along portions of this line, the amount of population on either side is quite considerable, while the passage of the boundary is always easy.

"Offenders against the law on the one side transfer themselves to the other. Sometimes, with great difficulty, they are brought to justice; but very often they wholly escape. A consciousness of immunity, from the power of avoiding justice in this way, instigates the unprincipled and reckless to the commission of offences; and the peace and good neighborhood of the border are consequently often disturbed.

"In the case of offenders fleeing from Canada into the United States, the Governors of States are often applied to for their surrender; and questions of a very embarrassing nature arise from these applications. It has been thought highly important, therefore, to provide for the whole case by a proper treaty stipulation. The article on the subject, in the proposed treaty, is carefully confined to such offences as all mankind agree to regard as heinous and destructive of the security of life and of property. In this careful and specific enumeration of crimes, the object has been to exclude all political offences, or criminal charges arising from wars or intestine commotions. Treason, misprision of treason, libels, desertion from military service, and other offences of a similar character, are excluded."

In these phrases the message recommends the article to the Senate and the country; and yet nothing could be more fallacious and deceptive than such a recommendation: It confines the surrender to border offenders—Canadian fugitives: yet the treaty extends it to all persons committing offences under the "jurisdiction" of Great Britain—a term which includes all her territory throughout the world, and every ship or fort over which her flag waves. The message confines the surrender to high crimes: yet we have seen that the treaty includes crimes which may be of low degree—low indeed! A hare or a partridge from a preserve; a loaf of bread to sustain life; a sixpenny counterfeit note passed; a shed burnt; a weapon lifted, without striking! The message says all political crimes, all treasons, misprision of treason, libels, and desertions are excluded. The treaty shows that these offences are not excluded—that the limitations proposed by Mr. Jefferson are not inserted; and, consequently, under the head of murder, the insurgent, the rebel, and the traitor who has shed blood, may be given up; and so of other offences. When once surrendered, he may be tried for anything. The fate of Jonathan Robbins, alias Nash, is a good illustration of all this.* He was a British sailor—was guilty of mutiny, murder, and piracy on the frigate Hermione—deserted to the United States—was demanded by the British minister as a murderer under Jay's treaty—given up as a murderer—then tried by a court-martial on board a man-of-war for mutiny, murder, desertion, and piracy—found guilty—executed—and his body hung in chains from the yard-arm of a man-of-war. And so it would be again. The man given up for one offence, would be tried for another; and in the number and insignificance of the offiences for which he might be surrendered, there would be no difficulty in reaching any victim that a foreign Government chose to pursue. If this article had been in force in the time of the Irish rebellion, and Lord Edward Fitzgerald had escaped to the United States, after wounding, as he did, several of the myrmidons who arrested him, he might have been demanded as a fugitive from justice, for the assault with intent to kill; and then tried for treason, and hanged and quartered; and such will be the operation of the article if it continues.

The article is improper in itself; unequal in its operation; intended to give the British the right of demanding all fugitives, or emigrants from all parts of her dominions, and all her ships; intended to authorize their arrest for desertion or political offences, under the guise of reclaiming them for crimes; worth nothing to us on the two main points of fugitive slaves and forgers; and actually putting us in a worse condition than we were in without this agreement. Lord Ashburton says it cannot take effect in England without an act of Parliament to sanction it. I have not examined the question; but would suppose that if an act of Parliament were necessary in England to give it validity, an act of Congress would be equally necessary here for the same purpose. In that event, the Representatives of the people may yet save an immense emigrant population from the persecutions and annoyance to which political offenders as well as criminals, and the innocent as well as the guilty, may be subjected under this renewed and aggravated edition of one of the worst parts of Jay's treaty.

I have done with the consideration of this article; and with it, I have done with my detailed and special objections to the contents of the treaty, Other general objections I have to it, and so stated at the opening of my speech. Besides the leading general objection, that this treaty was not a settlement of all matters in dispute; that it settled what concerned Great Britain and the Northern States; and was, in fact, a virtual separate treaty with those States;—besides this objection, which I stated at large, there were other general objections which I barely named, and will now proceed to state more fully.

"He (President Adams) considers an offence committed on board a public ship-of-war on the high seas, to have been committed within the jurisdiction of the nation to which the ship belongs. Nash is charged, it is understood, with piracy and murder on board the British frigate Hermione, on the high seas, and, consequently, within the jurisdiction of his Britannic Majesty; and, therefore, by the 27th article of the treaty of amity with Great Britain, Nash ought to be delivered up as requested by the British minister, provided such evidence of his criminality be produced as, by the laws of the United States, or of South Carolina, (where the fugitive was,) would justify his apprehension and commitment for trial, if the offence had been committed withir the United States."—(Mr. Pickering's letter to the British minister, Mr. Liston, surrendering Robbins, alias Nash, by order of President Adams.)

1. The employment of a sole negotiator in a business of such magnitude and variety, and one who had not been approved by the Senate for this purpose. The negotiations embraced the most important concerns, and the most various—some peculiar to sectional divisions of the Union, as the boundary, to the North; the liberation and enticement of slaves, to the South; the Columbia river, to the West; and then to the Union in general, in the important questions of impressment, of search, and of the insult at Schlosser. Such varied and important interests required several commissioners on the part of the United States; and they specially approved by the Senate for this purpose. Never, in the annals of our history, was such a negotiation before committed to a single hand. In all previous administrations, Federal or Republican, where great questions were at stake, several ministers were appointed, and they taken from different parts of the Union, and from both political parties. Witness the three ministers in France (Marshall, Pinkney, and Gerry) in Mr. J. Adams's time; the two ministers to England (Mr. Rufus King and Mr. Monroe) in Mr. Jefferson's time; the five ministers to Ghent (Messrs. J. Q. Adams, Bayard, Clay, Russell, and Gallatin) in Mr. Madison's time; and numerous other instances, within the recollection of all. The present occasion was as important as any of these; for, besides embracing so many, and such various questions, it also involved, as we are constantly told, the great question of peace or war! If the British Government chose to confide its interests to a single negotiator, that was no rule for us. It is a monarchy; and concentration is its principle. We are a confederacy of Republics; and diffusion is our tendency. The monarchy and the monarchical Government is alone to be consulted in Great Britain. The State Governments, the political parties, the sectional divisions, are all to be considered here; and certainly there never was a time when an Administration was more bound to defer to the States, to the sections, and the parties. Having no State, no section, and no party to support it, it was little able to disregard the claims of justice, and the observances of propriety towards any. It is to no purpose to say, it is no matter: the Senate has the control; it can reject. This is idle. We know that treaties are confirmed; that not a single Senator would recommend; that various influences are brought to bear upon the ratification of a treaty; and that ratification is no test of its merits. No. The security is in precaution—in preventive remedies—in taking care to secure a safe treaty beforehand; and not in the rejection by the Senate afterwards. In this case, the employment of a single negotiator was unjustifiable. The occasion was great, and required several, both for safety and for satisfaction. The negotiation was here. Our country is full of able men. Two other negotiators might have been joined without delay, without trouble, and almost without expense. The British also had another negotiator here, (Mr. Fox;) a minister of whom I can say, without disparagement to any other, that, in the two and twenty years which I have sat in this Senate, and had occasion to know the foreign ministers, I have never known his superior for intelligence, dignity, attention to his business, fidelity to his own Government, and decorum to ours. Why not add Mr. Fox to Lord Ashburton, unless to prevent an associate from being given to Mr. Webster? Was it arranged in London that the whole negotiation should be between two, and that these two should act without a witness, and without notes or minutes of their conferences? Be this as it may, the effect is the same; and all must condemn this solitary business between two ministers, when the occasion so imperiously demanded several.

2. The assumption of the Secretary negotiator to treat the boundaries of the republic, established by the war of the Revolution, as matter of bargain and sale—of gifts and equivalents—in the hands of the negotiators. This was done, and in the whole extent of the boundary. In his very first letter to Lord Ashburton—in his brief note of the 17th of June, acknowledging the receipt of his Lordship's very first note, and in announcing his own authority to treat—our negotiator throws up the whole question of rights under the treaty of '83, declares for a conventional line, and invites a negotiation upon the basis of grants and equivalents—the very thing which he had condemned in the award. This is what he says in his note—hear him:

"Lord Ashburton having been charged by the Queen's Government with full powers to negotiate and settle all matters in discussion between the United States and England; and having, on his arrival at Washington, announced that, in relation to the question of the Northeastern boundary of the United States, he was authorized to treat for a conventional line, or line by agreement, on such terms and conditions, and with such mutual considerations and equivalents, as might be thought just and equitable; and that he was ready to enter upon a negotiation for such conventional line, so soon as this Government should say that it was authorized and ready on its part to commence such negotiation,--the undersigned, Secretary of State of the United States, has now the honor to acquaint his Lordship, by direction of the President, that the undersigned is ready, on behalf of the Government of the United States, and duly authorized to proceed to the consideration of such conventional line, or line by agreement; and will be happy to have an interview on that subject, at his Lordship's convenience."

[Mr. Webster to Lord Ashburton, June 17.

To this most obliging proposition—which gave up the whole question!—the British minister very naturally and very promptly (i. e., on the same day) returned a note of acceptance, fully accepting what the Secretary offered. The note is in these terms:

"The undersigned, plenipotentiary of her Britannic Majesty on an extraordinary and special mission to the United States of America, has the honor of acknowledging, with much satisfaction, the communication received this day from Mr. Webster, Secretary of State of the United States, that he is ready, on behalf of the United States, and duly authorized, in relation to the question of the Northeastern boundary of the United States, to proceed to the consideration of a conventional line, or line by agreement, on such terms and conditions, and with such mutual considerations and equivalents, as might be thought just and equitable. And, in reply to Mr. Webster's invitation to the undersigned to fix some time for their first conference upon this subject, he begs to propose to call on Mr. Webster, at the Department of State, to-morrow, at 12 o'clock, for this purpose, should that time be perfectly convenient to Mr Webster."

[Lord Ashburton to Mr. Webster, June 17.

Here is acceptance, quick and cordial, with a time and place named for the first conference. The Secretary agrees to the time and place mentioned; and immediately, (to wit: on the same aforesaid 17th day of June,) writes back to the British minister as follows:

"The Secretary of State will have great pleasure in seeing Lord Ashburton at twelve o'clock to-morrow, as proposed by him."

This was rapid work, and long will this day—THIS FRIDAY, JUNE 17, 1842—be remembered and noted in the annals of this confederacy. In the Roman calendar, it would have had a place among their unlucky days. Its memory would have been perpetuated by a black monument; and most appropriate it will be for us to mark all the new boundaries of Maine with black stones, and veil with black the statue of the god Terminus, degraded from the mountain which overlooked Quebec, to the humble valley which grows potatoes.

Let us mark this black Friday. On that day, a question of national boundaries was settled!—and settled by giving it up!—and given up before the first conference! A conventional boundary was agreed to, in violation of the Senate's decision in the case of the awarded line, and in contradiction to the negotiator's recorded principles on that occasion. The King of the Netherlands awarded a conventional line: it was rejected, because it was conventional; and now two conventional lines—the same, and another far worse—are agreed upon; and agreed upon before the first conference, and by the negotiator who was potential in preventing President Jackson from accepting the first. The new boundaries thus agreed upon must be, and ought to be, repugnant and humiliating to the American feeling. But humiliation and repugnance are not all; danger and mischief follow in the rear. Five hundred miles of first-rate smuggling ground is added to the 1,500 miles of northern smuggling boundary which we already possessed. Passamaquoddy bay is converted into a great naval station, for the scourge of our coasts in time to come by British steamers. Halifax and Quebec are united, and a new military frontier created, in which Great Britain exults and Maine mourns.

3. The omission to keep protocols; and the mystery and doubt which hang over the origin and progress of the different propositions, and the degrees by which they ripened into their ultimate form. This neglect, or omission, as we have already seen, was total and invariable. It pervaded every part of the negotiation; and the correspondence which has been communicated to us—incomplete as it is, in leaving wholly unmentioned several subjects of the negotiation—has all the air of an after performance—the air of an arranged correspondence to justify foregone conclusions. All the main work seems to have been done tête-à-tête, without a witness to hear it, or pen to note it. Never, since diplomacy began, and the art of writing was invented, was a negotiation of such moment, or of any moment, so tracklessly conducted! At the same time, the occasion was one which required ample minutes to be taken, a faithful record to be kept, and explanations of every thing to be given. Sole negotiator—immense interests—various questions—half of them pretermitted, the others sacrificed. Surely such things required protocols—many protocols; yet we have not one; and the justificatory message drawn up for the President, and signed by him without a verification of facts, is replete with unfounded suggestions and insidious recommendations, only calculated to impose on the ignorant. I present this omission to keep minutes of the conferences as a fatal objection to the treaty, and a departure from propriety not to be tolerated. We have a right to see the progress of a negotiation, and this is the first instance in which that right has been violated.

4. The assumption of the American negotiator to act for the British negotiator, in presenting the British proposition for the Maine boundary as the American proposition; and the unjustifiable and unfounded arguments with which he pressed that proposition upon the Maine commissioners, until he extorted from them a reluctant, painful, conditional acquiescence, which was immediately treated as an absolute consent. This is a most serious objection, and requires to be proved as soon as stated. So, here is the proof:

"GENTLEMEN: You have had an opportunity of reading Lord Ashburton's note to me of the 11th July. Since that date, I have had full and frequent conferences with him respecting the Eastern boundary, and I believe I understand what is practicable to be done on that subject, so far as he is concerned. In these conferences, he has made no positive or binding proposition; though, perhaps, it would be more desirable, under present circumstances, that such proposition should proceed from the United States. I have reason to believe, however, that he would agree to a line of boundary between the United States and the British provinces of Canada and New Brunswick, such as is described in a paper accompanying this, (marked B,) and identified by my signature.

"The line suggested, with the compensations and equivalents which have been stated, is now submitted for your consideration. That it is all which might have been hoped for, looking to the strength of the American claim, can hardly be said. But, as the settlement of a controversy of such duration is a matter of high importance; as equivalents of undoubted value are offered; as longer postponement and delay would lead to further inconvenience, and to the incurring of further expenses; and as no better occasion, or perhaps any other occasion, for settling the boundary by agreement, and on the principles of equivalents, is ever likely to present itself, the Government of the United States hopes that the commissioners of the two States will find it to be consistent with their duty to assent to the line proposed, and to the terms and conditions attending the proposition.

"The President has felt the deepest anxiety for an amicable settlement of the question in a manner honorable to the country, and such as should preserve the rights and interests of the States concerned. From the moment of the announcement of Lord Ashburton's mission, he has sedulously endeavored to pursue a course the most respectful towards the States, and the most useful to their interests, as well as the most becoming to the character and dignity of the Government. He will be happy if the result shall be such as shall satisfy Maine and Massachusetts, as well as the rest of the country. With these sentiments on the part of the President, and with the conviction that no more advantageous arrangement can be made, this subject is now referred to the grave deliberation of the commissioners."—Mr. Webster to the Maine commissioners, July 15.

This extract shows, in express terms, that the American Secretary of State presented the British proposition for the Maine boundary; that he not only presents it, but brings both the British and American Governments to bear upon Maine, to coerce her submission. The paper marked B, identified by the Secretary's signature, is evidently from the British legation; and is the precise writing, word for word, which now constitutes the first article of the treaty. The American Government is made to express its desire for the acceptance of the boundary designated in that paper; and then a train of the most extraordinary argument is addressed to Maine, in which the Secretary evidently speaks for Great Britain. First, he speaks of the equivalents which Maine is to receive, and declares them to be of undoubted value. What are they? The half of $300,000 for the two conventional lines and the two territorial losses! when President Jackson had proposed a million and a quarter of dollars (one million of acres of good land in Michigan) as a compensation to Maine for one of these lines and one of these losses only; and that offer had been spurned by the present negotiator. He now adds 110 miles of new boundary, and 572,000 acres of new territorial loss; reduces the equivalent from $1,250,000 to $150,000, and then presses it upon Maine as an equivalent of undoubted value. And this is all she gets; for the navigation of the St. John, due to Maine under the laws of nations, is balanced by navigation conferred, as well as received. The Secretary then goes on to threaten Maine with war, if she does not submit to his British proposition. He warns her that no better occasion—no other occasion—for SETTLING the boundary by AGREEMENT, and for EQUIVALENTS, is ever likely to happen; he tells her that no ARRANGEMENT more ADVANTAGEOUS can be made; and then submits the proposition, as a unit, without alteration or amendment, to the GRAVE DELIBERATION of the commissioners. Now, my first objection to all this, is a threat of war to coerce Maine; for what else can be understood from this last chance for settling by agreement, and for equivalents, and that no better arrangement can be had? What is this but saying to Maine, that if you do not accept this settlement of the boundary, it will be settled without agreement, and without equivalents, and in a more disadvantageous manner?—that is to say, it will be settled by war, and you will be flogged into submission. This is the plain import of the Secretary's language; and here we have the root and origin of that Walpole cry of war—that craven cry—which has been made to resound through the land. The same threat which was made to Maine, is made to us; and, like her commissioners, we are desired to take the proposition into our grave deliberation. The next objection I have to this threat is, that it is false; for we all know that Great Britain not only agreed to better terms than these for us, but demanded them; and made it matter of remonstrance that we refused them. I speak of the King of the Netherlands' award. That award was infinitely better for us; and it was not only accepted by the British, but insisted upon; and its non-execution on our part was made a subject of remonstrance and complaint against us. After this, can any one believe that the "peace-mission" was sent out to make war upon us if we did not yield up near double as much as she then demanded? No, sir! there is no truth in this cry of war. It is only a phantom conjured up for the occasion. From Jackson and Van Buren the British would gladly have accepted the awarded boundary: the Federalists prevented it, and even refused a new negotiation. Now, the same Federalists have yielded double as much, and are thanking God that the British condescend to accept it. Such is Federalism: and the British well knew their time, and their men, when they selected the present moment to send their special mission; to double their demands; and to use arguments successfully, which would have been indignantly repelled when a Jackson or a Van Buren was at the head of the Government—or, rather, would never have been used to such Presidents. The conduct of our Secretary-negotiator is inexplicable. He rejects the award, because it dismembers Maine; votes against new negotiations with England; and announces himself ready to shoulder a musket and march to the highland boundary, and there fight his death for it. This was under Jackson's administration. He now becomes negotiator himself; gives up the highland boundary in the first note; gives up all that was awarded by the King of the Netherlands; gives up 110 miles on this side of that award; gives up the mountain barrier which covered Maine, and commanded the Halifax road to Quebec; gives $500,000 for Rouse's Point, which the King of the Netherlands gave us for nothing; becomes the agent of the British minister in presenting the new boundary to the Maine commissioners; and crowns all this inexplicable conduct by keeping no record of his proceedings, and using threats and menaces which no English gentleman would have used, and which were as false in fact as they were insolent in spirit. I say this conduct is inexplicable! I shall publish what I say, and defy the Secretary and his friends to explain this conduct.

This is sufficient to prove my assertion that the American negotiator became the champion of the British Government; that he offered the British proposition as the American proposition; that he brought both Governments to bear upon Maine, in order to force her to accept it; and that he used arguments to accomplish his purpose, which were unjustifiable and untrue. The proof in his own letter is sufficient; but the answer of the Maine commissioners seals it; and here is that answer:

"The undersigned, commissioners of the State of Maine on the subject of the Northeastern boundary, have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your note, addressed to them under date of the 15th instant, with enclosures therein referred to. The proposition first submitted by the special minister of Great Britain, on the subject of the boundary, having been disagreed to; and the proposition made on the part of the United States, with the assent of the commissioners of Maine and Massachusetts, having been rejected as inadmissible, coupled with an expression of surprise that it should have been made; and Lord Ashburton, in the same communication, having intimated a preference for conference rather than correspondence, and having omitted in his note to make any new proposition, except a qualified withdrawal of a part of his former one; we learn from your note that you 'have had full and frequent conferences with him respecting the Northeastern boundary,' and that you 'believe you understand what is practicable to be done on that subject, so far as he (Lord Ashburton) is concerned.' We also learn that 'in these conferences he has made no positive or binding proposition; thinking, perhaps, it would be more desirable, under present circumstances, that such a proposition should proceed from the side of the United States;' but that you have reason to believe that he would agree to a line of boundary such as is described in the paper accompanying your note, (marked B;) and, also, that you entertain the conviction 'that no more advantageous arrangement can be made;' and, with this conviction, you refer the subject to the grave deliberation of the commissioners.

"Regarding this as substantially a proposition on the part of the United States, with the knowledge and assent of Great Britain, and as the one most favorable to us which, under any circumstances, the latter Government would either offer or accept, the undersigned have not failed to bestow upon it the grave deliberation and consideration which its nature and importance, and their ever responsible position, demand.

* * * * * * *

"We are now given to understand that the Executive of the United States, representing the sovereignty of the Union, assents to the proposal, and that this department of the Government at least is anxious for its acceptance, as, in its view, most expedient for the general good.

"The commissioners of Massachusetts have already given their assent, on behalf of that Commonwealth.

* * * * * * *

"Considering, then, this proposition as involving the surrender of more territory than the avowed objects of England require; as removing our landmarks from the well-known and well-defined boundary of the treaty of 1783, on the crest of the highlands, besides insisting upon the line of the arbiter in its full extent, we feel bound to say, after the most careful consideration, that we cannot bring our minds to the conviction that the proposal is such as Maine had a right to expect.

* * * * * * *

"We are now called upon to consider the final proposition, made by or through the Government of the United States, for our consideration and acceptance. The line indicated may be shortly defined as the line recommended by the King of the Netherlands, and an addition thereto of a strip of land at the base of the highlands running to the source of the southwest branch of the St. John. The examination and consideration of all other lines, which might better meet our views and objects, have been precluded by the declaration, and other plenary evidence we have, that the line specified in your communication is the most advantageous that can be offered to us; and that no one of less extent—or yielding, in fact, less to the other party—can be deemed admissible. We are, therefore, brought to the single and simple consideration of the question whether we can, consistently with our views of our duty to the State we represent, accept the proposition submitted by you."—The Maine Commissioners to Mr. Webster, July 22.

5. The mixing up of incongruous matter in the treaty, and presenting the whole as a unit, to be ratified in toto, under penalty of loss of the whole, and war if any part of it was rejected. This is a serious objection to the treaty. Incongruities are not to be put into laws, whether they be the supreme or the subordinate law. The African alliance for five years, is an incongruity in a British treaty of permanent boundaries. The only reason for putting this temporary convention into a permanent treaty, is the very reason which should prevent its being put there; it is to fetter the Senate—to embarrass and coerce them—to make one part of the treaty carry another. I shall move to strike out this alliance article, as well for incongruity, as for its unconstitutionality, inexpediency, and gross impolicy.

6. The irregular manner in which the ratification of this treaty has been sought, by consultations with individual members, before it was submitted to the Senate. Here I tread upon delicate ground; and if I am wrong, this is the time and the place to correct me. I speak in the hearing of those who must know whether I am mistaken. I have reason to believe that the treaty has been privately submitted to Senators—their opinions obtained—the judgment of the body forestalled; and then sent here for the forms of ratification. [One Senator said he had not been consulted.] Mr. B. in continuation: Certainly not, as the Senator says so; and so of any other gentleman who will say the same. I interrogate no one. I have no right to interrogate any one. I do not pretend to say that all were consulted; that would have been unnecessary; and besides, I know I was not consulted myself; and I know many others who were not. All that I intend to say is, that I have reason to think that this treaty has been ratified out of doors* and that this is a great irregularity, and bespeaks an undue solicitude for it on the part of its authors, arising from a consciousness of its indefensible character.

7. The want of instructions from the President to guide this negotiation. This is a glaring objection to the treaty. By the theory of our Government, the President is the head of the Executive Department, and must treat through his agents and ministers, with foreign powers. He must tell them what to do, and should tell that in unequivocal language, that there may be no mistake about it. He must command and direct the negotiation; he must order what is done. This is the theory of our Government, and this has been its practice from the beginning of Washington's to the end of Mr. Van Buren's administration; and never was it more necessary than now. Being but one negotiator, and he not approved by the Senate for that purpose, and being from an interested State, it was the bounden duty of the President to have guided and directed everything. He is the head of the Union, and should have attended to the interest of the whole Union; on the contrary, he abandons everything to his Secretary,* and this Secretary takes care of one section of the Union, and of his own State, and of Great Britain; and leaves the other two sections of the Union out of the treaty. The Northern States, coterminous with Canada, get their boundaries adjusted; Massachusetts gets money, which her sister States are to pay; and Great Britain takes two slices and all her military frontiers from the State of Maine! the the S. and W. States are left as they were!—the natural result of a negotiation committed, without instructions, to a single negotiator; and that negotiator the man who declared he would not vote the money for defence which President Jackson required, even if the enemy was battering at the doors of the Capitol! and whose subserviency to British interests, has so often and so deplorably been manifested.

8. The fear of war. This Walpole argument is heavily pressed upon us, and we are constantly told that the alternatives lie between this treaty—the whole of it, just as it is—or war! This is a degrading argument, if true; and infamous if false! and false it is: and more than that, it is as shameless as it is unfounded! What! the peace mission come to make war! It is no such thing. It comes to take advantage of our deplorable condition—to take what it pleases, and to repulse the rest. Great Britain is in no condition to go to war with us, and every child knows it. But I do not limit myself to argument, and general considerations, to disprove this war argument. I refer to the fact which stamps it with untruth. Look to the notes of Sir Charles Vaughan and Mr. Bankhead, demanding the execution of the award, and declaring that its execution would remove every impediment to the harmony of the two countries. After that, and while holding these authentic declarations in our hands, are we to be told that the peace mission requires more than the award? requires one hundred and ten miles more of boundary? requires $500,000 for Rouse's Point, which the award gave us without money? requires a naval and diplomatic alliance, which she dared not mention in the time of Jackson or Van Buren? requires the surrender of "rebels" under the name of criminals? and puts the South and West at defiance, while conciliating the non-slaveholding States? and gives us war, if we do not consent to all this degradation, insult, and outrage? Are we to be told this? No, sir, no! There is no danger of war; but this treaty will make a war, if it is ratified. It gives up all our advantages; leaves us with great questions unsettled; increases the audacity of the British; weakens and degrades us; and leaves us no alternative but war to save the Columbia, to prevent impressment, to resist search, to repel Schlosser invasions, and to avoid a San Domingo insurrection in the South, excited from London, from Canada, and from Nassau.

9. I conclude this head of general objections with the notice of an exhibition on this floor, preceded by private and impressive revelations to Senators without, which the honor of the contrivers would require to be kept where they attempted to place it—in the depths of everlasting oblivion; but which the honor of the Senate requires to be exposed to broad day-light. The Secretary of State has sent us, under the most awful injunctions of secrecy, certain letters from Mr. Jared Sparks, in Paris, covering a certain disinterred map, marked with certain red lines, said to be drawn by Dr. Franklin when minister in France, and by which the highlands which divide the Penobscot waters from the St. John are shown to be the boundary between the United States and Great Britain, instead of the highlands which divide the waters of the St. Lawrence from those of the Atlantic ocean. The chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, by his position, was made the interpreter of the Secretary on this occasion. He unfolded the whole to us, with all the invocations to secrecy and to despatch in our work, which the Secretary had impetrated of him; and, as a reason for this despatch and secrecy, he read us a paragraph in Lord Ashburton's letter of the 11th of July, from which it was to be dreaded that his Lordship and the British, if not forestalled by a prompt ratification of the treaty, might find out our secret, refuse the ratification themselves, and seize on all Maine down to the Penobscot. At the moment that the chairman of the Foreign Relations committee was making these revelations and adjurations, struck by the strangeness of the scene, I demanded of him whether these communications came from the President? He answered, No; from the Secretary of State. I then declared that they were not covered by the rules of confidential intercourse between the President and Senate, and not entitled to secrecy; and the less so, because they had already been shown to many Senators out of doors. And, in the same instant, I treated the whole communication as a most unworthy contrivance—a fraud upon the British, if it was true; with a request to the Senate to become party to the fraud: an insult to the Senate if they were false; and the more so, if they had already been shown to Lord Ashburton, as they seemed to have been: and, in any event, a disgrace to its contrivers. At the same instant, I showed the bundle of old maps, collected and preserved by Mr. Jefferson, and belonging to the Congress Library, in which this very line was laid down in the same red color, while the true one was marked with dots, in a French map made in Paris, and dedicated and presented to Dr. Franklin in the year 1784. All this I did upon the instant—in the flash of the moment—with the hot feeling of indignation upon me—and without intending offence to the Senator from Virginia, the chairman of the Committee of Foreign Relations, whose position had made him the organ of the Secretary on this humiliating occasion.

*This has since been publicly declared by Mr. Webster at Boston. The edition of his speech, revised and corrected by himself, says:

"I never can forget the frankness and generosity with which, after an interchange—a free and liberal interchange—he (the President) finally said to me, that the business was in my hands; that upon my shoulders rested the responsibility; and on my decision depended the conclusion of the negotiation."

This declaration, so authentically made at Boston, has since been contradicted by its author at New York; but the papers communicated to the Senate show that the Boston statement was correct, and that the whole business was in the hands of the Secretary.

I do not go into the full defence of Dr. Franklin, whose very ghost seems to have been made to play a part to ravish from our astounded senses the instant ratification of this treaty. I do not undertake to defend him from the resulting implications of these strange communications; and, to show that his geography could not have mistaken the highlands between the Penobscot and the St. John, for the highlands between the St. Lawrence and the Atlantic—his astronomy could not have mistaken the south side of Nova Scotia for the northwest corner of that province—and that his geometry could not have substituted a crooked line, running zig-zag west from the head of the St. Croix, for a straight line running from the head of that river due north to the intersection of the ridge between the Atlantic and the St. Lawrence. I do not go into this defence, nor expose the attempt to stultify Dr. Franklin, in order to screen our present negotiator from responsibility for his enormous sacrifices. That task has been assumed by the natural defender of Dr. Franklin on this floor—the Senator from Mississippi, who has married his descendant, [Mr. WALKER,]—and who will do justice to the illustrious dead. I limit myself to showing a couple of maps—one of which shows the same line attributed to Dr. Franklin, in red coloring, and the true one in dots; the other shows the true boundary of the United States, marked by Mr. Jefferson. And, first, I will explain how I came to the knowledge of these maps, and chanced to have them on my table at such an appropriate moment.

The way of it is this: I made it my business to go and see Mr. Jefferson before he died; and in the course of a long winter evening, in which I contrived to make him do all the talking, he said to me many things which I have endeavored to remember, and to act upon as occasion presented. Among other things, he told me that when he was minister in Paris he had endeavored to make himself master of everything that related to the New World, and especially to our own part of it; and for that purpose was accustomed to spend his leisure evenings in the booksellers' shops, searching out for every publication that related to the United States and the two Americas. He told me of many rare books, and in various languages, which he had collected, and of a mass of maps and charts which he had bound up; and that all his collection had gone to the United States with the sale of his library, and were in the library of Congress. I have often availed myself of this information to trace questions—historical, political, geographical—through his ample volumes; and had often looked over his collection of maps, venerable for their age and for the hand that collected them. This morning, when we locked our doors on this treaty, I sent a note to our Librarian, with a request to send me the Jefferson maps; and was actually looking over the collection at the time, and tracing the well-marked Northern boundary upon it, at the instant that the chairman of the Committee of Foreign Relations was revealing to us the unexpected discoveries of Mr. Jared Sparks. It struck me as very strange that Mr. Sparks should have discovered in Paris, in 1842, documents of such antiquity and of such moment in relation to our own country, and as coming from Dr. Franklin when Mr. Jefferson, who was cotemporary with the paper, the successor of Dr. Franklin, for so many years in Paris, and gave up so much of his time and thoughts to these researches;—it struck me as very strange that all this should happen; and immediately began to turn over the leaves of the map in my hand, to see if it was in his collection. Immediately I fell upon the same red line in a map made in Paris, in 1784, and dedicated and presented to Dr. Franklin; which map I instantly showed to the Senate, and had placed on the Secretary's table for the inspection of all the Senators. Its title is in these words:

"Carte des Etats Unis de l'Amérique, suivant le traité de paix de 1783. Dediée et présentée à Son Excellence Mr. BENJAMIN FRANKLIN, ministre des Etats Unis de l'Amérique près la cour de France; ancien Président de la Convention de Pensilvanie, et de la Société Philosophique de Philadelphie, &c., &c. Par son très humble et très obeisant serviteur, LATBRE, 1784; avec privilège du Roi.—Paris."

Here is the map, which presents the same line, and in the same color, with the one which Mr. Sparks has discovered; and with it is the true line, in dots, running up to the northwest corner of Nova Scotia. It was no secret in Mr. Jefferson's time, as its position now proves. It was of no weight in the determination of the boundary, as Mr. Jefferson's own map shows, made also in the year 1784, giving us all up to the northwest corner of Nova Scotia, and all the commanding islands which we have since lost by diplomacy—Campo-bello, Grand Menan, Bois-blanc, and the grand trading route between Lake Superior and the Lake of the Woods; and it was of no weight in Mr. Jefferson's mind in any way, as his correspondence on the various attempts to settle the Northeastern boundary constantly showed. But I leave all this to the Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. WALKER,] who has already done good execution upon Mr. Sparks's revelation. I limit myself to the production of the maps, one of which shows that Mr. Sparks's secret is no secret; and the other of which shows us the true boundaries of the United States, as settled by the treaty of Independence, and before diplomacy had mystified and mutilated it, and which give us the commanding route through the long lakes west of Lake Superior; the Bois-blanc island, which commands the Detroit river; the islands of Campobello and Grand Menan, which command the Bay of Fundy; and the lofty mountain which covered Maine, and commanded Quebec; all of which British diplomacy has taken from us.

I turn to the device of our Secretary negotiator, and his attempt to ravish a ratification from us by means of this raw head and bloody bones; and his attempt to impose, as a secret upon the Senate, what was evidently known to Lord Ashburton. Taken in any way, and it is a most disreputable contrivance. If Dr. Franklin's pretended marks are the true lines, and we have found a piece of evidence which defeats our claim to one-third of Maine, then honor requires us to show it to the British; if, on the other hand, these marks are the same with those on the map I produce, and are of no value, then the Senate has been bamboozled; and, in either event, the secrecy demanded of us has not been required of Lord Ashburton, who shows very clearly that he has scented the existence of Mr. Sparks's discoveries! The Senator from Virginia, [Mr. RIVES,] chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, read a paragraph from his Lordship's letter of the 11th of July, to show the danger we were in of losing more than the treaty gave (by the British finding out our secret) if we did not immediately ratify it. I read the same, for the purpose of showing that the British minister knew our secret before we knew it ourselves! This is his paragraph:

"My inspection of these maps, and my examination of the documents, lead me to a very strong conviction that the highlands contemplated by the negotiators of the treaty were the only highlands then known to them at the head of the Penobscot, Kennebec, and the rivers west of the St. Croix; and that they did not precisely know how the north line from the St. Croix would strike them; and, if it were not my wish to shorten this discussion, I believe a very good argument might be drawn from the words of the treaty in proof of this. In the negotiations with Mr. Livingston, and afterward with Mr. McLane, this view seemed to prevail; and, as you are aware, there were proposals to search for these highlands to the west, where alone I believe they will be found to answer perfectly the description of the treaty. If this question should unfortunately go to a further reference, I should by no means despair of finding some confirmation of this view of the case."

Here we have the new discovered line shadowed forth for us, along the heads of the Penobscot and the Kennebec, and west of the St. Croix, as marked in the secret map from Paris, and the public one from our library, with the expression of the opinion that it will answer perfectly the description of the treaty; with the significant declaration that his Lordship will not despair of finding some confirmation of his opinion, if the question goes to further reference. I submit this paragraph as evidence that his Lordship had already found Mr. Sparks's discoveries, and placed as little value upon them as I do, and has only given these hints to assist at the ratification of the treaty. After this, what are we to think of the private exhibitions of this Paris discovery to Senators, before it was given to the Senate? What must we think of the invocations to secrecy with which it was communicated to us? What must we think of such a mode of operating upon the Senate? And, above all, what must we think of the treaty which, in the opinion of its negotiator, requires a resort to such contrivances to procure its ratification?

I have finished my view of this treaty, for what it contains, and will not recapitulate anything. I find the treaty objectionable in every point of view, for what it contains—for what it omits—for the manner of making it—and the manner of seeking its ratification. Applause is bestowed upon it. That is a matter of course with all things done by any Government. But, to any one who knows the exertions made by the British Government to procure our assent to the award, it must be known that such a treaty as this might have been made on any day by mail. Such a paper as that marked B, and identified by the signature of our Secretary, and by him communicated to the Maine commissioners,—such a paper as that, transmitted by mail to London, would have had its response by return mail, accepting it in toto, and sending us as much money into the bargain, if we had asked it, as would have paid our new public debt many times over. The cry of war is raised, if the treaty is not ratified. The British were not going to war, because we would not give them double as much as they were anxious to receive under the award. That much they intended to have, if it could be got; and for that they intended to bully up to the point of holding the lighted match over the loaded and primed cannon. Whether they touched the match, would depend upon our countenance—the war countenance of our Government. This I always told the Senator from Maine [looking at Mr. WILLIAMS] I made no speeches when such brave ones were uttered on this floor; but I constantly told him that Maine was in danger! and if anything saved her, it would be the war countenance of the American Government. [Mr. WILLIAMS nodded assent.] Unhappily, they have found a time when our Government has no war countenance to show! when a peace embassy has been sufficient to frighten our administration out of double as much as the British asked in Jackson's and Van Buren's time! The refusal to make this treaty would have brought no war; its ratification will bring war in the run of time. There are unsettled subjects, which cannot be settled with honor or safety after the ratification of this treaty. Contempt is now our portion from the British. Her present success will increase her audacity. The Columbia will be now considered hers; impressment will be revived when it suits her; liberation of slaves in Canada and the West Indies will go on; the affair of Schlosser will be repeated as often as it pleases the colonial authorities. The four deferred subjects are now incapable of being settled, except on terms to which war—the most exasperated war—will be preferable. I look upon the ratification of this treaty as a calamity to the country; still I am not insensible to the embarrassment of Senators who yield it a reluctant assent. They expect nothing better. After the manner in which our claim has been weakened, and the British strengthened, by the conduct of our Secretary—by his surrender of 110 miles on this side the awarded line—by his $500,000 for Rouse's Point; and, above all, by his arraying the authority of Dr. Franklin against us, to the whole extent of the British claim down to the Penobscot;—after this, they expect nothing better than we have got, and are ready to close a bad bargain for fear it becomes worse. They yield reluctantly; and every patriot bosom in Maine and Massachusetts must now repent the rejection of the award, and hold the man to account who, rejecting it, has made a treaty so much worse.

I proceed to the omitted subjects; and here the objections to the treaty are fully as great for what it omits as for what it contains. The special mission came gloriously heralded as a mission of peace—to settle everything; and to give a new point of departure to the inhabitants of two great countries in the walks of social, commercial, and political intercourse. It has only settled part; leaving four subjects out of seven to be pursued at London, with vastly diminished prospects of success; and producing all the effect of a separate treaty with a part of the confederacy, and that at the moment when British legislation had given a separate trade, and virtually a free trade, to this same part, in the great staples of grain and provisions. The mission of peace has given a separate peace to the Northern States: the new corn law has given them a separate trade; and the American citizen is very differently constituted from what I am, who can believe these coincidences to be the effect of accident, or a cause for joy in the American Union.

The omitted or pretermitted subjects are four: the Columbia river—impressment—the outrage on the Caroline—and the liberation of American slaves, carried by violence or misfortune into the British West India islands, or enticed into Canada. Of these, I begin with the Columbia, because equal in importance to any, and, from position, more particularly demanding my attention. The country on this great river is ours: diplomacy has endangered its title: the British have the possession, and have repulsed us from the whole extent of its northern shore, and from all the fur region on both sides of the river, and up into all the valleys and gorges of the Rocky mountains. Our citizens are beginning to go there; and the seeds of national contestation between the British and Americans are deeply and thickly sown in that quarter. From the moment that we discovered it, Great Britain has claimed this country; and for thirty years past this claim has been a point of contested and deferred diplomacy, in which every step taken has been a step for the benefit of her claim, and for the injury of ours. The germe of a war lies there; and this mission of peace should have eradicated that germe. On the contrary, it does not notice it! Neither the treaty nor the correspondence names or notices it! and if it were not for a meagre and stinted paragraph in the President's message, communicating and recommending the treaty, we should not know that the name of the Oregon had occurred to the negotiators. That paragraph is in these words:

"After sundry informal communications with the British minister upon the subject of the claims of the two countries to territory west of the Rocky mountains, so little probability was found to exist of coming to any agreement on that subject at present, that it was not thought expedient to make it one of the subjects of formal negotiation, to be entered upon between this Government and the British minister, as part of his duties under his special mission."

This is all that appears in relation to a disputed country, equal in extent to the Atlantic portion of the old thirteen United States; superior to them in climate, soil, and configuration; adjacent to the valley of the Mississippi; fronting Asia; holding the key to the North Pacific ocean; the only country fit for colonization on the extended coast of Northwest America; a country which belongs to the United States by a title as clear as their title to the District of Columbia; which a resolve of Congress, during Mr. Monroe's administration, declared to be occluded against European colonization; which Great Britain is now colonizing; and the title to which has been a subject of diplomatic discussion for thirty years. This is all that is heard of such a country, and such a dispute, in this mission of peace, which was to settle everything. To supply this omission, and to erect some barrier against the dangers of improvident, indifferent, ignorant, or treacherous diplomacy in future negotiations in relation to this great country, it is my purpose at present to state our title to it; and, in doing so, to expose the fallacy of the British pretensions; and thus to leave in the bosom of the Senate, and on the page of our legislative history, the faithful evidences of our right, and which shall attest our title to all succeeding generations.

Our title to this great adjunct domain rests upon eight points, almost any one of which is sufficient to vindicate it. They are:

1. The discovery of the Columbia river, at its mouth, in 1790, by Captain Gray of Boston; and the imposition of the American name of his ship upon it a discovery which enured to the benefit of his country, and a name which attested its possession and sovereignty.

2. The discovery of the same river, at its head, and thence to its mouth in the ocean, by Lewis and Clarke, under the authority of the United States, in the years 1804-5.

3. The settlement at the mouth of the river in 1811, under the auspices of Mr. Astor, of New York, a citizen of the United States, and whose settlement enured to the benefit of his country.

4. The treaty of 1803 with the French republic; by which the United States acquired Louisiana, and with it an open question of boundaries to the northwest.

5. The treaty of 1819 with the King of Spain; by which the United States acquired all the rights of Spain to the country north of 42 degrees beyond the Rocky mountains.

6. The Nootka Sound contest, in 1790, between Great Britain and Spain, and the treaty growing out of it; by which Spain vindicated her title against the British as far north as the latitude of that sound, in 50 degrees.

7. The treaty of Utrecht in 1714, between France and England; by which the boundaries between the French and British were settled in North America; and this settlement becoming ours, as successors to the French in that part of her dominions.

8. The treaty of Ghent in 1814; by which Great Britain restored Astoria to the United States as an American possession.

By these several titles, the United States have collected into their own hands all the rights derived from first discovery, and from first settlement, reinforced by all the claims of France and Spain. It is not my purpose to discuss, but merely to state these titles. The facts on which they rest are generally known to the country, except so far as they are derivable from the Nootka Sound and Utrecht treaties; and on these two points I feel called upon to make the statements, and to give the elucidations, which manifest their application to our question of title.

The treaty of Utrecht, between France and England, as all the world knows, was the treaty which put an end to the wars of Queen Anne and Louis the 14th, and settled their differences in America as well as in Europe. Both England and France were at that time large territorial possessors in North America—the English holding Hudson's Bay and New Britain, beyond Canada, and her Atlantic colonies on this side of it; and France holding Canada and Louisiana. These were vast possessions, with unfixed boundaries. The tenth article of the treaty of Utrecht provided for fixing these boundaries. Under this article, British and French commissioners were appointed to define the possessions of the two nations; and by these commissaries two great points were fixed, (not to speak of others,) which have become landmarks in the definition of boundaries in North America, namely: the Lake of the Woods, and the 49th parallel of north latitude west of that lake. These two points were established above a century and a quarter ago, as dividing the French and British dominions in that quarter. As successful rebels, we acquired one of these points at the end of the Revolution. The treaty of independence of 1783 gave us the Lake of the Woods as a landmark in the (then) northwest corner of the Union. As successors to the French in the ownership of Louisiana, we acquired the other; the treaty of 1803 having given us that province as France and Spain had held it; and that was, on the north, by the parallel of 49 degrees. Beginning in the Lake of the Woods, our northern Louisiana boundary followed the 49th parallel to the west. How far? is now the important question; and I repeat the words of the report of the commissaries, accepted by their respective nations, when I answer—"INDEFINITELY!" I quote the words of the report when I answer, (omitting all the previous parts of the line,) "to the latitude of 49 degrees north of the equator, and along that parallel indefinitely to the west." [A Senator asked where all this was found.] Mr. BENTON. I find it in the state papers of France and England above an hundred years ago, and in those of the United States since the acquisition of Louisiana. I quote now from Mr. Madison's instructions, when Secretary of State under Mr. Jefferson in 1804, to Mr. Monroe, then our minister in London; and given to him to fortify him in his defence of our new acquisition. The cardinal word in this report of the commissaries is the word "indefinitely;" and that word it was the object of the British to expunge, from the moment that we discovered the Columbia, and acquired Louisiana—events which were of the same era in our history, and almost cotemporaneous. In the negotiations with Mr. Monroe, (which ended in a treaty, rejected by Mr. Jefferson without communication to the Senate,) the effort was to limit the line, and to terminate it at the Rocky mountains; well knowing that if this line was suffered to continue indefinitely to the west, it would deprive them of all they wanted; for it would strike the ocean three degrees north of the mouth of the Columbia. Without giving us what we were entitled to by the right of discoveries, and as successors to Spain, it would still take from Great Britain all that she wanted—which was the mouth of the river, its harbor, the position which commanded it, and its right bank, in the rich and timbered region of tide-water. The line on the 49th parallel would cut her off from all these advantages; and, therefore, to mutilate that line, and stop it at the Rocky mountains, immediately became her inexorable policy. At Ghent, in 1814, the effort was renewed. The commissioners of the United States and those of Great Britain could not agree; and nothing was done. At London, in 1818, the effort was successful; and in the convention then signed in that city, the line of the treaty of Utrecht was stopped at the Rocky mountains. The country on the Columbia was laid open for ten years to the joint occupation of the citizens and subjects of both powers; and, afterwards, by a renewed convention at London, this joint occupation was renewed indefinitely, and until one of the parties should give notice for its termination. It is under this privilege of joint occupation that Great Britain has taken exclusive possession of the right bank of the river, from its head to its mouth, and also exclusive possession of the fur-trade on both sides of the river, into the heart of the Rocky mountains. Mr. friend and colleague [Mr. LINN] has submitted a motion to require the President to give the stipulated notice for the termination of this convention—a convention so unequal in its operation, from the inequality of title between the two parties, and from the organized power of the British in that quarter, under the powerful direction of the Hudson's Bay Fur Company. Thus our title as far as latitude 49, so valid under the single guaranty of the treaty of Utrecht, without looking to other sources, has been jeopardied by this improvident convention; and the longer it stands, the worse it is for us. The article is in these words:

"It is agreed that any country that may be claimed by either party on the northwest coast of America, westward of the Stony mountains, shall, together with its harbors, bays, and creeks, and the navigation of all rivers within the same, be free and open for the term of ten years from the date of the signature of this convention, to the vessels, citizens, and subjects of the two powers; it being well understood that this agreement is not to be construed to the prejudice of any claim which either of the two high contracting parties may have to any part of said country; nor shall it be taken to affect the claims of any other power or State to any part of the said country; the only object of the high contracting parties, in that respect, being to prevent disputes and differences amongst themselves." [ARTICLE III.]

The faults of this article are three, namely:

1. In assuming that there were divers harbors, bays, creeks, and navigable rivers west of the Rocky mountains, some belonging to the United States, and some to Great Britain; and that mutuality of benefits was conferred by giving to each party access to these waters of the other. Even if such different ownerships of different waters had existed in that quarter, it would have been the ready way to generate disputes, instead of preventing them, to throw open the gates of each to the entrance of the other. But there was no such separate and respective ownership. There was but one owner of bays, harbors, creeks, and navigable rivers in that quarter: and that owner was the United States; and its ownership only applied to one harbor, one bay, one creek, and one navigable river in that quarter; and all these four descriptions of waters resolved themselves into one single stream and its estuary—the Columbia river. This was perfectly well known at the time—the navigator, Vancouver, and the fur-trader, Sir Alexander McKenzie, having both finished their explorations, and reported the Columbia river to be the only navigable stream in all that coast; and the harbor at its mouth as being the only one that communicated with the interior of the continent. The British, then, by the terms of the convention, got possession of our harbor and our river, while they had neither harbor nor river for us to possess; and thus a treaty equal and fair in its terms, became unequal and unfair in its operation.

2. The second fault of the treaty was in admitting an organized and powerful portion of the British people to come into possession of our territories jointly with individual and disconnected possessors on our part. The Hudson's Bay Company held dominion there on the north of our territories. They were powerful in themselves, perfectly organized, protected by their Government, united with it in policy, and controlling all the Indians from Canada and the Rocky mountains out to the Pacific ocean, and north to Baffin's Bay. This company was admitted, by the convention of 1818, to a joint possession with us of all our territories on the Columbia river. The effect was soon seen. Their joint possession immediately became exclusive on the north bank of the river. Our fur-traders were all driven from beyond the Rocky mountains; then driven out of the mountains; more than a thousand of them killed: forts were built; a chain of posts established to communicate with Canada and Hudson's Bay; settlers introduced; a colony planted; firm possession acquired; and, at the end of the ten years when the joint possession was to cease, the intrusive possessors, protected by their Government, refused to go—began to set up title—and obtained a renewal of the convention, without limit of time, and until they shall receive notice to quit. This renewed convention was made in 1828; and, instead of joint possession with us for ten years, while we should have joint possession with them of their rivers, bays, creeks, and harbors, for the same time—instead of this, they have had exclusive possession of our territory, our river, our harbor, and our creeks and inlets, for above a quarter of a century. They are establishing themselves as in a permanent possession—making the fort Vancouver, at the confluence of the Multnomah and Columbia, in tide water, the seat of their power and operations.* The notice required never will be given while the present Administration is in power; nor obeyed when given, unless men are in power who will protect the rights and the honor of their country. The fate of Maine has doubled the dangers of the Columbia, and nearly placed us in a position to choose between WAR and INFAMY, in relation to that river.

3. The third great fault of the convention was, in admitting a claim on the part of Great Britain to any portion of these territories. Before that convention, she stated no claim; but asked a favor—the favor of joint possession for ten years: now she sets up title. That title is backed by possession. Possession among nations, as well as among individuals, is eleven points out of twelve; and the bold policy of Great Britain well knows how to avail itself of these eleven points. The Madawaska settlement has read us a lesson on that head; and the success there must lead to still greater boldness elsewhere. The London convention of 1818 is to the Columbia, what the Ghent treaty of 1814 was to Maine; that is to say, the first false step in a game in which we furnish the whole stake, and then play for it. In Maine the game is up. The bold hand of Great Britain has clutched the stake; and nothing but the courage of our people will save the Columbia from the same catastrophe.

I proceed with more satisfaction to our title under the Nootka Sound treaty, and can state it in a few words. All the world knows the commotion which was excited in 1790 by the Nootka Sound controversy between Great Britain and Spain. It was a case in which the bullying of England and the courage of Spain were both tried to the ne plus ultra point, and in which Spanish courage gained the victory. Of course, the British writers relate the story in their own way; but the debates of the Parliament, and the terms of the treaty in which all ended, show things as they were. The British, presuming on the voyages of Captain Cook, took possession of Nootka; the Spanish Viceroy of Mexico sent a force to fetch the English away, and placed them in the fortress of Acapulco. Pitt demanded the release of his English, their restoration to Nootka, and an apology for the insult to the British Crown, in the violation of its territory and the persons of its subjects; the Spaniard refused the release, the restoration, and the apology, on the ground that Nootka was Spanish territory, and that they would fight for its possession. Then both parties prepared for war. The preparations fixed the attention of all Europe. Great Britain bullied to the point of holding the match over the touch-hole of the cannon; but the Spaniards remaining firm, she relaxed, and entered into a convention which abnegated her claim. She accepted from the Spaniards the privilege of landing and building huts on the unoccupied parts of the coast, for the purpose of fishing and trading; and while this acceptance nullified her claim, yet she took nothing under it—not even temporary use—never having built a hut, erected a tent, or commenced any sort of settlement on any part of the coast. Mr. Fox keenly reproached Mr. Pitt with the terms of this convention, being, as he showed, a limitation instead of an acquisition of rights. In the debates upon the Nootka question, he said:

"Our right before was to settle in any part of the South or Northwest Coast of America not fortified against us by previous occupancy; and we were now restricted to settle in certain places only, and under certain restrictions. This was an important concession on our part. Our right of fishing extended to the whole ocean; and now it, too, was limited, and to be carried on within certain limits of the Spanish settlements. Our right of making settlements was not, as now, a right to build huts; but to plant colonies, if we thought proper."

In such terms did Mr. Fox characterize the Nootka treaty, and rightly; for it showed that, in 1790, the British had no rights on the Northwest coast of America; that they accepted from the Spaniards, as a concession, the privilege of hunting and fishing on that coast—a privilege which they did not even use. It was not until we discovered the Columbia, that she renewed a claim to any territory on the Northwest coast; and though foiled by the senile monarchy of Spain, even under the feeble administration of Charles the IV and the favorite Godoy, yet she expects to succeed against our young and peace-loving Republic.

Nootka is in latitude 50—being four degrees north of the mouth of the Columbia; and to that degree did Spain assert and maintain her title against Great Britain in 1790. But that was not the extent of her assertion of that right. Against the British, she asserted it to the whole extent of the coast; against the Russians, (the only real claimants, with ourselves, in that quarter,) to latitude 55. Thus, as deriving from Spain, our title is good against England throughout the coast; against Russia, to latitude 55. As deriving under discoveries and settlement, it is good against all the world, to the extent of the region drained by the waters of the Columbia river. We discovered the river from its mouth to its source, took possession of it as our territory, and, according to the laws of nations, have a clear and valid title to it.

Our title is clear: that of the British is null. She sets up none—that is, she states no derivation of title. There is not a paper upon the face of the earth, in which a British minister has stated a title, or even a claim. They have endeavored to obtain the country by the arts of diplomacy; but never have stated a title, and never can state one. The fur-trader Sir Alexander McKenzie prompted the acquisition, gave the reason for it, and never pretended a title. His own discoveries gave no title. They were subsequent to the discovery of Captain Gray, and far to the north of the Columbia. He never saw that river. He missed the head sources of it, fell upon the Tacouche Tesse, and struck the Pacific in a latitude 500 miles (by the coast) to the north of the Columbia. His subsequent discoveries were all north of that point. He was looking for a communication with the sea—for a river, a harbor, and a place for a colony—within the dominions of Great Britain; and, not finding any, he boldly recommended his Government to seize the Columbia river, to hold it, and to expel the Americans from the whole country west of the Rocky mountains. This is what he said. I quote from his History of the Fur-Trade:

"The Russians, who first discovered that along the coasts of Asia no useful or regular navigation existed, opened an interior communication by rivers, &c., and through that long and wide extended continent, to the strait that separates Asia from America, over which they passed to the American continent. Our situation is at length in some degree similar to theirs—the non-existence of a practicable passage by sea, and the existence of one through the continent, are clearly proved; and it requires only the countenance and support of the British Government to increase, in a very ample proportion, this national advantage, and secure the trade of that country to its subjects. * * * * * * * By the rivers which discharge themselves into Hudson's Bay, at Port Nelson, it is proposed to carry on the trade to their source at the head of the Saskatchiwine river, which rises in the Rocky mountains, not eight degrees of longitude from the Pacific ocean. The Columbia flows from the same mountains, and discharges itself into the Pacific in north latitude 46 degrees 20 minutes. Both of them are capable of receiving ships at their mouths, and are navigable throughout for boats. * * * * * * * But whatever course may be taken from the Atlantic, the Columbia is the line of communication from the Pacific ocean, pointed out by nature, as it is the only navigable river in the whole extent of Vancouver's minute survey of the coast. Its banks also form the first level country in all the southern extent of continental coast from Cook's entry; and, consequently, the most northern situation suited for the residence of a civilized people. By opening this intercourse between the Atlantic and Pacific oceans, and forming regular establishments through the interior, and at both extremes, as well as along the coasts and islands, the entire command of the fur-trade of North America might be obtained from latitude 45 to the pole, except that portion of it which the Russians have in the Pacific. To this may be added the fishing in both seas, and the markets in the four quarters of the globe. Such would be the field for commercial enterprise, and incalculable would be the produce of it, when supported by the operations of that credit and capital which Great Britain so eminently possesses. Then would this country begin to be remunerated for the expense it has sustained in discovering and surveying the coast of the Pacific ocean, which is at present left to American adventurers, who, without regularity or capital, or the desire of conciliating future confidence, look altogether to the interests of the moment. Such adventurers (and many of them, as I have been informed, have been very successful) would instantly disappear before a well-regulated trade. * * * * * * * Many political reasons, which it is not necessary here to enumerate, must present themselves to the mind of every man acquainted with the enlarged system and capacities of British commerce, in support of the measures which I have briefly suggested as promising the most important advantages to the trade of the United Kingdom. * * * * * * * Let the line begin where it may on the Mississippi, it must be continued west, till it terminates in the Pacific ocean to the south of the Columbia river."

This was the recommendation of Sir A. McKenzie; and, upon this recommendation, and precisely for the reasons, commercial and political, which he gave, Great Britain has gone to work to wrench it from us. And here let us trace her pretension; (for title or claim it cannot be called;) let us trace this pretension, and mark its exact parallel to the movement upon Maine. It was in London, in 1818, that the British Government first discovered its disposition to obtain this country. The river, and the harbor at its mouth, were what they wanted: and, as the north bank would give them the command of the whole, they generously offered to divide by the river: they taking the north half, we the south. As this was the commencement of their pretension, it will be right to give them the benefit of their own words. This we can do authentically; for, in those days, protocols were kept: and the American commissioners (Messrs. Gallatin and Rush) thus report the pretensions of Great Britain through her commissioners, (Messrs. Robinson and Goulburne:

"That former voyages, and principally that of Capt. Cook, gave to Great Britain the rights derived from discovery; and they alluded to purchases from the natives south of the Columbia river, which they alleged to have been made prior to the American Revolution. They did not make any formal proposition for a boundary; but intimated that the river itself was the most convenient that could be adopted; and that they would not agree to any which did not give them the harbor at the mouth of the river, in common with the United States."

This was the state of the pretension in London, in 1818: in Washington, at the same time, it was quite different; but just about as strong. It so happened that, while the convention was in progress in London, the Government of the United States at Washington was fitting out a vessel, and despatching an agent to the mouth of the Columbia, to receive the possession of Astoria, deliverable under the Ghent treaty. Mr. Bagot was then British minister at Washington; and, on being applied to for a letter of instructions to the officer in command at Astoria—the name changed by the British to that of

* "This fort is on the north side of the Columbia, nearly opposite the mouth of the Multnomah, in the region of tide-water, and near the head of ship navigation. It is a grand position, both in a military and commercial point of view, and formed to command the whole region watered by the Columbia and its tributaries. The surrounding country, both in climate and soil, is capable of sustaining a large population; and its resources in timber give ample facilities for ship-building. This post is fortified with cannon; and, having been selected as the principal or master position, no pains have been spared to strengthen and improve it. For this purpose, the old post near the mouth of the river has been abandoned. About 120 acres of ground are in cultivation; and the product in wheat, barley, oats, corn, potatoes, and other vegetables, is equal to what is known in the best parts of the United States. Domestic animals are numerous—the horned cattle having been stated to me at 300; hogs, horses, sheep, and goats, in proportion; also, the usual domestic fowls: everything, in fact, indicating a permanent establishment. Ship-building has commenced at this place. One vessel has been built and rigged, sent to sea, and employed in the trade of the Pacific ocean. I also met a gentleman, on my way to Lake Winnipec, at the portage between the Columbia and Athabasca, who was on his way from Hudson's Bay to Fort Colville, with a master ship-carpenter, and who was destined for Fort Vancouver, for the purpose of building a ship of considerable burden. Both grist and saw mills have been built at Fort Vancouver: with the latter, they saw the timber which is needed for their own use, and also for exportation to the Sandwich Islands; upon the former, their wheat is manufactured into flour. And, from all that I could learn, this important post is silently growing up into a colony; and is, perhaps, intended as a future military and naval station, which was not expected to be delivered up at the expiration of the treaty which granted them a temporary and joint possession."—Major Pilcher's report to the Secretary of War, Oct., 1830.

Fort George—he declined to give it; claimed the country as British property; and, being ignorant of the grounds of claim set up in London—namely, Cook's voyages, and Indian sales before the Revolution—he took position on three other grounds; namely, under the Nootka treaty, McKenzie's discoveries, and as a conquest during the war. And upon these pretensions the British claim has rested, until possession has made them bold enough to exclude it from the subjects of formal negotiation between the two countries. The peace-mission refused us peace on that point. The President tells us that there is "no probability of coming to any agreement at present!" Then when can the agreement be made? If refused now, when is it to come? Never, until we show that we prefer war to ignominious peace.

I do not comment on these pretensions. They are too empty, and too contradictory, for remark—Cook's discoveries—Indian sales before the Revolution—the Nootka sound treaty—McKenzie's researches—the conquest during the war! Why, sir, Cook never saw that coast; the country belonged to the Spaniards before the Revolution; Nootka sound was a Spanish triumph; McKenzie struck the ocean 500 miles to the north; and the war conquest was on a level with the conquest of Castine and Detroit. No, sir, no. Great Britain relies on her own audacity, and on our mercantile love of peace. Her title is her will and her arms! and henceforth she will not deign to name any other. Having got from us all she wanted; having got the strong military frontier which covers Quebec and commands Maine; and having conciliated all the Northern States by surrenders of territory, and a free trade in grain and provisions;—having done all this, she is ready to put the West, and the South also, at defiance! and trust to her arms and audacity to supply the place of negotiation.

This is the British title to the Columbia, and the only one that she wants for anything. It suits her to have that river: it is her interest to have it: it strengthens her, and weakens others, for her to have it; and, therefore, have it she will. This is her title, and this her argument. Upon this title and argument, she gets a slice from Maine, and gains the mountain barrier which covers Quebec; and, upon this title and argument, she means to have the Columbia river. The events of the late war, and the application of steam power to ocean navigation, begat her title to the country between Halifax and Quebec: the suggestions of McKenzie begat her title to the Columbia. Improvident diplomacy on our part, a war countenance on her part, and this strange treaty, have given success to her pretensions in Maine: the same diplomacy, and the same countenance, have given her a foothold on the Columbia. It is for the Great West to see that no traitorous treaty shall abandon it to her. The President, in his message, says that there was no chance for any "agreement" about it at present; that it would not be made the subject of a "formal negotiation" at present; that it could not be included in the duties of the "special mission." Why so? The mission was one of peace, and to settle everything; and why omit this pregnant question? Was this a war question, and therefore not to be settled by the peace mission? Why not come to an agreement now, if agreement is ever intended? The answer is evident. No agreement is ever intended. Contented with her possession, Great Britain wants delay, that time may ripen possession into title, and fortunate events facilitate her designs. My colleague and myself were sounded on this point: our answers forbade the belief that we would compromise or sacrifice the rights and interests of our country; and this may have been the reason why there were no "formal" negotiations in relation to it. Had we been "soft enough," there might have been an agreement to divide our country by the river; or, to refer the whole title to the decision of a friendly sovereign! We were not soft enough for that; and if such a paper, marked B, and identified with the initials of our Secretary, had been sent to the Missouri delegation, as was sent to the Maine commissioners, instead of subduing us to the purposes of Great Britain, it would have received from the whole delegation the answer due to treason, to cowardice, and to insolence.

But, it is demanded, what do we want with this country, so far off from us? I answer by asking, in my turn, what do the British want with it, who are so much further off? They want it for the fur-trade; for a colony; for an outlet to the sea; for the communication across the continent; for a road to Asia; for the command of 140,000 Indians against us; for the port and naval station which is to command the commerce and navigation of the North Pacific ocean, and open new channels of trade with China, Japan, Polynesia, and the great East. They want it for these reasons; and we want it for the same; and because it adjoins us, and belongs to us, and should be possessed by our descendants, who will be our friends; and not by aliens, who will be our enemies.

Forty years ago, it was written by Humboldt that the valley of the Columbia invited Europeans to found a fine colony there; and, twenty years ago, the American Congress adopted a resolve, that no part of this continent was open to European colonization. The remark of Humboldt was that of a sagacious European; the resolve of Congress was the work of patriotic Americans. It remains to be seen which will prevail. The convention of 1818 has done us the mischief; it put the European power in possession: and possession with nations, still more than with individuals, is the main point in the contest. It will require the Western pioneers to recover the lost ground; and they must be encouraged in the enterprise by liberal grant of lands, by military protection, and by Governmental authority. It is time for the bill of my colleague to pass. The first session of the first Congress under the new census should pass it. The majority will be Democratic, and the Democracy will demand that great work at their hands. I put no faith in negotiation. I expect nothing but loss and shame from any negotiation in London. Our safety is in the energy of our people; in their prompt occupation of the country; and in their invincible determination to maintain their rights.

I do not dilate upon the value and extent of this great country. A word suffices to display both. In extent, it is larger than the Atlantic portion of the old thirteen United States; in climate, softer; in fertility, greater; in salubrity, superior; in position, better, because fronting Asia, and washed by a tranquil sea. In all these particulars, the western slope of our continent is far more happy than the eastern. In configuration, it is inexpressibly fine and grand—a vast oblong square, with natural boundaries, and a single gateway into the sea. The snow-capped Rocky mountains enclose it to the east, an iron-bound coast on the west: a frozen desert on the north, and sandy plains on the south. All its rivers, rising on the segment of a vast circumference, run to meet each other in the centre; and then flow together into the ocean, through a gap in the mountain, where the heats of summer and the colds of winter are never felt, and where southern and northern diseases are equally unknown. This is the valley of the Columbia—a country whose every advantage is crowned by the advantages of position and configuration: by the unity of all its parts—the inaccessibility of its borders—and its single introgression to the sea. Such a country is formed for union, wealth, and strength. It can have but one capital, and that will be a Thebes; but one commercial emporium, and that will be Tyre, queen of cities. Such a country can have but one people, one interest, one government: and that people should be American—that interest ours—and that government republican. Accursed and infamous be the man that divides or alienates it!

But, it is demanded, will you add this great country to this great Union, already too large in the opinion of many? I answer that question as Mr. Jefferson answered it forty years ago. I say, No! But, like him, I also say, I would keep the European out of it. I would plant the American in it. I would nurture and sustain him in his infancy; and when old enough to take care of himself, I would part from him, as the father parts from his manly son—with benedictions, with aid, and with injunctions never to forget what is due to his parent.

Impressment is another of the omitted subjects. This having been a cause of war in 1812, and being now declared, by the American negotiator, to be a sufficient cause for future wars, it would naturally, to my mind, have been included in the labors of a special mission, dedicated to peace, and extolled for its benevolent conception. We would have expected to find such a subject, after such a declaration, included in the labors of such a mission. Not so the fact. The treaty does not mention impressment. A brief paragraph in the President's message informs us that there was a correspondence on this point; and, on turning to this correspondence, we actually find two letters on the subject: one from Mr. Webster to Lord Ashburton—one from Lord Ashburton to Mr. Webster: both showing, from their dates, that they were written after the treaty was signed; and, from their character, that they were written for the public, and not for the negotiators. The treaty was signed on the 9th of August; the letters were written on the 8th and 9th of the same month. They are a plea, and a reply; and they leave the subject precisely where they found it. From their date and character, they seem to be what the lawyers call the postea—that is to say, the afterwards; and are very properly postponed to the end of the document containing the correspondence, where they find place on the 120th page. They look ex post facto there; and, putting all things together, it would seem as if the American negotiator had said to the British lord, (after the negotiation was over:) My Lord, here is impressment—a pretty subject for a composition; the people will love to read something about it; so let us compose. To which, it would seem, his Lordship had answered: You may compose as much as you please for your people; I leave that field to you: and when you are done, I will write three lines for my own Government, to let it know that I stick to impressment. In about this manner, it would seem to me that the two letters were got up; and that the American negotiator in this little business has committed a couple of the largest faults: first, in naming the subject of impressment at all! next, in ever signing a treaty, after having named it, without an unqualified renunciation of the pretension!

Sir, the same thing is not always equally proper. Time and circumstances qualify the proprieties of international, as well as of individual intercourse; and what was proper and commendable at one time, may become improper, reprehensible, and derogatory at another. When George the Third, in the first article of his first treaty with the United States, at the end of a seven years' war, acknowledged them to be free, sovereign, and independent States, and renounced all dominion over them, this was a proud and glorious consummation for us, and the crowning mercy of a victorious rebellion. The same acknowledgment and renunciation from Queen Victoria, at present, would be an insult for her to offer—a degradation for us to accept. So of this question of impressment. It was right in all the administrations previous to the late war, to negotiate for its renunciation. But after having gone to war for this cause; after having suppressed the practice by war; after near thirty years' exemption from it;—after all this, for our negotiator to put the question in discussion, was to compromise our rights! To sign a treaty without its renunciation, after having proposed to treat about it, was to relinquish them! Our negotiator should not have mentioned the subject. If mentioned to him by the British negotiator, he should have replied, that the answer to that pretension was in the cannon's mouth!

[Several Senators exclaimed, Yes! in the cannon's mouth!]

But to name it himself, and then sign without renunciation, and to be invited to London to treat about it;—to do this, was to descend from our position; to lose the benefit of the late war; to revive the question; to invite the renewal of the practice, by admitting it to be an unsettled question—and to degrade the present generation, by admitting that they would negotiate where their ancestors had fought. These are fair inferences; and inferences not counteracted by the euphonious declaration that the American Government is "prepared to say" that the practice of impressment cannot hereafter be allowed to take place!—as if, after great study, we had just arrived at that conclusion! and as if we had not declared much more courageously in the case of the Maine boundary, the Schlosser massacre, and the Creole mutiny and murder! The British, after the experience they have had, will know how to value our courageous declaration, and must pay due respect to our flag! For one, I never liked these declarations, and never made a speech in favor of any one of them; and now I like them less than ever, and am prepared to put no further faith in the declarations of gentlemen who were for going to war for the smallest part of the Maine boundary in 1838, and now surrender 300 miles of that boundary for fear of war, when there is no danger of war. I am prepared to say that I care not a straw for the heroic declarations of such gentlemen. I want actions, not phrases. I want Mr. Jefferson's act in 1806—rejection of any treaty with Great Britain that does not renounce impressment! And after having declared, by law, black impressment on the coast of Africa to be piracy; after stipulating to send a fleet there, to enforce our law against that impressment;—after this, I am ready to do the same thing against white impressment on our own coasts, and on the high seas. I am ready to enact that the impressment of my white fellow-citizens out of an American ship is an act of piracy; and then to follow out that enactment in its every consequence.

I profess Jeffersonism, and wish to act up to the profession; and here is a case, to test the fidelity of professors to the instructions of that great master. In the year 1807, he rejected, without even a reference to the Senate, the British treaty, which was silent upon the subject of impressment. It was a treaty of great moment, embraced many points, and was intended to prevent the war which was then impending; but impressment having been discussed, and no article being found in the treaty against it, Mr. Jefferson rejected it; and his answer to Messrs. Monroe and Pinckney, returning the treaty to them, should form the inexorable answer of every American under the like circumstances. That answer was drawn up by Mr. Madison, and says:

"The President continues to regard this subject in the light in which it has been pressed on the justice and friendship of Great Britain. He cannot reconcile it with his duty to our seafaring citizens, or with the sensibility or sovereignty of the nation, to recognise, even constructively, a principle that would expose on the high seas their liberty—their lives—everything, in a word, that is dearest to the human heart—to the capricious or interested sentences which may be pronounced against their allegiance by officers of a foreign government, whom neither the laws of nations, nor the laws of their own government, will allow to decide on the ownership or character of the minutest article of property found in a like situation. * * * On these grounds the President is constrained to decline any arrangement, formal or informal, which does not comprise a provision against impressments from American vessels on the high seas, and which would, notwithstanding, be a bar to such legislative measures as Congress have thought or may think proper to adopt, for controlling that species of aggression. * * * Without a provision against impressments, substantially such as is contemplated in your original instructions, NO TREATY IS TO BE CONCLUDED."

This was the language of Mr. Jefferson in 1807. Still more should it be the language of his country in 1842, when our strength is more than doubled; when we have once refused to make a treaty, in time of peace, without renunciation of impressment; when we have had one war against it; and when thirty years' cessation of the practice had sunk the pretension. Above all, it should have been the language in 1842, when the special mission came heralded with the beatitude of peace, authorized to settle everything, and seeking sacrifices from us, which should, at the least, have commanded justice from her. Instead of this, what was the language? And here justice to the parties requires that each should be allowed to speak for himself. Listen to them.

President Tyler says:

"The impressment of seamen from merchant vessels of this country, by British cruisers, although not practised in time of peace, and, therefore, not at present a productive cause of difference and irritation, has, nevertheless, hitherto been so prominent a topic of controversy, and is so likely to bring on renewed contentions at the first breaking out of a European war, that it has been thought the part of wisdom new to take it into serious and earnest consideration. The letter from the Secretary of State to the British minister explains the ground which the Government has assumed, and the principles which it means to uphold. For the defence of these grounds, and the maintenance of these principles, the most perfect reliance is placed on the intelligence of the American people, and on their firmness and patriotism, in whatever touches the honor of the country, or its great and essential interests."

Mr. Webster says:

"In the calm and quiet which have succeeded the late war—a condition so favorable for dispassionate consideration—England herself has evidently seen the harshness of impressment, even when exercised on seamen in her own merchant service; and she has adopted measures calculated, if not to renounce the power or to abolish the practice, yet, at least, to supersede its necessity, by other means of manning the royal navy more compatible with justice and the rights of individuals, and far more conformable to the spirit and sentiments of the age.

"Under these circumstances, the Government of the United States has used the occasion of your Lordship's pacific mission to review this whole subject, and to bring it to your notice and that of your Government. It has reflected on the past, pondered the condition of the present, and endeavored to anticipate, so far as might be in its power, the probable future; and I am now to communicate to your Lordship the result of these deliberations.

"The American Government, then, is prepared to say that the practice of impressing seamen from American vessels cannot hereafter be allowed to take place. That practice is founded on principles which it does not recognise; and is invariably attended by consequences so unjust, so injurious, and of such formidable magnitude, as cannot be submitted to."

"This announcement is not made, my Lord, to revive useless recollections of the past, nor to stir the embers from fires which have been, in a great degree, smothered by many years of peace. Far otherwise. Its purpose is to extinguish those fires effectually, before new incidents arise to fan them into flame. The communication is in the spirit of peace, and for the sake of peace; and springs from a deep and conscientious conviction that high interests of both nations require that this so-long-contested and controverted subject should now be finally put to rest. I persuade myself, my Lord, that you will do justice to this frank and sincere avowal of motives, and that you will communicate your sentiments in this respect to your Government.

"This letter closes, my Lord, on my part, our official correspondence; and I gladly use the occasion to offer you the assurance of my high and sincere regard."

Lord Ashburton answers:

"I am well aware that the laws of our two countries maintain opposite principles respecting allegiance to the sovereign. America, receiving, every year, by thousands, the emigrants of Europe, maintains the doctrine, suitable to her condition, of the right of transferring allegiance at will. The laws of Great Britain have maintained, from all time, the opposite doctrine. The duties of allegiance are held to be indefeasible; and it is believed that this doctrine, under various modifications, prevails in most, if not in all, the civilized States of Europe."

"The very anomalous condition of the two countries with relation to each other here creates a serious difficulty. Our people are not distinguishable; and, owing to the peculiar habits of sailors, our vessels are very generally manned from a common stock. It is difficult, under these circumstances, to execute laws which at times have been thought to be essential for the existence of the country, without risk of injury to others. The extent and importance of those injuries, however, are so formidable, that it is admitted that some remedy should, if possible, be applied: at all events, it must be fairly and honestly attempted. It is true that, during the continuance of peace, no practical grievance can arise; but it is also true that it is, for that reason, the proper season for the calm and deliberate consideration of an important subject. I have much reason to hope that a satisfactory arrangement respecting it may be made, so as to set at rest all apprehension and anxiety; and I will only further repeat the assurance of the sincere disposition of my Government favorably to consider all matters having for their object the promoting and maintaining undisturbed kind and friendly feelings with the United States.

"I beg, sir, on this occasion of closing the correspondence with you connected with my mission, to express the satisfaction I feel at its successful termination, and to assure you of my high consideration and personal esteem and regard."

This is the correspondence: and what a correspondence it is! What an exchange of phrases! One denies the right of impressment: the other affirms it. Both wish for an amicable agreement; but neither attempts to agree. Both declare the season of peace to be the proper time to settle this question; and both agree that the present season of peace is not the convenient one. Our Secretary rises so high as to declare that the administration "is now prepared" to put its veto on the practice: the British negotiator shows that his Government is still prepared to resume the practice whenever her interest requires it. Our negotiator hopes that his communication will be received in the spirit of peace: the British minister replies, that it will. Our Secretary then persuades himself that the British minister will communicate his sentiments, in this respect, to his own Government: his Lordship promises it faithfully. And, thereupon, they shake hands and part.

How different this holyday scene from the firm and virile language of Mr. Jefferson: "No treaty to be signed without a provision against impressment;" and this language backed by the fact of the instant rejection of the treaty so signed! Lord Chatham said of Magna Charta, that it was homely Latin, but worth all the classics. So say I of this reply of Mr. Jefferson: it is plain English, but worth all the phrases which rhetoric could ever expend upon the subject. It is the only answer which our Secretary negotiator should have given, after committing the fault of broaching the subject. Instead of that, he commences rhetorician, new vamps old arguments, writes largely and prettily, and loses the question by making it debatable. His adversary sees his advantage, and seizes it. He abandons the field of rhetoric to the lawyer negotiator; puts in a fresh claim to impressment; saves the question from being lost by non-user; re-establishes the debate, and adjourns it to London. He keeps alive the pretension of impressment against us, the white race, while binding us to go to Africa to fight it down for the black race; and has actually left us on lower ground, in relation to this question, than we stood upon before the late war. If this treaty is ratified, we must begin where we were in 1806, when Mr. Monroe and Mr. Pinckney went to London to negotiate against impressment; we must begin where they did, with the disadvantage of having yielded to Great Britain all that she wanted, and having lost all our vantage-ground in the negotiation. We must go to London, engage in a humiliating negotiation, become the spectacle of nations, and the sport of diplomacy; and wear out years in begging to be spared from British seizure, when sitting under our own flag, and sailing in our own ship: we must submit to all this degradation, shame and outrage, unless Congress redeems us from the condition into which we have fallen, and provides for the liberty of our people on the seas, by placing American impressment where African impressment has already been placed—PIRACY BY LAW! For one, I am ready to vote the act—to execute it—and to abide its every consequence.

The case of the Creole, as it is called, is another of the omitted subjects. It is only one of a number of cases (differing in degree, but the same in character) which have occurred within a few years, and are becoming more frequent and violent. It is the case of American vessels, having American slaves on board, and pursuing a lawful voyage, and being driven by storms or carried by violence into a British port, and their slaves liberated by British law. This is the nature of the wrong. It is a general outrage, liable to occur in any part of the British dominions, but happens most usually in the British West India islands, which line the passage round the Florida reefs in a voyage between New Orleans and the Atlantic ports. I do not speak of the 12,000 slaves (worth, at a moderate computation, considering they must be all grown, and in youth or middle life, at least $6,000,000) enticed into Canada, and received with the honors and advantages due to the first class of emigrants. I do not speak of these, nor of the liberation of slaves carried voluntarily by their owners into British ports: the man who exposes his property wilfully to the operation of a known law, should abide the consequences to which he has subjected it. I confine myself to cases of the class mentioned—such as the Encomium, the Comet, the Enterprise, the Creole, and the Hermosa—cases in which wreck, tempest, violence, mutiny, and murder were the means of carrying the vessel into the interdicted port, and in which the slave property, after being saved to the owners from revolt and tempests, became the victim and the prey of British law. It is of such cases that I complain, and of which I say that they furnish no subject for the operation of injurious laws, and that each of these vessels should have been received with the hospitality due to misfortune, and allowed to depart with all convenient despatch, and with all her contents of persons and property. This is the law of nations: it is what the civilization of the age requires. And it is not to be tolerated in this nineteenth century that an American citizen, passing from one port to another of his own country, with property protected by the laws of his country, should encounter the perils of an unfortunate navigator in the dark ages, shipwrecked on a rude and barbarian coast. This is not to be tolerated in this age, and by such a power as the United States, and after sending a fleet to Africa to protect the negroes. Justice, like charity, should begin at home; and protection should be given where allegiance is exacted. We cannot tolerate the spoil and pillage of our own citizens, within sight of our own coasts, after sending 4,000 miles to redress the wrongs of the black race. But if this treaty is ratified, it seems that we shall have to endure it, or seek redress by other means than negotiation. The previous cases were at least ameliorated by compensation to their owners for the liberation of the slaves; but in the more recent and most atrocious case of the Creole, there is no indemnity of any mind—neither compensation to the owners, whose property has been taken; nor apology to the Government, whose flag has been insulted; nor security for the future, by giving up the practice. A treaty is signed without a stipulation of any kind on the subject; and, as it would seem, to the satisfaction of those who made it, and of the President, who sends it to us. A correspondence has been had; the negotiators have exchanged diplomatic notes on the subject; and these notes are expected to be as satisfactory to the country as to those who now have the rule of it. The President, in his message, says:

"On the subject of the interference of the British authorities in the West Indies, a confident hope is entertained that the correspondence which has taken place, showing the grounds taken by this Government, and the engagements entered into by the British minister, will be found such as to satisfy the just expectation of the people of the United States."—Message, Aug. 9.

This is a short paragraph for so large a subject; but it is all the message contains. But let us see what it amounts to, and what it is that is expected to satisfy the just expectations of the country. It is the grounds taken in the correspondence, and the engagements entered into by the British minister, which are to work out this agreeable effect. Now, let us see what these grounds and these engagements are.

Mr. Webster says:

"Your Lordship is aware that several cases have occurred within the last few years which have caused much complaint. In some of these cases, compensation has been made by the English Government for the interference of the local authorities with American vessels having slaves on board, by which interference these slaves were set free. In other cases, such compensation has been refused. It appears to the President to be for the interest of both countries that the recurrence of similar cases in future should be prevented, as far as possible.

"Your Lordship has been acquainted with the case of the Creole, a vessel, carried into the port of Nassau last winter, by persons who had risen upon the lawful authority of the vessel, and, in the accomplishment of their purpose, had committed murder on a person on board." * * * *

"In the Southern States of this Union, slavery exists by the laws of the States, and under the guaranty of the Constitution of the United States; and it has existed in them from a period long antecedent to the time when they ceased to be British colonies. In this state of things, it will happen that slaves will be often on board coasting vessels, as hands, as servants attending the families of their owners, or for the purpose of being carried from port to port. For the security of the rights of their citizens, when vessels, having persons of this description on board, are driven by stress of weather, or carried by unlawful force, into British ports, the United States propose the introduction of no new principle into the law of nations. They require only a faithful and exact observance of the injunctions of that code, as understood and practised in modern times.

"Your Lordship observes that I have spoken only of American vessels driven into British ports by the disasters of the seas, or carried in by unlawful force. I confine my remarks to these cases, because they are the common cases, and because they are the cases which the law of nations most emphatically exempts from interference. The maritime law is full of instances of the application of that great and practical rule, which declares that that which is the clear result of necessity ought to draw after it no penalty and no hazard. If a ship be driven, by stress of weather, into a prohibited port, or into an open port, with prohibited articles on board, in neither case is any forfeiture incurred. And (what may be considered a still stronger case) it has been decided by eminent English authority—and that decision has received general approbation—that if a vessel be driven, by necessity, into a port strictly blockaded, this necessity is good defence, and exempts her from penalty." * * * *

"If your Lordship has no authority to enter into a stipulation by treaty for the prevention of such occurrences hereafter as have already happened—occurrences so likely to disturb that peace between the two countries, which it is the object of your Lordship's mission to establish and confirm—you may still be so far acquainted with the sentiments of your Government as to be able to engage that instructions shall be given to the local authorities in the islands, which shall lead them to regulate their conduct in conformity with the rights of citizens of the United States, and the just expectations of their Government, and in such manner as shall, in future, take away all reasonable ground of complaint. It would be with the most profound regret that the President should see that, whilst it is now hoped so many other subjects of difference may be harmoniously adjusted, nothing should be done in regard to this dangerous source of future collisions."—Mr. Webster to Lord Ashburton, Aug 1.

Lord Ashburton replies:

"The immediate case of the Creole would be easily disposed of; but it involves a class and description of cases which, for the purpose of affording that security you seek for the trade of America through the Bahama channel, brings into consideration questions of law, both national and international, of the highest importance; and, to increase the delicacy and difficulty of the subject, public feeling is sensitively alive to everything connected with it. These circumstances bring me to the conviction that, although I really believe that much may be done to meet the wishes of your Government, the means of doing so would be best considered in London, where immediate reference may be had to the highest authorities on every point of delicacy and difficulty that may arise." * * * *

"Upon the great general principles affecting this case, we do not differ. You admit that if slaves, the property of American citizens, escape into British territories, it is not expected that they will be restored; and you may be well assured that there is no wish on our part that they should reach our shores, or that British possessions should be used as decoys for the violators of the laws of a friendly neighbor.

"When these slaves do reach us, by whatever means, there is no alternative. The present state of British law is, in this respect, too well known to require repetition; nor need I remind you that it is exactly the same with the laws of every part of the United States where a state of slavery is not recognised; and that the slave put on shore at Nassau would be dealt with exactly as would a foreign slave landed, under any circumstances whatever, at Boston." * * * *

"In the mean time, I can engage that instructions shall be given to the governors of her Majesty's colonies on the southern borders of the United States to execute their own laws with careful attention to the wish of their own Government to maintain good neighborhood; and that there shall be no officious interference with American vessels driven by accident or by violence into those ports. The laws and duties of hospitality shall be executed; and these seem neither to require nor to justify any further inquisition into the state of persons, or things, on board of vessels so situated, than may be indispensable to enforce the observance of the municipal law of the colony, and the proper regulation of its harbors and waters." * * * *

"I hope, sir, that this explanation on this very important subject will be satisfactory to the President, and that he will see in it no diminution of that earnest desire, which you have been pleased to recognise in me, to perform my work of reconciliation and friendship; but that he will rather perceive, in my suggestions, in this particular instance, that it is made with a well-founded hope of thereby better obtaining the object we have in view."—Lord Ashburton to Mr. Webster, Aug. 6.

Mr. Webster rejoins:

"The President places his reliance on those principles of public law which were stated in my note to your Lordship, and which are regarded as equally well founded and important; and on your Lordship's engagement that instructions shall be given to the governors of her Majesty's colonies to execute their own laws with careful attention to the wish of their Government to maintain good neighborhood; and that there shall be no officious interference with American vessels driven by accident or by violence into those ports; that the laws and duties of hospitality shall be executed, and that these seem neither to require nor to justify any further inquisition into the state of persons or things on board of vessels so situated, than may be indispensable to enforce the observance of the municipal law of the colony, and the proper regulation of its harbors and waters. He indulges the hope, nevertheless, that, actuated by a just sense of what is due to the mutual interests of the two countries, and the maintenance of a permanent peace between them, her Majesty's Government will not fail to see the importance of removing, by such further stipulations, by treaty or otherwise, as may be found to be necessary, all cause of complaint connected with this subject."—Mr. Webster to Lord Ashburton, August 8.

And it is of the grounds stated in the Secretary's two letters, and the engagement entered into in Lord Ashburton's note, that the President predicates his belief of the public satisfaction in relation to this growing and most sensitive question. This brings us to these grounds, and this engagement, that we may see the nature and solidity of the one, and the extent and validity of the other. The grounds for the public satisfaction are in the Secretary's letters; the engagement is in Lord Ashburton's letter; and what do they amount to? On the part of the Secretary, I am free to say that he has laid down the law of nations correctly; that he has well stated the principles of public law which save from hazard, or loss, or penalty of any kind, the vessel engaged in a lawful trade, and driven or carried against her will into a prohibited port. He has well shown that, under such circumstances, no advantage is to be taken of the distressed vessel; that she is to be received with the hospitality due to misfortune, and allowed to depart, after receiving the succors of humanity, with all her contents of persons and things. All this is well laid down by our Secretary. Thus far his grounds are solid. But, alas, this is all talk! and the very next paragraph, after a handsome vindication of our rights under the law of nations, is to abandon them! I refer to the paragraph commencing: "If your Lordship has no authority to enter into a stipulation by treaty for the prevention of such occurrences hereafter," &c. This whole paragraph is fatal to the Secretary's grounds, and pregnant with strange and ominous meanings. In the first place, it is an admission, in the very first line, that no treaty stipulation to prevent future occurrences of the same kind can be obtained HERE! that the special mission, which came to settle everything, and to establish peace, will not settle this thing; which the Secretary, in numerous paragraphs, alleges to be a dangerous source of future war! This is a strange contradiction, and most easily got over by our Secretary. In default of a treaty stipulation, (which he takes for granted, and evidently makes no effort to obtain,) he goes on to solicit a personal engagement from his Lordship; and an engagement of what? That the law of nations shall be observed? No! but that instructions shall be given to the British local authorities in the islands, which shall lead them to regulate their conduct in conformity with the rights of citizens of the United States, and the just expectations of their Government, and in such manner as shall, in future, take away all reasonable ground of complaint. This is the extent of the engagement which was so solicited, and which was to supply the place of a treaty stipulation! If the engagement had been given in the words proposed, it would not have been worth a straw. But it is not given in those words, but with glaring and killing additions and differences. His Lordship follows the commencement of the formula with sufficient accuracy; but, lest any possible consequence might be derived from it, he takes care to add, that when these slaves do reach them, "no matter by what means," there is no alternative! Hospitality, good wishes, friendly feeling, the duties of good neighborhood—all give way! The British law governs! and that law is too well known to require repetition. This is the sum and substance of Lord Ashburton's qualifications of the engagement; and they show him to be a man of honor, that would not leave the Secretary negotiator the slightest room for raising a doubt as to the nature of the instructions which he engaged to have given. These instructions go only to the mode of executing the law. His Lordship engages only for the civility and gentleness of the manner—the suaviter in modo—while the firm execution of the law itself—the fortiter in re—remains as it was. The engagement is against officiousness—inquisitiveness—in finding out the arrival of the slaves; but, after it is found out, the law takes its course. This is the extent of this famous engagement—a promise to get the local authorities instructed to perform the operation of liberation, politely, but still to liberate. Politeness is all that is engaged for; and that I will show, at the proper time, to be completely nullified by the fugitive article in the treaty. After this, what solemn bamboozlement in the Secretary negotiator to repeat, as he does, in his letter of the 8th, all the terms of this engagement, literatim, verbatim, et punctuatim, and present it to us over again; as if it was the most important and sacred thing on earth! And what a farce for the President to communicate this solemn nullity to the Senate, as satisfying all the just expectations of the American people! Sir, this is making too cheap of our understandings. It is letting us down too low in the scale of intellect. Such trifling would be too small for boarding-school misses. It could not impose on the innocent little girls at Miss English's, who take their frugal dinner at 12 o'clock, and believe all mankind to mean exactly what they say. Such children could not be imposed upon by this engagement; for it is an engagement of nothing! And yet it is sent to us—bearded men; and we are told to be satisfied with it!* To be officious, is to exceed the bounds of duty or propriety; to be inquisitive, is to be impertinently curious. Against this excess of duty, and this excess of curiosity, Lord Ashburton engages; as if it was necessary for a British governor to be either, in order to find out the arrival of American slaves in his ports! as if the Abolitionists would not spare his eye the trouble of looking, and his tongue the trouble of inquiring. His ear is all they want; and against this there is no engagement.

But, suppose there was anything in this engagement: is that the new way of securing the rights of the people of the United States? Engagements, upon the word of honor of a minister, for us; and treaties for the British and Africans! Is this the new way? If so, why not put all, or none, into this new form? Why not put the boundary agreement, the fugitive article, and the alliance articles, into this form? Why not take the engagement of our Secretary negotiator for all these things, if engagements are as good as treaties? But, no such thing. The engagement of Lord Ashburton is nothing but a contrivance suggested by our Secretary of State to cover his desertion of the South, and to bamboozle the simple with a show of having done something, when he had done nothing. It is his contrivance. The papers prove it. His own letter of August 1st proves it—the first letter upon the subject—and in which he proposes this identical engagement to Lord Ashburton. The minister has only acted upon his proposal in giving this engagement; taking care to qualify it with the explanations which free it from the possibility of standing for anything. And here we must be struck with the facility with which this great Southern question has been surrendered. Not a struggle made for it! not a moment's stand in its behalf! not the shadow of a stand! On the contrary, our negotiator gives all up in the first letter. Upon the flimsy pretext of no authority in the minister to settle this question here, (when he tells us himself that he came to settle everything,) he proposes an engagement in lieu of a treaty stipulation; and remits the stipulation itself to London, for future ministers to settle.

Lord Ashburton proposes London as the best place to consider it: Mr. Webster accepts London, and hopes that her Majesty's Government will give us treaty stipulations to remove all further cause for complaint on this subject. This is his last hope, contained in the last sentence of his last note. And

*Since the ratification of the treaty, a conference has been had with the British minister by the executive committee of the Foreign and Anti-slavery Society in New York; in which Lord Ashburton is reported to have said:

"Lord Ashburton said that, when the delegation came to read his correspondence with Mr. Webster, they would see that he had taken all possible care to prevent any injury being done to the people of color; that, if he had been willing to introduce an article including cases similar to that of the Creole, his Government would never have ratified it, as they will adhere to the great principles they have so long avowed and maintained; and that the friends of the slave in England would be very watchful to see that no wrong practice took place under the tenth article."—Mr. Lewis Tappan's report of the conference.

now, why a treaty stipulation hereafter, if this engagement is such (as the President says it is) as to satisfy the just expectations of the people of the United States? Why anything more, if that is enough? And if treaty stipulations are wanting, (as, in fact they are,) why go to London for them—the headquarters of abolitionism, the seat of the World's Convention for the abolition of slavery, and the laboratory in which the insurrection of San Domingo was fabricated?* Why go to London? Why go anywhere? Why delay? Why not do it here? Why not include it among the beatitudes of the vaunted peace mission? The excuse that the minister had not powers, is contradictory and absurd. The Secretary negotiator tells us, in his first letter, that the minister came with full powers to settle every subject in discussion. This was a subject in discussion; and had been since the time of the Comet, the Encomium, and the Enterprise—years ago. If instructions were forgotten, why not send for them? What are the steamers, for that, in the six months that the peace mission was here, they could not have brought these instructions a dozen times? No! the truth is, the British Government would do nothing upon this subject when she found she could accomplish all her own objects without granting anything. She got what she wanted for herself, and got it without conditions. The amiable facility of our Secretary granted her everything: and never more amiable in British eyes than when he thus cut the South, from the North—made a treaty for the British—left the South in the lurch—and then undertook to bamboozle the Southrons with his fine engagement!

But, if the engagement was anything, the 10th article of the treaty would nullify it; for that article makes the delivery of fugitive criminals a judicial, as well as a ministerial act. The slave, in such cases as the Creole and others, must be demanded either as property or as criminals; in neither case can the executive authorities of the islands give them up, even if they would. Slaves, as property, are excluded from the surrenders to be made: as criminals, the judicial authority must be applied to: and twice the judge, or justice, must act against the slave before the Governor can make the surrender. The justice must first issue a warrant to apprehend the slave; and he is the judge of the sufficiency of the case made out to authorize the issuance of the warrant. He must then give the slave a hearing on the charge made against him; and is again the judge of the question of guilt. If these two points are both decided against the criminal slave, then the justice is to certify the guilt to the governor, who is thereupon, and not until then, authorized to make the surrender. Now, of what avail is it, with such an article as this in the treaty, to send instructions to governors not to be officious or inquisitive in prying into the case of fugitive slaves? They have nothing to do with it under the new treaty. They have nothing to do with the arrest, hearing, or examination of the criminal. All that belongs to the judiciary; and it is not until they see the judicial certificate that the governors can act at all; and then they must act according to the treaty and the laws of Great Britain, and not according to instructions from British ministers. All this is clear from the concluding parts of the 10th article. Hear it:

"Provided, that this shall only be done upon such evidence of criminality as, according to the laws of the place where the fugitive or person so charged shall be found, would justify his apprehension and commitment for trial, if the crime or offence had there been committed; and the respective judges and other magistrates of the two Governments shall have power, jurisdiction, and authority, upon complaint made under oath, to issue a warrant for the apprehension of the fugitive or person so charged, that he may be brought before such judges or other magistrates, respectively, to the end that the evidence of criminality may be heard and considered; and if, on such hearing, the evidence be deemed sufficient to sustain the charge, it shall be the duty of the examining judge or magistrate to certify the same to the proper executive authority, that a warrant may issue for the surrender of such fugitive."

This nullifies any instructions for polite behavior which may be issued. It reduces the engagement to the merest hoax. The offence is to be one for which the fugitive could be arrested and tried, if committed at the place of apprehension. And who supposes that, in the abolition dominions of Great Britain, the murder or robbery of a master by his slave will be admitted to be a crime for which the perpetrator should be delivered up to justice? Even admitting that, under the common law of England, there may be a killing of the master by his slave, under circumstances which would amount to murder; yet who could expect, in the present state of British feeling, that the law could be executed by a British judge? Who would expect even such a murderer to be given up, much less when the killing takes the form of defence against violence, or escape from oppression? Who expects a warrant, a decision, or a certificate against a slave, under such circumstances? If any one, let him read the Creole case, and dismiss his vain and credulous hopes.*

I come, now, to the case of the Creole—the immediate subject of the correspondence which we have been examining—and shall be brief upon it. I take the case itself, from the account of it given in January last by the Secretary of State to our minister in London, instructing him to demand satisfaction for that outrage from the Government of Great Britain. This is his statement, and part of his instructions to Mr. Everett:

"The Creole was passing from one port of the United States to another, in a voyage perfectly lawful, with merchandise on board, and also with slaves, or persons bound to service, natives of America, and belonging to American citizens, and which are recognised as property by the Constitution of the United States in those States in which slavery exists. In the course of the voyage, some of the slaves rose upon the master and crew, subdued them, murdered one man, and caused the vessel to be carried into Nassau. The vessel was thus taken to a British port—not voluntarily, by those who had the lawful authority over her; but forcibly and violently, against the master's will, and with the consent of nobody but the mutineers and murderers; for there is no evidence that these outrages were committed with the concurrence of any of the slaves, except those actually engaged in them. Under these circumstances, it would seem to have been the plain and obvious duty of the authorities at Nassau, the port of a friendly power, to assist the American consul in putting an end to the captivity of the master and crew, restoring to them the control of the vessel, and enabling them to resume their voyage, and to take the mutineers and murderers to their own country to answer for their crimes before the proper tribunal. One cannot conceive how any other course could justly be adopted, or how the duties imposed by that part of the code regulating the intercourse of friendly States, which is generally called the comity of nations, could otherwise be fulfilled. Here was no violation of British law attempted or intended on the part of the master of the Creole, nor any infringement of the principles of the law of nations. The vessel was lawfully engaged in passing from port to port in the United States. By violence and crime she was carried, against the master's will, out of her course, and into the port of a friendly power. All was the result of force. Certainly, ordinary comity and hospitality entitled him to such assistance from the authorities of the place as should enable him to resume and prosecute his voyage, and bring the offenders to justice. But, instead of this, if the facts be as represented in these papers, not only did the authorities give no aid for any such purpose, but they did actually interfere to set free the slaves, and to enable them to disperse themselves beyond the reach of the master of the vessel or their owners. A proceeding like this cannot but cause deep feeling in the United States.

"It has been my purpose to write you at length upon this subject, in order that you might lay before the Government of her Majesty, fully, and without reserve, the views entertained upon it by that of the United States, and the grounds on which those views are taken. But the early return of the packet precludes the opportunity of going thus into the case in this despatch; and as Lord Ashburton may shortly be expected here, it may be better to enter fully into it with him, if his powers shall be broad enough to embrace it. Some knowledge of the case will have reached England before his departure; and very probably his Government may have given him instructions. But I request, nevertheless, that you lose no time in calling Lord Aberdeen's attention to it in a general manner, and giving him a narrative of the transaction, such as may be framed from the papers now communicated; with a distinct declaration, that if the facts turn out as stated, this Government thinks it a clear case for indemnification.

"You will avail yourself of an early opportunity of communicating to Lord Aberdeen, in the manner which you may deem most expedient, the substance of this despatch; and you will receive further instructions respecting the case of the Creole, unless it shall become the subject of discussion at Washington.

"In all your communications with her Majesty's Government, you will seek to impress it with a full conviction of the dangerous importance to the peace of the two countries of occurrences of this kind, and the delicate nature of the questions to which they give rise."

This was the case of the Creole, and it is well and clearly stated. Our Secretary writes well, but performs badly. He has well stated this case, and duly supported it by an argument against the legality of the conduct of the Nassau authorities, in favor of the just title of the injured owners to indemnification, and the necessity for a treaty stipulation to prevent the recurrence of cases so dangerous to the peace of the two countries. Mr. Everett was directed to press the case in London: the Secretary undertook to do it here, if Lord Ashburton brought the proper powers with him. The powers were not brought; nor have they been sent, or even sent for! Nothing in the case of the Creole has been done in London; nothing here; and now we are to ratify a treaty from which the whole case has been excluded, and to be content with a correspondence which contains a promise for an engagement which is a derision of our complaints. Five cases like those of the Creole, differing only in degree of atrocity, have occurred. In the two first, there was pecuniary compensation to the injured owners; in none of them has there been reparation to the insulted flag of the United States: and in the three latter, there has not even been a suggestion of indemnifying the owners. Great Britain is evidently assuming higher ground on the subject of slavery; and after the manner in which we have been coerced into a naval and diplomatic alliance against slave takers, and after the quintuple treaty has been

*"What caused the San Domingo insurrection?"

"In order to reply to this question with as much accuracy and precision as the subject will admit, it is necessary to recur to the proceedings of the two associations of which mention was made in the second chapter of this history; namely, the British Association for the Abolition of the Slave-trade, which held its meetings in the OLD JEWRY, in London; and the society called Les Amis des Noirs, in Paris. A short review of the conduct of these societies will serve not only to lessen the surprise which may be felt at the revolt of the negroes of San Domingo, but also to raise a considerable degree of astonishment that the enslaved negroes in the British islands had not given them the example.

"I have observed that the society in London professed to have nothing more in view than to obtain an act of the Legislature for prohibiting the further introduction of African slaves into the British colonies. I have said that they disclaimed all intention of interfering with the Government, and condition of the negroes already in the plantations; publicly declaring their opinion to be, that a general emancipation of those people, in their present state of ignorance and barbarity, instead of a blessing, would prove to them the source of misfortune and misery. But, although such were their ostensible declarations as a public body, the leading members of the society, in the same moment, held a very different language; and even the society itself (acting as such) pursued a line of conduct directly and immediately repugnant to their own professions. Besides using every possible endeavor to inflame the public of Great Britain against the planters, they distributed, at a prodigious expense, throughout the colonies, tracts and pamphlets without number; the direct tendency of which was to render the white inhabitants odious and contemptible in the eyes of their own slaves, and excite in the latter such ideas of their own natural rights and equality of condition as should lead them to a general struggle for freedom, through rebellion and bloodshed.

"In many of those writings, arguments are expressly adduced, in language which cannot be misunderstood, to urge the negroes to rise up and murder their masters without mercy. 'Resistance,' say they, 'is always justifiable where force is the substitute of right; nor is the commission of a civil crime possible in a state of slavery.' These sentiments are repeated in a thousand different forms; and, in order that they might not lose their effect by abstract reasoning, a reverend divine of the Church of England, (Mr. Percival Stockdale,) in a pamphlet addressed to the chairman or president of the society which held its meetings in the OLD JEWRY, (Granville Sharp, esq.) pours forth the most earnest prayers, in the most undisguised expressions, that the negroes would destroy all the white people—men, women, and children—in the West India islands. 'Should we not,' he exclaims, 'approve their conduct in their violence? Should we not crown it with eulogium, if they exterminate their tyrants with fire and sword? Should they even deliberately inflict the most exquisite tortures on those tyrants, would they not be excusable in the moral judgment of those who properly value those inestimable blessings—rational and religious liberty?'

"Besides distributing pamphlets of this complexion gratis, at the doors of all the churches and places of worship in the kingdom, and throughout the colonies, the society, or persons in their name, caused a medal to be struck, containing the figure of a naked negro, loaded with chains, and in the attitude of imploring mercy; thousands of which were also dispersed among the negroes in each of the sugar islands, for the instruction, I presume, of such of them as could not read. But, unhappily, this instance of provident caution was not requisite; for, so many negro domestics return annually from Europe to the West Indies as constantly furnish a sufficient number of living instructors; and, certain it is (I pronounce it from my own knowledge respecting Jamaica) that the labors of the society on their behalf, as well as many of the most violent speeches in the British Parliament, wherein the whole body of the planters were painted as a herd of bloodthirsty and remorseless tyrants, were explained to the negro slaves, in terms well adapted to their capacities, and suited, as might have been supposed, to their feelings. It will be difficult to say what other measures the OLD JEWRY associates could have taken to excite a rebellion, except that of furnishing the objects of their solicitude with fire-arms and ammunition."—Edwards's History of the West Indies.

*Since the conference between Lord Ashburton and the executive committee of the Foreign and American Anti-slavery Society, let him read the account of that, or even the following part of it:

"Lord Ashburton went into an explanation of the 10th article, and mentioned several particulars of the discussion that took place, both on that topic, and others relating to slaves. With regard to the case of the slave Hackett, he did not know all the facts. Sir Charles Bagot was known to him, and he did not believe he would do anything intentionally wrong. But he had just entered upon his duties, and was probably desirous, at that juncture, of promoting good feeling with his great neighbor. The fact that the slave had taken his master's watch, was a circumstance that probably went against him. 'Had he only taken the horse,' said Lord A. (looking at Gerrit Smith, significantly, though he could not be supposed ever to have read the advice of that gentleman to fugitive slaves,) 'he would not, probably, have been surrendered; for you know the horse was necessary for his escape.' Lord Ashburton said that, in framing the 10th article, great care had been taken to provide that inferior magistrates in Canada should have no authority to surrender fugitives, as had been urged by the other party; and that only the governor himself could perform an act of so great importance. Great care would be taken, he had no doubt, to protect the innocent; and that the taking of any article necessary to effect an escape would not be considered felonious. He said the friends of the slave in England would be very WATCHFUL to see that no wrong practice took place under the 10th article."

shown to us, there is no knowing what is in store for the slave possessors.

Sir, I hold that the honor of the Senate as a body, and the honor of the greater part of the Senators now present individually, is concerned in the settlement of this Creole case, and the others of the same class. We have done what involves our honor. We adopted resolutions on this subject—strong and just resolutions—and adopted them unanimously. They declare this conduct of the British local authorities to be a violation of the law of nations, and highly unjust to our citizens: and these resolutions, and the speeches in support of them, were forwarded to London, to be used by Mr. Everett in pressing the unsettled cases. Both the resolutions and speeches seem to have been disregarded in London: shall they be disregarded here? disregarded by the Senate which passed them, and by the Senators who spoke and voted for them? Here is the paragraph of the Secretary's letter which informs us of the transmission of these resolutions and speeches to London, to be laid before the British ministry:

"You are acquainted with the correspondence which took place a few years ago, between the American and English Governments, respecting the cases of the Enterprise, the Comet, and the Encomium. I call your attention to the Journal of the Senate of the United States, containing resolutions unanimously adopted by that body respecting those cases. These resolutions, I believe, have already been brought to the notice of her Majesty's Government; but it may be well that both the resolutions themselves, and the debates upon them, should be again adverted to. You will find the resolutions, of course, among the documents regularly transmitted to the legation, and the debates in the newspapers with which it has also been supplied from this department."

And here are the resolutions themselves:

"Resolved, That a ship or vessel on the high seas, in time of peace, engaged in a lawful voyage, is, according to the laws of nations, under the exclusive jurisdiction of the State to which her flag belongs;—as much so as if constituting a part of her own domain.

"Resolved, That if such ship or vessel should be forced by stress of weather, or other unavoidable cause, into the port and under the jurisdiction of a friendly power, she and her cargo, and the persons on board, with their property, and all the rights belonging to their personal relations, as established by the laws of the State to which they belong, would be placed under the protection which the laws of nations extend to the unfortunate under such circumstances

"Resolved, That the brig Enterprise, which was forced, unavoidably, by stress of weather, into Port Hamilton, Bermuda island, while on a lawful voyage on the high seas, from one part of the Union to another, comes within the principles embraced by the foregoing resolutions; and that the seizure and detention of the negroes on board, by the local authority of the island, was an act in violation of the laws of nations, and highly unjust to our own citizens to whom they belong."

I was not one of those who spoke in favor of these resolutions; I was satisfied with the speech of the mover, [Mr. CALHOUN,] and voted for them with a cordial good will. I deemed them correct then: I deem them so now. I consider all the cases of the Comet, the Encomium, the Enterprise, the Creole, and the Hermosa, to have been violations of the laws of nations, a breach of good neighborhood, and a contempt for our Government. I cannot vote for the ratification of a treaty which refuses the slightest notice of these outrages, and remits us, for our "satisfaction," to the illusory stipulations of an empty and preposterous "engagement." I stand by the resolutions; and shall offer an amendment to this treaty, to transfer their substance to its pages, and vindicate the rights of our vessels, under the laws of nations, as resolved by the Senate. [The amendment was offered, and rejected.*]

Sir, this offence against our ships and citizens is one of recent origin, but of increasing frequency, and of augmenting atrocity. It is evidently a part of the abolition crusade against slavery, and tends to excite insurrection and servile war in our country. The first case occurred in the year 1830: it was that of the Comet, which was stranded near the island of New Providence, and carried a wreck into Nassau, her slaves liberated, and the protest of the owners disregarded. These slaves were paid for. The next was that of the Encomium, in 1834—the same in all respects as the Comet, and with the same results: the owners of the slaves being eventually paid by the British Government. The third case was that of the Enterprise, whose fate was the subject of our resolves. It occurred in 1835; and was the case of a ship driven by tempest into the island of Bermuda, her slaves liberated, and the protest of the owners disregarded. For this outrage no atonement or compensation has been made, notwithstanding our brave resolutions, and their imposing communication to the British Government. Then came two cases together, worse than all the previous ones—the Creole, in January, 1842, and the Hermosa immediately after—cases, the one of mutiny, piracy, and murder; the other, of violence on the part of wreckers. For these two outrages, as well as for that of the Enterprise, no indemnity or redress of any kind has been made. Pecuniary compensation to the owners—an inadequate redress to them, and no atonement to our insulted sovereignty—granted in the two first cases, is denied in the three last: and the go-by which has been given to the whole subject in this mission of peace, and the "satisfaction" expressed by the President, on behalf of the country, at this termination of the business, must, if sanctioned by the Senate, operate as an act of oblivion upon past outrages, and an invitation to the commission of new ones. At the same time, 12,000 slaves are allured into Canada; and no limit is seen to the number which will go, under the inducements which are held out, and the new rendezvous which the consolidation of British power on the frontiers of Maine will present. The South, left alone by the separate treaty now made for the Northern States, and with the sympathies of half the Union and all the world against her, must now expect greater outrages than ever, in all that relates to her slave property. The British have now evidently constituted themselves the guardians and protectors of our slaves; and, while our three millions of black slaves are better fed, better clothed, better lodged, less worked, have more liberty, more knowledge, and speak better English, than the same number of her English population, (laborers and paupers)—to say nothing of the poor Irish, Scotch, Asiatics, and others,—while this is the difference, to the disadvantage of her own white subjects, all her sympathies are in exercise for our blacks! Is it humanity, or policy, that works in this strange way? Is it love of the slave, or the hatred of the master, that works in this way?

The term South, as indicating the slave-holding region in this Union, is now become a term of enlarged and extended application, and is fast shifting to the West. But lately applied to five Atlantic, it now includes seven transmontane States; the former decreasing; the latter increasing. The five Atlantic slave States lose fifteen Representatives under the late census: the seven Western gain eight. Their relative strength is now about equal. At the census of 1850, that of the Western seven must greatly preponderate; and, after that period, the gap between them must go on increasing, in the double ratio of the loss in one and the gain in the other. The slave interest, already equalling in the great West that of the Atlantic, must soon find its chief seat there; and it behooves the Representatives from that quarter to attend in time to what must soon become a chief subject of their care. The liberation of slaves from wrecked vessels among the Bahama islands, is but a branch of a vast system; but it is a branch of it which addresses itself directly to the slave States of the Valley of the Mississippi. The passage through these British islands is their line of communication with the Atlantic States, with the high seas, and with the whole world. They cannot tolerate the insecurity of that passage, either for themselves or their property. Rather they should say of that passage, and of the gulf from which it leads, as the Romans said of the Mediterranean—mare nostrum! and act upon the assumption. The masters of the Mississippi should command the outlet from the rex fluviorum. As a Senator from that great region, I feel the responsibilities of my position, and the gravity of the circumstances which surround us. The pretension to liberate slaves between New Orleans and the Atlantic States, is a blow at the Great West—one blow out of many which the anti-slave allies are preparing for her. This treaty, by shirking the question, sanctions that pretension; and I feel bound to oppose it. A treaty of peace, as it is called—the fruit of a mission sent out to settle everything—the approved of a Southern President: it still leaves unsettled the large question which concerns the twelve States which stretch from the Atlantic to the Missouri, and from the 39th parallel of north latitude to the Gulf. Such a question, affecting so many States, and so pregnant of war, deserved to be settled—deserved something very different from ignominious exclusion from the treaty, and derisory dismission to the safeguard of a correspondence and an engagement. The peace mission has put this question, and the subject of which it is part, on the high road to war. To go with the British to Africa, to fight for slaves, while the British are liberating, enticing away, and exciting to revolt our slaves at home, is to commit a folly of which the fruit must be shame and resentment, and all their disastrous effects.

The case of the Caroline, to which I now proceed, completes the list of the seven subjects which the President informs us occupied the attention of the negotiators. He does not tell us that no other subject occupied their deliberations; and the want of protocols disables us from knowing. I should like to know whether the assumption of the State debts, or any provision or guaranty for their payment, constituted any part of the objects of the special mission. If they did, we ought to know it; and to know what was demanded on one side, and what was promised or denied on the other. Informality of the conference will make no difference. Everything was informal in this anomalous negotiation. Wat Tyler never hated the ink-horn worse than our Secretary-negotiator hated it upon this occasion. It was only after a thing was finished, that the pen was resorted to; and then merely to record the agreement, and put a face upon it for the public eye. In this way many things may have been discussed, which leave no written trace behind them; and it would be a curious circumstance if so large a subject, and one so delicate as the State debts, should find itself in that predicament. In the absence of all evidence, I have no right to an opinion on the point; but, as a Senator, and a part of the treaty-making power, I have a right to know the facts; and shall submit a call upon the President for that purpose. [The call was submitted, but not acted upon for want of time.]

The Caroline is the last of the seven subjects in the arrangement which I make of them. I reserve it for the last; the extreme ignominy of its termination making it, in my opinion, the natural conclusion of a disgraceful negotiation. It is a case in which all the sources of national degradation seem to have been put in requisition:—diplomacy; legislation; the judiciary; and even the military. To volunteer propitiations to Great Britain, and to deprecate her wrath, seem to have been the sole concern of the Administration, when signal reparation was due from her to us.

The case of the Caroline is now near four years old. It occurred in December of the year 1838, under Mr. Van Buren's administration; but it was not until March, 1841, and until the new Administration was in power, that the question assumed its high character of a quarrel between the United States and Great Britain. Before that time, the outrage upon the Caroline was only the act of the individuals engaged in it. The arrest of one of these individuals brought out the British Government. She assumed the offence; alleged the outrage to have been perpetrated by her authority; and demanded the release of McLeod, under the clear implication of a national threat if he was not surrendered.* The release was demanded unconditionally—not the slightest apology or atonement being offered for the outrage on the Caroline, out of which the arrest of McLeod grew. The arrogant demand of the British was delivered to the new Secretary of State on the 12th day of March. Instead of refusing to answer under a threat, he answered the sooner; and, in his answer, went far beyond what the minister [Mr. Fox] had demanded. He despatched the Attorney General of the United States to New York, to act as counsel for McLeod; he sent a Major General of the United States army along with him, to give emphasis to his presence; and he gave a false version to the law of nations, which would not only cover the McLeod case, but all succeeding cases of the same kind. I consider all this the work of the State Department; for General Harrison was too new in his office, too much overwhelmed by the army of applicants who besieged him and soon destroyed his life, to have the time to study the questions to which the arrest of McLeod, and the demand for his release, and the assumption of his crime by the British Government,

*Amendment offered by Mr. BENTON to the British treaty:

"That a vessel of the United States, engaged in a lawful voyage, and driven by tempest, or carried by violence, or forced by necessity, into a British West India port, during peace with Great Britain, shall be received with the hospitality due to misfortune, and be allowed to depart with all convenient despatch, and with all her contents of persons and property."

*"But, be that as it may, her Majesty's Government formally demand, upon the grounds already stated, the immediate release of Mr. McLeod; and her Majesty's Government entreat the President of the United States to take into his most deliberate consideration the serious nature of the consequences which must ensue from a rejection of this demand."

all gave rise. Such questions were of necessity left to the State Department; and as the acts of that department, I consider all that was done in relation to McLeod in the month of March, 1841. It was in that month that the case reversed the aspect under which our Government had viewed it; received its new direction; and commenced the course which has just received the disgraceful termination which the President has communicated.

McLeod had been arrested in the month of December, 1840, while Mr. Van Buren was still President; and a demand was then made for his release. The release was refused; and all interference with the State courts declined. The answer to this effect, given by Mr. Forsyth, Secretary of State, to Mr. Fox, was read in the two Houses of Congress in January, 1841, and received unanimous approbation. Soon after, the decision of the New York court was given, and was to the same effect; and thus, at that period, the President, the two Houses of Congress, and a State court, were all of one opinion—that the assumption of his offence by his Government made no difference to McLeod; that he was responsible to the State laws for crossing the boundary to commit murder and arson; that the two countries being at peace, it was not a military, but a piratical expedition; that the assumption of his offence only added another to the list of offenders, without giving the first a right to immunity; and that the Government of the United States would interfere in no way in the State administration of justice. Reversing all this, the United States Attorney General was sent to defend McLeod;* a general officer sent with him; his release solicited of the State; an appeal ordered to be taken in his behalf to the Supreme Court of the United States; a new version of the laws of nations prepared for the occasion; and every preparation made, and every step taken, to propitiate the British for the arrest of a subject, without exacting any reparation from them for the invasion of our territory, the murder of our citizens, and conflagration of a vessel at anchor in the waters of her own country.

These proceedings took place in the brief interval between the accession of the new Administration to power, in March, and the meeting of the extraordinary session of Congress in the month of May following. Of course they were all communicated to Congress at that session; and, as they were wrong in themselves, and contradictory to the course taken and approved during Mr. Van Buren's administration, they received the severest reprehension. The Republican members condemned them in a body; and the measures for the release of McLeod, under the new reading of the law of nations, became the eminent subject of animadversion. The friends of the new Administration, having both the facts and the law clearly against them, took lofty ground in another direction. They assumed a Roman attitude; declared it to be unbecoming a great nation to punish the subject, when the sovereign assumed the offence; cited Roman maxims and examples to show that the magnanimous way was to dismiss the instrument, and seize the chief; and they were profuse in their undertakings for the Roman manner in which Messrs. Tyler and Webster would hold the British Crown to account, after washing their hands of the wretch McLeod.† The Republicans put no faith in all these fine professions. They believed it was all a pretext to get out of a difficulty; that, what between love and fear of the British, the Federal party was unwilling to punish McLeod, or to see him punished by the State of New York; that the design was to get rid of responsibility, by getting rid of the man; and, that when he was gone, we should hear no more of these new Romans calling his sovereign to account. This was the opinion of the Democracy, very freely expressed at the time; and so it has all turned out to be. McLeod was acquitted, and got off; the British Government became responsible, on the Administration's own principles; they have not been held to that responsibility; no atonement or apology has been made for the national outrage at Schlosser; and the President informs us that no further complaint, on account of this aggression on the soil and sovereignty of the Union, and the lives of its citizens, is to be made! The message is in these words:

"The destruction of the steamboat Caroline at Schlosser, four or five years ago, occasioned no small degree of excitement at the time, and became the subject of correspondence between the two Governments. That correspondence, having been suspended for a considerable period, was renewed in the spring of the last year; but, no satisfactory result having been arrived at, it was thought proper, though the occurrence had ceased to be fresh and recent, not to omit attention to it on the present occasion. It has only been so far discussed, in the correspondence now submitted, as it was accomplished by a violation of the territory of the United States. The letter of the British minister, while he attempts to justify that violation upon the ground of a pressing and overruling necessity—admitting, nevertheless, that, even if justifiable, an apology was due for it—and accompanying this acknowledgment with assurances of the sacred regard of his Government for the inviolability of national territory, has seemed to me sufficient to warrant forbearance from any further remonstrance against what took place as an aggression on the soil and territory of this country."

This paragraph, from the message of the 9th of August, is a pretty faithful transcript from Mr. Webster's note to Lord Ashburton of the 6th; and as it is more satisfactory to comment on the original than on the copy, I will read that original, and reserve my comments for it:

'Understanding these principles alike, the difference between the two Governments is only whether the facts in the case of the 'Caroline' make out a case of such necessity for the purpose of self-defence. Seeing that the transaction is not recent, having happened in the time of one of his predecessors; seeing that your Lordship, in the name of your Government, solemnly declares that no slight or disrespect was intended to the sovereign authority of the United States; seeing that it is acknowledged that, whether justifiable or not, there was yet a violation of the territory of the United States, and that you are instructed to say that your Government consider that as a most serious occurrence; seeing, finally, that it is now admitted that an explanation and apology for this violation was due at the time, the President is content to receive these acknowledgments and assurances in the conciliatory spirit which marks your Lordship's letter, and will make this subject, as a complaint of violation of territory, the topic of no further discussion between the two Governments."

I pretermit the remarks upon the doctrines of this letter for the present, for the purpose of looking into its statement of facts. The letter, very clearly, intends to induce the public to believe that there has been an apology made to the United States by Great Britain for the invasion, the murder, and the arson committed upon us at Schlosser; when the fact is, no such apology has been made, and the correspondence shows it. To that correspondence, then, we have recourse to settle this question of fact; and this is quickly done. It happens that there are three notes upon this subject: a brief one of the 27th of July, from the American to the British negotiator; a letter of some length from Lord Ashburton, in answer, of the 28th of the same month; and a brief rejoinder to it, in a note of the 6th of August, from Mr. Webster. In this narrow compass lie all the facts of this supposed apology; and I propose to set them out with the brevity, precision, and fairness which are due to the occasion. The opening note of the American negotiator of the 27th of July, contains a vital declaration on this point. It says that, up to that day, no atonement, or even apology, had been made by the British Government for this outrage; and asks his Lordship's grave attention to it. His note is in these words:

'That act is, of itself, a wrong, and an offence to the sovereignty and the dignity of the United States—being a violation of their soil and territory; a wrong for which, to this day, no atonement, or even apology, has been made by her Majesty's Government. Your Lordship cannot but be aware that self-respect, the consciousness of independence and national equality, and a sensitiveness to whatever may touch the honor of the country—a sensitiveness which this Government will ever feel and ever cultivate—make this a matter of high importance; and I must be allowed to ask for it your Lordship's grave consideration."

This note is conclusive on the question of the apology up to the day of its date, which was very near the termination of the special mission. The date was the 27th of July. It is also pointed and urgent in calling the special minister's grave attention to a wrong which he properly qualifies as an offence to the sovereignty and dignity of the United States. The minister does, in fact, promptly give his attention to this call; for on the next day, (July 28th) he writes an elaborate letter of justification of the outrage, intermixed with such phrases of civility as might stand for what they are worth to the American Government, but which he took care should stand for nothing with respect to his own. Unluckily, however, for the American negotiator, whose note was so pressing and pointed, he shows that the Administration was already satisfied with the verbal "explanations" which he had offered; and that it was to get something for publication, and to satisfy the public mind, that the note was now addressed to him! All this is very unlucky for the Secretary-negotiator, (whose note would otherwise have been considered as being in a very proper spirit;) but, taken in the sense of an attempt to get something for the public, after the Administration was satisfied with explanations, (verbal, of course; for there were no protocols,) and the thing assumes an awkward countenance. But let us hear his Lordship. He says:

"The note you did me the honor of addressing me the 27th instant, reminds me that, however disposed your Government might be to be satisfied with the explanations which it has been my duty to offer, the natural anxiety of the public mind requires that these explanations should be more durably recorded in our correspondence; and you send me a copy of your note to Mr. Fox, her Britannic Majesty's minister here, and an extract from the speech of the President of the United States to Congress, at the opening of the present session, as a ready mode of presenting the view entertained on this subject by the Government of the United States."

Here his Lordship explains the reason of this correspondence; and shows it to be, like all the rest of the correspondence in this strange negotiation, an afterpiece, got up after the negotiators were of accord, and only intended to satisfy the curiosity of the public. His Lordship proceeds then with great good nature, weighing, measuring, and counting his words, and evidently determined to go as far as he possibly could to accomplish the Secretary's design, without committing his Government to anything. He, therefore, delivers phrases in this wise, for the Secretary to show to the people.

"Nearly five years are now passed since this occurrence; there has been time for the public to deliberate upon it calmly; and I believe I may take it to be the opinion of candid and honorable men, that the British officers who executed this transaction, and their Government who approved it, intended no slight or disrespect to the sovereign authority of the United States. That they intended no such disrespect, I can most solemnly affirm; and I trust it will be admitted that no inference to the contrary can fairly be drawn, even by the most susceptible in points of national honor."

*"Having consulted with the Governor, you will proceed to Lockport, or wherever else the trial may be holden, and furnish the prisoner's counsel with the evidence of which you will be in possession material to his defence. You will see that he have skilful and eminent counsel, if such be not already retained; and although you are not desired to act as counsel yourself, you will cause it to be signified to him, and to the gentleman who may conduct his defence, that it is the wish of this Government that, in case his defence be overruled by the court in which he shall be tried, proper steps be taken immediately for removing the cause, by writ of error, to the Supreme Court of the United States."—Mr. Webster's Instructions to Mr. Crittenden, March 15, 1841.

† "You (the British Government) now avow the destruction of the Caroline as a public act of military and naval force, done under your authority.

"Henceforward, McLeod and others, who acted under your orders, must stand excused in the eye of the law. Let the courts, in the exercise of the jurisdiction which of right belongs to them, allow his plea of immunity and discharge; but we hold you responsible in his place, through all those modes of international redress which the code of nations has provided for the prosecution or vindication of national rights. The American people—and here (said Mr. R.) I use, in part, the very words of the answer returned by the Secretary of State—not distrustful of their ability to redress public wrongs by public means, are incapable of the poor revenge of pursuing an individual for a national offence, in which he was but the instrument of his Government.

"Mr. RIVES appealed to the Senate—to the sentiment of American pride—to that Roman spirit which, be believed, yet survived in the bosome of his countrymen—to say whether such a reply was not worthy of the country and the Government? 'Parcere subjectis et debellare superbos" was the dictate of a lofty and magnanimous spirit, whether in individuals or in States. Historians have recorded the conduct of the Roman Senate, on the occasion of their ambassador being killed by the subjects of Demetrius, one of the most powerful princes of antiquity. Demetrius delivered up the perpetrators of the act to the Romans; but the Senate, suspecting that he had connived at or encouraged the crime, immediately sent back the individual offenders, notifying Demetrius that they would hold the sovereign, and not the subject, responsible. Is it in following the example of that proud republic that the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania finds a ground for imputing to the Administration, in the case of McLeod, a want of proper national tone and spirit?

"The Senator from Pennsylvania may dismiss his apprehensions that the honor of the country will be compromised in the hands of those to whom the nation has intrusted its keeping. The Chief Magistrate, who now so worthily fills the place of the lamented Harrison, has given, in a life of honorable and patriotic service, pledges on which the country can repose. He has announced the maxims of his policy towards foreign powers in terms which cannot but command the universal assent—to render justice to all, submitting to injustice from none; and, while sedulously cultivating the relations of peace and amity with the rest of the world, esteeming it 'his most imperative duty to see that the honor of the country shall sustain no blemish.' To these sentiments of the President, we find a faithful echo in the language of the Secretary of State, in the close of his letter to Mr Fox.

"'This republic does not wish to disturb the tranquillity of the world. Its object is peace—its policy, peace. But still it is jealous of its rights, and, among others, and most especially, of the right of the absolute immunity of its territory from aggression from abroad; and these rights it is the duty and determination of this Government fully, and at all times, to maintain; while it will, at the same time, as scrupulously refrain from infringing on the rights of others.'

"In sentiments such as these, we have an abundant guaranty that nothing will be done or suffered by the present Administration which shall strike us from the high rank among the nations where the virtuous struggles of our ancestors have placed us; and that it will steadily pursue the noble and comprehensive rule of action laid down by one of our early and most illustrious Presidents—to merit the character of a just, and to maintain that of an independent, nation; preferring every consequence to insult and habitual wrong."—Mr. Rives's speech, in reply to Mr. Buchanan.

"Although it is believed that a candid and impartial consideration of the whole history of this unfortunate event will lead to the conclusion that there were grounds of justification as strong as were ever presented in such cases; and, above all, that no slight of the authority of the United States was ever intended; yet, it must be admitted that there was, in the hurried execution of this necessary service, a violation of territory; and I am instructed to assure you that her Majesty's Government consider this as a most serious fact; and that, far from thinking that an event of this kind should be lightly risked, they would unfeignedly deprecate its recurrence. Looking back to what passed at this distance of time, what is, perhaps, most to be regretted, is, that some explanation and apology for this occurrence was not immediately made. This, with a frank explanation of the necessity of the case, might, and probably would, have prevented much of the exasperation, and of the subsequent complaints and recriminations to which it gave rise."

* * * * *

"I trust, sir, I may now be permitted to hope that all feelings of resentment and ill-will resulting from these truly unfortunate events, may be buried in oblivion; and that they may be succeeded by those of harmony and friendship, which it is certainly the interest, and, I also believe, the inclination of all to promote."

This is the extent, and the whole extent, to which the special minister, with all his politeness and good nature, and with all his desire to furnish the Administration with something to satisfy the public, could possibly go. The only thing which I see him instructed by his Government to say, or which in itself amounts to a positive declaration, is the averment that her Majesty's Government "considers it a most serious fact" that, in the hurried execution of this necessary service, a violation of the United States territory was committed. This is admitted to be a fact!—a serious fact!—and a most serious fact! But as for any sorrow for it, or apology for it, or promise not to commit such serious facts again, or even not to be so hurried the next time,—this is what the minister nowhere says, or insinuates. On the contrary, just the reverse is declared; for the justification of this "most serious fact," as being the result of a hurried execution of a "necessary service," is an explicit averment that the aforesaid "most serious fact" will be repeated just so often as her Majesty's Government shall deem it necessary to her service. As to the polite declaration that no disrespect was intended to the United States while invading its territory, killing its citizens, setting a steamboat on fire, and sending her in flames over the falls of Niagara,—such a declaration is about equivalent to telling a man that you mean him no disrespect while cudgelling him with both hands over the head and shoulders.

But, apology! the word "apology" is actually mentioned in the minister's letter; and, being there—no matter how, or for what purpose, or with what qualifications—it is seized, first by the Secretary, and then by the President; its meaning changed on each occasion, by omitting the qualifications; and then presented to the people of the United States as an actual admitted apology due from the British Government to ours. But, let us see this word, how the minister uses it, and how far its meaning is altered in the subsequent production and reproduction which it has undergone. The minister says: "What is, perhaps, most to be regretted, is, that some explanation or apology for this occurrence was not immediately made." The Secretary renders the same sentence thus: "It is now admitted that an explanation and apology for the violation was due at the time." And the President, when it comes to his turn to produce this important apology, does it with a variation from both Secretary and minister, thus: "admitting, nevertheless, that, even if justifiable, an apology was due for it." What a strange metamorphosis the minister's meaning is made to undergo in this double transmutation! He sets out with a "perhaps;" which makes all that follows conditional. This vital qualification is omitted both by the Secretary and President, and a positive admission is substituted in its place. The minister then goes on to suggest it as a circumstance to be regretted, that some explanation or apology was not immediately given; evidently showing, by the form of expression, and the remainder of the sentence, that this little explanation or apology might have prevented exasperation, and therefore have been a politic thing. All this the Secretary changes into an admission of an apology due at the time; and the President, leaving out the last qualification as to time, simply repeats it as an admission that an apology was due. Now the minister has never admitted that an apology was due, at anytime whatever; but only as a matter of policy he thinks, perhaps, it is to be regretted that some little explanation or apology was not made at the time, to prevent exasperation—not to atone for the outrage, but to quiet the popular feeling in America. This is the extent of the minister's kindness in furnishing our Administration with something to show to the people; and a most unworthy return they have made for his civility, by garbling his expressions, omitting his qualifications, changing his language, and altering his meaning.*

Even if the minister had used the expressions attributed to him by the Secretary, it would have amounted to nothing. National apologies are not made in that style. The man must be but little versed in the etiquette of nations, and in the rules of international intercourse, not to know that the delivery of an apology from one nation to another is an act of the highest solemnity, reduced to the utmost precision, unmixed with anything else, and evidenced by the most authentic forms.† It is an informal treaty. The terms of it, and the acceptance, are agreed upon before. The delivery and the acceptance are made with the formalities of the exchange of the ratifications of a treaty, and, pro tanto, have the same effect. They put an end forever to all discussion upon the subject which has given rise to the apology. These apologies are of rare occurrence among nations. We have had one instance of this species of reparation being made to our Government, (and but one, that I know of,) in the sixty years of our existence; and that was in an analogous case to the outrage at Schlosser, and from the same party; it was the apology of the British Government for the attack on the Chesapeake—an attack differing in the degree of the outrage, but not in its character, from the attack on the Caroline. For this outrage the Prince Regent of Great Britain "ordered" an apology to be made to the United States, and it was made in the proper and formal manner known to the intercourse of nations. His minister at Washington (Mr. Foster) delivered it in these words:

"In pursuance of the orders which I have received from his Royal Highness the Prince Regent, in the name and on the behalf of his Majesty, for the purpose of proceeding to a final adjustment of the differences which have arisen between Great Britain and the United States in the affair of the Chesapeake frigate, I have the honor to acquaint you:

"FIRST: I am authorized to repeat to the American Government the prompt disavowal made by his Majesty on being apprized of the unauthorized act of the officer in command of his naval forces on the coast of America, whose recall from a highly important and honorable command immediately ensued, as a mark of his Majesty's disapprobation.

"SECONDLY: I am authorized to offer, in addition to that disavowal on the part of his Royal Highness, the immediate restoration, as far as circumstances will admit, of the men who, in consequence of Admiral Berkeley's orders, were forcibly taken out of the Chesapeake, to the vessel from which they were taken; or, if that ship should be no longer in commission, to such seaport of the United States as the American Government may name for the purpose.

"THIRDLY: I am also authorized to offer to the American Government a suitable pecuniary compensation for the sufferers in consequence of the attack on the Chesapeake, including the families of those seamen who, unfortunately, fell in the action, and the wounded survivors.

"These honorable propositions, I can assure you, sir, are made with the sincere desire that they may prove satisfactory to the Government of the United States; and I trust they will meet with that amicable reception which their conciliatory nature entitles them to. I need scarcely add how cordially I join with you in the wish that they may prove introductory to the removal of all differences depending between our two countries."

This was an apology from one nation to another, made in the name, on the behalf, and by the order of the Prince Regent of Great Britain. Nothing ambiguous, qualified, or miscellaneous about it; nothing equivocal, or conditional, but direct and single, confined to its object, digested into articles, and freely given. It was delivered to the American Secretary of State, Mr. Monroe, on the first day of November, 1811; accepted by him in the name and on the behalf of the President of the United States on the next day; and being so given and accepted, it put an end to the complaints on the subject of the Chesapeake. Though war was declared eight months afterwards, this subject was not one of its causes, and was not mentioned in the message and reports which led to its declaration. After this—after such an example of an apology exacted from the same power, and in an analogous case—are the American people to be bamboozled with the story of an apology in the letter of Lord Ashburton?

The celebrated Dr. Johnson was accustomed to say that there was a certain amount of gullibility in the public mind, which must be provided for. It would seem that our Secretary negotiator had possessed himself of this idea, and charged himself with the duties under it, and had determined to make full provision for all the gullibility now extant. He has certainly provided quantum sufficit of humbuggery in this treaty, and in his correspondence in defence of it, to gorge the stomachs of all the gulls of the present generation, both in Europe and America.

No, sir. No apology is made, or intended to be be made, for this outrage. So far from it, the British Government and people are lavishing rewards upon the perpetrators. McNab is knighted! Drew, promoted! the wounded are pensioned; all are honored! In this very moment, while humbling ourselves in a correspondence, disgracing ourselves in a treaty, and truckling in an act of Congress to propitiate Great Britain, and to satisfy her for the arrest of McLeod,—in this very instant, the ringleaders in the cowardly midnight aggression are complimented for it in the capital of the British empire, and in the face of all Europe. A public dinner, presided at by a Duke, (the Duke of Richmond,) attended by a long list of peers of the realm, members of Parliament, and officers of the army and navy, is given to McNab and Drew. Speeches and toasts are lavished upon them, as upon heroes who have won immortal honor. The sneaking, cowardly, midnight assassin attack by a detachment of the army and navy of Great Britain upon a defenceless steamboat, tied to the shore, and her people all asleep—and this to the cry of no quarter—is placed upon a level, in these speeches and toasts, with the great actions which have illustrated the arms of Britain's greatest heroes.* An action

*The London papers have noticed, with severe commentaries, this assumption of our Secretary to have received an apology when none was made, and in which our President was so unfortunate as to follow him.

*DINNER TO SIR ALLEN MCNAB.

At the entertainment given by the British American Association to Col. Sir A. McNab, at the Thatched-house tavern, St. James's street, on Friday evening, July 15, covers were laid for nearly 100 gentlemen.

The Duke of Richmond, who filled the chair, was supported on the right by Sir A. McNab, Sir F. Burdett, Bart., M. P., the Right Hon. Sir G. Murray, Sir D. McDougall, Sir John Osborn, Bart., Sir R. Barclay, Bart., Sir J. Duke, M. P., Mr. Masterman, M. P.; and on the left by Lord Aylmer, the Earl of Dunmore, Lord Dunboyne, Sir P. Maitland, Sir W. Ogilvie, Bart., Sir Francis B. Head, Bart., Sir J. Hay, Bart., Sir G. Jackson, and James Holford, Esq.

Sir R. Broun officiated as vice president.

Among the other distinguished persons present, were Lord Winterton, Mr. Malcomb, Mr. Sheriff, Mr. Andrews, Mr. Robertson, Mr. Archibald, Mr. Tulloch, Mr. Urquhart, Mr. Rose, Drs. Bell, Ifill, Mortimer, and Chisholme, Captain Randolph, R. N., Captain Moorsom, Captain Kerr, Mr. Bukerfield, Mr. Dodd, M. P., Mr. O Gore, M. P., Mr. Baldwin, M. P., Mr. Ogden, Attorney General for Eastern Canada, General Alexander, Captain Drew, R. N., Dr. Rolph, Mr. Walter, Mr H. Hughes, &c.

Letters were announced from the Marquis of Huntly, the Marquis of Bute, the Earl of Gosford, Lords McDonald, Prudhoe, and Seaton, Sir G. Cockburn, Sir H. Douglas, Sir J. Macdonnell, Sir J. Kempt, and Sir A. McLaine, expressing their regret that absence from town on previous engagements prevented them from being present.

The dinner, with all its adjuncts, displayed great taste and magnificence.

The Rev. Dr. Worthing said grace.

After the cloth had been removed,

The noble chairman gave in succession the usual loyal toasts: "Her Majesty the Queen;" "The Queen Dowager;" "His Royal Highness Prince Albert;" and "Albert, Prince of Wales, and the rest of the Royal Family;" which were drunk with three times three.

Sir G Murray said he rose, with the greatest pleasure, to offer his best acknowledgments for the toast which had been just drunk. * * * * * * He alluded with more particular satisfaction to that kind of reward upon the present occasion, because he had the happiness to see near him, on the right hand of the chair, an honorable and gallant countryman of his, [Sir A. McNab,] who had earned for himself in the field a share in that high reward which they bestowed upon military merit. [Cheers.] At a trying and critical moment of affairs in one of the most important members of the British empire, finding himself in a high and distinguished civil situation as Speaker of the House of Assembly, to which he belonged, of itself a sufficient mark of the high esteem in which he was held by his fellow-citizens, he relinquished his civil appointments the moment danger approached, and, rushing into the field, achieved one of those glorious exploits which they all so well remembered, and which was of such especial value at the moment when it occurred. [Loud cheers.]

* * * * * * *

Captain Drew said, he felt it the highest compliment that could be paid to him, to be thought worthy on such an occasion to return thanks on behalf of the navy. [Cheers.]

The noble chairman next rose to propose the health of that gallant and distinguished individual who sat on his right hand. He felt that they owed him a debt of gratitude, which it was not easy for this country to repay. [Cheers.] In times of no ordinary difficulty and danger, he came forward with all the influence of his personal character—an influence which could not have been gained, if his neighbors had not well known that he eminently deserved it—he came forward, resisted and over-which, if lawfully performed in open warfare upon armed enemies, instead of being piratically perpetrated in profound peace upon sleeping victims; an action which, as a military exploit, would have disgraced the military history of the sovereign Abbess of Quedlinburg, (whose contingent to the armies of the German empire was one dragoon and three foot soldiers;) this action is made the theme of every praise, and the subject of every honor. And why? For the sake of the action itself? No. The British are not so poor in military exploits as to seek renown in such a cowardly piece of assassination! Why, then, do they honor, reward, and celebrate it? Because it was a lesson to the people and to the Government of the United States! Because it was a declaration to this Republican Government, that if it was either not able or not willing to restrain its own citizens from going into Canada, the Canadians would restrain them! that they would cross the line and chastise them! and if the United States said a word to the Canadians, Great Britain wou'd chastise the United States! This is the reason. It is because McNab and his crew, in attacking the Caroline, attacked the United States—smote its flag—struck its Government—struck the whole Union—and emphatically said to us, they would chastise our citizens for us, and Great Britain would back them in doing it! It is for this lesson, read in blood and flames to our Government and people, that the assailants of the Caroline are honored. And blind is the American, and dead to his country's honor, who does not see this outrage in this atrocious light.

The fact of this supposed apology being disposed of, I turn to the doctrines which accompanied it, and which I find most abundantly strange. The Secretary adduces, and the President adopts it, as a further reason for dropping the affair of the Caroline, that the outrage was not recent—that it occurred four or five years ago. This seems to be a new application of the principle of statutes of limitation, with short time for it to take effect. Tempus non currit has heretofore been the maxim among nations; and, in the case of the frigate Chesapeake, was rigorously enforced against Great Britain. The attack on that vessel was made on the 22d day of June, 1806: the apology for it was made on the 1st day of November, 1811. Nearly five years and a half had elapsed; but tempus currit, in the case of national outrages, was not then the maxim of our Government. Five years and a half was no bar at that time. Only three years and a half have elapsed in the case of the Caroline; and the outrage is barred by time!

Again: the Secretary adduces, and the President repeats it, as a further reason for dropping the complaint, that the aggression happened in the time of his predecessor. This is true: but is it a reason for not redressing the wrong? In the code of legitimacy in Europe, no notice is taken by the true King, when restored to the throne, of the aggressions upon the nation while the usurpers reigned—such as Napoleon in France, Murat in Naples, Joseph Bonaparte in Spain, and Louis in Holland. Does modern Federalism apply the same principle in the United States? It would seem so, from this adduction as a reason for giving up the complaint—that the outrage happened in the time of Mr. Van Buren! It did so: but by what fatality mention Mr. Van Buren's administration in connexion with this affair, at the risk of reviving the recollection of Mr. Forsyth's noble letter to Mr. Fox, in December, 1840, and contrasting it with the craven epistle of his successor to the same minister in March, 1841? Certainly, this is the first time in the history of our country that a change of administration was supposed to make a change in the rights of the country and the duties of the Government. It was not so formerly, when the apology for the outrage committed on the Chesapeake in Mr. Jefferson's time was redressed in Mr. Madison's. But, change! change! change! was the signal-cry at the election; and, God knows, we have got it—change enough—change in everything, even in the code of public honor, and in the catalogue of national duties.

The jus belli doctrine is another, and the fundamental error of our Secretary and the President. War has its laws and its rights; but they belong to a state of war, and cannot be invoked in time of peace. When Admiral Cockburn, during the late war, sailed up and down the Chesapeake, burning cabins and pillaging hen-roosts,—these acts, though very unbecoming civilized warfare, were still acts done jure belli; that is to say, in right of war. They were shielded by the laws of war; and the Virginia and Maryland courts could not have punished the marauders as offenders against their laws, without contravening the law of nations, and subjecting us to reprisals. But let a British admiral try this conduct in time of peace, and he will soon see that the sovereign's assumption of his offence, and the invocation of the jus belli, would be in vain pleaded when the courts got hold of him. So of this attack on the Caroline: if war had existed between the United States and Great Britain, the laws of war would have shielded it: there being no war, the jus belli is in vain appealed to. The assumption of the act by the Sovereign, has no other effect than to add another to the list of offenders; leaving the offended party to pursue either, or both, as it pleases.* The nation is very silly that, having an ordinary culprit in its hands, which it can punish by due course of law, turns him loose, for the purpose of laying hold of his Sovereign. This might do very well with the warlike Romans, who wanted pretexts for seizing dominions; but it will not do for us, an agricultural and commercial people, who want peace and trade. To admit it, would be to give immunity to all foreigners violating the laws of the States, whom their Sovereigns should choose to shield. The admission of the present Administration, that the attack on the Caroline could be justified under the laws of war, was just as false in point of law, as was a state of war false in point of fact, between the United States and Great Britain at the time. And the pretext of giving up McLeod, for the sake of getting at his Sovereign, was, as everybody knew at the time, a pusillanimous invention to get rid of the whole affair. And here, let it never be forgotten, that, for the purpose of enabling Great Britain to shelter herself under the laws of war, our Secretary makes two admissions, neither of which has the least foundation in point of fact. First, he assumes that there was a state of war existing between the United States and Great Britain; which was not the fact. Next, he assumes that McLeod was in the military service of Great Britain, subject to military orders; and, having received orders to go upon this expedition, he was bound to go, or be shot for mutiny. Now, all this is sheer invention. McLeod was not in the military service, subject to orders; he was in civil life. He was not ordered to go upon this expedition; he volunteered. He was not obeying, but anticipating his Government; and that, without its knowledge. The Schlosser outrage was not known in England until after it was perpetrated; nor McLeod's offence assumed, until after he was caught; and then merely as a means of extricating him from danger. Thus our Secretary perverts the facts, in order to adapt them to his misquoted law.

To make a false admission of the law of nations—to accept apologies where none were offered—to pervert the facts of the case—to send the Attorney General, and a major general of the army, to protect and defend McLeod—and to give a receipt in full for the outrage on the Caroline, without receiving a particle of atonement for it;—to do all this, would seem to have been enough. But it appears that our Secretary negotiator did not think so; and that he could not permit Lord Ashburton to return to London, without carrying home with him further propitiation in a renewed apology for the delay in getting McLeod released, and in an act of Congress to prevent such delays in future. This renewed apology, and this act, were to be the last and highest evidences of his Lordship's complete success in humbling the United States at the footstool of the British Queen; and, that nothing should be wanting to our degradation, and to his Lordship's triumph on his return, the Secretary hastened to deliver him the one, and to procure him the other. In the concluding paragraph, in his same note of the 6th of August, he volunteers renewed assurances upon these two points:

"It was a subject of regret that the release of McLeod was so long delayed. A State court—and that not of the highest jurisdiction—decided that, on summary application, embarrassed, as it would appear, by technical difficulties, he could not be released by that court. His discharge, shortly afterward, by a jury, to whom he preferred to submit his case, rendered unnecessary the further prosecution of the legal question. It is for the Congress of the United States, whose attention has been called to the subject, to say what further provision ought to be made, to expedite proceedings in such cases."

McLeod has been released for a year past. His arrest continued but for a few months, with little personal inconvenience to himself; with no danger to his life, if innocent; and with the gratification of a notoriety flattering to his pride, and beneficial to his interest. He is probably highly delighted with the honors of the occurrence, and no way injured by his brief and comfortable imprisonment. Yet the sorrow of our Secretary continues to flow. At the end of a year, he is still in mourning, and renews the expression of his regret for the poor man's detention, and gives assurances against such delays in future;—this in the same letter in which he closes the door upon the fate of his own countrymen burnt and murdered in the Caroline, and promises never to disturb the British Government about them again. McLeod and all Canadians threw the unfortunate outbreak which took place in Canada. [Cheers.] He called it outbreak, because he thought they would agree with him, that, in meeting upon such an occasion as the present, to do honor to Sir Allen McNab, they ought not to say anything in that room, which could arouse any feeling of hostility on the part of any individual. [Cheers.]

* * * * Having for the last three days been engaged in attending and speaking at very large meetings, he really felt himself little competent satisfactorily to discharge the duties of the office he had undertaken; but he felt the utmost satisfaction in proposing the health of their distinguished guest, and he hoped, when he returned to Canada, he would assure the loyal inhabitants there that Englishmen looked upon them as fellow-subjects, fellow-countrymen, and brothers, whose paramount duty it was to cultivate warm feelings of good will towards each other, [cheers;] that Englishmen felt they were one and all in the same boat; and, whatever enemy might arise to threaten or to assail them, Englishmen would maintain their cause, Englishmen would protect and defend them, Englishmen would compliment and reward those who did their Canadian brethren service; for in so doing, they supported the flag of England, under which Nelson triumphed, and Wellington conquered. [Loud cheers.]

The toast was drunk with three times three, and one cheer more.

Sir A. McNab, in rising to respond to the toast, was received with loud and reiterated cheering. The gallant officer spoke as follows: My Lord Duke and gentlemen, the flattering manner in which you have proposed my health, and the enthusiasm with which it has been received by so distinguished a company as the present, demand my warmest gratitude. I hope, however, no man will believe that I am vain enough to suppose that any services which I may have rendered either to the colony from which I came, or the empire of which it forms a part, could possibly entitle me to this highly flattering mark of your regard. I therefore merely consider myself on the present occasion, as the fortunate individual in whose person a well-merited compliment is intended to be paid to the loyalty and devotion of the people of Canada. [Cheers.]

* * * * I have now the gratification of publicly declaring in England, that no service could have been more difficult, more dangerous, or more gallantly performed, than the destruction of a vessel employed to succor and sustain those who were in arms against her Majesty; and I well know that I express the sentiments of the people of Canada, when I state that they look forward with intense anxiety to see the loyalty and gallantry of Captain Drew generously rewarded. [Loud cheers.] They feel that he, in an hour of grave emergency, rendered them a great and important service, which, as loyal and honest men, they never can forget, or too highly appreciate. [Cheers.] * * * * * * I beg again to thank you most sincerely for the honor you have done me, and beg to drink all your good healths. [Loud cheers.]

Sir D. McDougall proposed "the health of the militia and loyal volunteers of Canada," avowing it as his opinion, that the militia of Nova Scotia and the North American provinces would, under a proper organization, be fully sufficient to defend themselves against any enemies that might threaten them. In support of this opinion, he triumphantly appealed to the exploits performed with his volunteers, by their distinguished guest, Sir Allen McNab.

The toast was drunk with great cordiality.

Mr. Urquhart then proposed "the health of Captain Drew, who signalized himself so much in the affair of the Caroline."

The Duke of Richmond, before the toast was drunk, also took the opportunity of pronouncing a high eulogium on the gallantry and prowess of that distinguished officer.

Captain Drew, who was most enthusiastically cheered, in brief and extremely modest terms, acknowledged the compliment. He expressed his great obligations for the kind and partial manner in which Sir A. McNab had spoken of him; and, although the speech of his distinguished friend might lead them to suppose that, as yet, he had received no reward for his services, he begged to assure them that he had conferred upon him a very great reward, in the approbation of so distinguished a company as the present—as high a compliment as he could be paid for all he was enabled to perform. [Cheers.] But, if that was not enough, he might say his services had also been appreciated and acknowledged by his most gracious sovereign. He could not conceive a higher compliment. This gratified his ambition, and left him nothing to complain of. [Cheers.] If on any future occasion his services should be required, the approbation of such a company as the present would greatly stimulate him to still greater exertions in defence of her Majesty and her dominions. [Loud cheers.]

* "However, as it is impossible for the best regulated State, or for the most vigilant and absolute Sovereign, to model at his pleasure all the actions of his subjects, and to confine them on every occasion to the most exact obedience, it would be unjust to impute to the nation or the Sovereign every fault committed by the citizens. We ought not, then, to say, in general, that we have received an injury from a nation, because we have received it from one of its members.

"But if a nation or its chief approves and ratifies the act of the individual, it then becomes a public concern, and the injured party is then to consider the nation as the real author of the injury, of which the citizen was, perhaps, only the instrument.

"If the offended State has in her power the individual who has done the injury, she may, without scruple, bring him to justice, and punish him. If he has escaped, and returned to his own country, she ought to apply to his Sovereign to have justice done in the case."—Vattel's Law of Nations.

are encouraged to repeat their most serious facts upon us, by the perfect immunity which both themselves and their Government have experienced. And to expedite their release, if hereafter arrested for such facts, they are informed that Congress had been "called" upon to pass the appropriate law—and passed it was! The habeas corpus act against the States, which had slept for many months in the Senate, and seemed to have sunk under the public execration,—this bill was "called" up, and passed cotemporaneously with the date of this letter. And thus the special minister was enabled to carry home with him an act of Congress to lay at the footstool of his Queen, and to show that the measure of atonement to McLeod was complete: that the executive, the military, the legislative, and the judicial departments had all been put in requisition, and faithfully exerted themselves to protect her Majesty's subject, from being harmed for a past invasion, conflagration, and murder; and to secure them from being called to account by the State courts for such trifles in future.

And so ends the case of the Caroline and McLeod. The humiliation of this conclusion, and the contempt and future danger which it brings upon the country, demand a pause, and a moment's reflection upon the catastrophe of this episode in the negotiation. The whole negotiation has been one of shame and injury; but this catastrophe of the McLeod and Caroline affair puts the finishing hand to our disgrace. I do not speak of the individuals who have done this work, but of the national honor which has been tarnished in their hands. Up to the end of Mr. Van Buren's administration, all was safe for the honor of the country. Redress for the outrage at Schlosser had been demanded; interference to release McLeod had been refused; the false application of the laws of war to a state of peace had been scouted. On the 4th day of March, 1841, the national honor was safe; but on that day its degradation commenced. Timing their movements with a calculated precision, the British Government transmitted their assumption of the Schlosser outrage, their formal demand for the release of McLeod, and their threat in the event of refusal, so as to arrive here on the evening of the day on which the new administration received the reins of Government. Their assumption, demand, and threat, arrived in Washington on the evening of the 4th day of March, a few hours after the inauguration of the new powers was over. It seemed as if the British had said to themselves: This is the time—our friends are in power—we helped to elect them—now is the time to begin. And begin they did. On the 8th day of March, Mr. Fox delivered to Mr. Webster the formal notification of the assumption, made the demand, and delivered the threat. Then the disgraceful scene began. They reverse the decision of Mr. Van Buren's administration, and determine to interfere in behalf of McLeod, and to extricate him by all means from the New York courts. To mask the ignominy of this interference, they pretend it is to get at a nobler antagonist; and that they are going to act the Romans, in sparing the humble and subduing the proud.* It is with Queen Victoria with whom they will deal! McLeod is too humble game for them. McLeod released, the next thing is to get out of the scrape with the Queen; and for that purpose they invent a false reading of the law of nations, and apply the laws of war to a state of peace. The jus belli, and not the jus gentium, then becomes their resort. And here ends their grand imitation of the Roman character. To assume the laws of war in time of peace, in order to cover a craven retreat, is the nearest approach which they make to war. Then the special minister comes. They accept from him private and verbal explanations, in full satisfaction to themselves of all the outrage at Schlosser: but beg the minister to write them a little apology, which they can show to the people. The minister refuses; and thereupon they assume that they have received it, and proclaim the apology to the world. To finish this scene, to complete the propitiation of the Queen, and to send her minister home with legal and parchment evidence in his hand of our humiliation, the expression of regret for the arrest and detention of McLeod is officiously and gratuitously renewed; the prospect of a like detention of any of her Majesty's subjects in future is pathetically deplored; and, to expedite their delivery from State courts when they again invade our soil, murder our citizens, and burn our vessels, the minister is informed that Congress has been "called" upon to pass a law to protect them from these courts. And here "a most serious fact" presents itself. Congress has actually obeyed the "call"—passed the act—secured her Majesty's subjects in future—and given the legal parchment evidence of his success to her minister before he departs for his home. The infamous act—the habeas corpus against the States—squeamishly called the "remedial justice act"—is now on the statute-book; the original polluting our code of law, the copy lying at the footstool of the British Queen. And this is the point we have reached. In the short space of a year and a half, the national character has been run down, from the pinnacle of honor to the abyss of disgrace. I limit myself now to the affair of McLeod and the Caroline alone; and say that, in this business, exclusive of other disgraces, the national character has been brought to the lowest point of contempt. It required the Walpole administration five-and-twenty long years of cowardly submission to France and Spain to complete the degradation of Great Britain: our present rulers have completed the same work for their own country in the short space of eighteen months. And this is the state of our America! that America which Jackson and Van Buren left so proud! that America which, with three millions of people, fought and worsted the British empire—with seven millions fought it, and worsted it again—and now, with eighteen millions, truckles to the British Queen, and invents all sorts of propitiatory apologies for her, when the most ample atonement is due to itself. Are we the people of the Revolution?—of the war of 1812?—of the year 1834? when Jackson electrified Europe by threatening the King of France with reprisals!

McLeod is given up, because he is too weak; the Queen is excused, because she is too strong; propitiation is lavished where atonement is due; an apology accepted where none was offered; the statute of limitations pleaded against an insult, by the party which received it! And the miserable performers in all this drama of national degradation expect to be applauded for magnanimity, when the laws of honor and the code of nations stamp their conduct with the brand of cowardice.*

It is a noble maxim of the English law, that every Englishman's house is his castle—inaccessible to every intruder but the law! "Not that it was surrounded with walls and battlements; it might be a straw-built shed. The winds of heaven might whistle through it; all the elements of heaven might enter it; but the King could not—the King dare not—enter it." So said the great Lord Chatham of the Englishman and his house. Not so with us, in this fallen state of our country. We have no king here, it is true, to break into our houses; but we have a Queen of England to send her Canadian subjects here to do it—to send them here to attack, kill, burn, and capture! and then to return to their royal mistress, to receive the rewards which are due to the chastisers of her Majesty's bad neighbors.

I have now finished what I had to say against the ratification of this treaty; and, in coming to the conclusion of so grave a subject, and one to which I have made so much opposition, I deem it due to the occasion to declare my future course in relation to it. I take it for certain that the treaty will be ratified—reluctantly and unwillingly ratified. In that event, I shall abide by it in all its provisions which come within the pale of the treaty-making power—oppose it in all that lies beyond that pale. The national boundaries come within the pale; and they must remain as they are established, bad as they are. The money payments to Maine and Massachusetts are domestic and legislative questions; and, as claims addressed to Congress, I shall consider them, and do what I believe to be right. As treaty stipulations, I shall resist these payments; for I cannot admit the policy or the right of Great Britain to interfere between the Union and its members, and to acquire the character of mediator, protector, guarantee or remonstrant between them. The fugitive offenders article I consider inoperative without the aid of an act of Congress; and that aid I shall be unwilling to give, because I consider the stipulations of the article as dangerous to foreigners who may come to our country, and useless to us, in the two eminent cases in which the surrender of fugitive criminals would be most wanting—the cases of slaves and counterfeiters. The alliance articles, both naval and diplomatic, I hold to be beyond the pale both of the treaty, making and legislative power, and eminently dangerous and unwise; and shall oppose them in all the forms in which the question of their execution shall come before me. I shall defeat the appropriations for this African squadron, and for the pay and outfit of these remonstrating ambassadors, if I can; and if Great Britain complains, and demands the execution of the treaty in these particulars, I shall consider it a demand for the tribute—the tribute in men, money and ships—which we are to pay her for five years' exemption from British search, and for so many years' reprieve from intended subjugation to the quintuple alliance.

*Every individual is permitted to recede from his rights, to abandon a just subject of complaint, or to forget an injury. But the conductor of a nation is not as free, in this respect, as a private person. The latter may hear only the voice of generosity, and, in an affair which interests none but himself alone, deliver himself up to the pleasure he finds in doing good, to his love of peace and tranquility. The representative of a nation—a sovereign—cannot consult himself; cannot abandon himself to his own inclination. The rights of the nation are benefits of the nation—are benefits of which the sovereign is only administrator, and he ought to dispose of them no further than as he has reason to believe the nation itself would dispose of them. . . . Seldom is it safe for a nation to dissemble or pardon an injury, unless it be manifestly in a situation to crush those who are so rash as to dare to offend it. It is then glorious to pardon those who acknowledge their faults. Parcere subjectis et debellare superbos: and it may do this with safety. But, between two powers that are nearly equal, suffering an injury, without requiring complete satisfaction, is almost always imputed to WEAKNESS or COWARDICE: it is the means of soon receiving from them those that are most ATROCIOUS.

BRITISH TREATY.

[SECRET SESSION.]

SPEECH OF MR. WOODBURY,

OF NEW HAMPSHIRE.

In Senate, August, 1842—On several points arising in the discussion of the treaty with England.

After Mr. RIVES had closed his opening speech—

Mr. WOODBURY said that he did not propose now, if at all, to enter into an examination of the whole of the various topics which had been alluded to. Many of them—such as the case of the Caroline and the Creole, the right of search, and the question of impressment—were matters not even named in the treaty, and, of course, seemed irrelevant now. But the great question of the North-eastern boundary was the essential part of the instrument; and as an attempt appeared to have been made, through the chairman, to cast a doubt over our former claims on that frontier, in consequence of the discovery of some new maps, Mr. W. felt bound at once to repel it. Whether he should vote to ratify this part of the treaty, or not—according as full consideration might in the end seem to require—this much is certain: that he never should approve it on the ground that our title to the whole of the disputed territory was in the smallest degree shaken by anything which had yet appeared. Other high and momentous motives, connected with peace and war, as well as with the conduct of future negotiations or hostilities by a party so doubtful as to trustworthiness, and so embarrassed as that now in power; others connected with the recent assent of Maine and Massachusetts—the States alone directly interested—to the particular boundary adopted in the treaty; and others looking to the diminished importance, yearly, of all questions of boundary between us and neighboring powers on this continent, where we grow so much faster than they, and are destined ere long to be supreme—might justify a ratification of the present stipulations. We shall see in a few days.

But, to seek an apology for doing it, in arguments against our undoubted rights, derived from loose conjectures of itinerant Americans in Europe, or from suggestions calculated to belittle the claim, and injure the reputation of one of the able negotiators of the treaty of 1783, did not seem to Mr. W. very patriotic, or at all warranted by any of the facts in the case.

The French map of 1745, which, with its red lines, running west from the St. Croix, had been made to occupy so prominent a position in this debate, was doubtless one illustrating the boundaries between the French and British colonies in America, before the conquest of Canada by England, and its cession in 1763.

There is a similar map in the French atlas, on the table of the Secretary, which I procured from the State Department. The publications of that day are full of corresponding descriptions, as well as maps, on the part of France. But, at the same time, Great Britain, with whom we are now treating, and whose claims then are ours now, always resisted the pretensions of France to crowd the southern limits of Canada so far south, and the western limits of Nova Scotia so far west.

Instead of permitting Nova Scotia, or Acadia, to come to the Kennebec, or even to the Penobscot, she herself originally granted it to come only to the St. Croix; and made and described its western line as one running north from the source of that river till it reached some stream connected with the navigable waters of the St. Lawrence. Here is her Latin charter of that province, and an English translation, giving this, in substance; and it was this boundary, with a slight change, to which England claimed uniformly to the very last moment of her jurisdiction over what now constitute these United States.

The change is this: After the conquest of Canada, being then possessed of Nova Scotia also, she carried the boundaries of Canada south to the heights which turn the northern rivers into the St. Lawrence; but, independent of that, she kept the boundary of Nova Scotia virtually the same as before; and the same as Mitchell, her own geographer under the Lords of Plantations, had laid it down in 1755 on his map; and the same as has ever been claimed by this country since the peace of 1783.

Now, let it be recollected that this British official map of Mitchell was before the commissioners who formed the treaty of 1783. Both sides concede this, in the arguments prepared for the King of Holland, now in my hand. Recollect, too, that the line on that map runs due north from the source of the St. Croix till it strikes the St. Lawrence; and not west from the St. Croix, as on this French map. Recollect that the line described in the treaty is to run north of the St. Croix, precisely as it appears on that map, till it strikes the highlands from which spring the tributaries of the St. Lawrence, and which are near to its bank. Recollect that Doctor Franklin was by birth a Massachusetts man, and had been the agent of that province, and familiar with all its claims to boundary up to that line.

Recollect that he had got inserted into the preliminaries of peace an agreement to go still further east, and make the St. John, from its mouth to its source, the boundary, as more convenient, and, in many respects, more eligible to us than the old boundary.

Recollect that, when coming to sign the treaty, this was so strenuously opposed by England, on the ground of its being a new cession of territory, that the old line was agreed to be adhered to, and was intended to be described in the treaty.

Recollect all these circumstances; and then say, how could he, in a letter to Count Vergennes on the 6th of December, 1782, mean to refer to any map but Mitchell's, or any line on that or any other map, except the old line, as there laid down, till it reached the highlands north of, and near the St. Lawrence? He lacked neither information, vigilance, nor shrewdness. But a supposition (which some gentlemen make) that he referred to some map having our boundary line run nearly west from the St. Croix, and cutting us off, also, from the sources of even the Penobscot, Kennebec, and Connecticut—a line not running north at all, as the treaty requires—a line not touching in that direction any highlands which turn waters into the St. Lawrence, as the treaty requires—a line contrary to Mitchell, and all the former British as well as Massachusetts claims—and a line at war with even his own express instructions,—is an imputation of carelessness and ignorance altogether unfounded in any facts before us. It does not appear that he ever saw the old French map spoken of, and of which a partial copy is sent to us—much less referred to it; and the red lines on it are undoubtedly the old French lines, put on it when made in 1745, instead of 1782; and are those claimed by France when she owned Nova Scotia and Canada, and were never thought of as describing the boundary between us and England, as arranged in the treaty of peace.

For further confirmation of this view, and of the validity of our whole claim, Doctor Franklin, only eight days after, (viz. December 14, 1782,) wrote to Mr. Livingston that the old line of boundary was agreed on, and was to be run out afterwards between the parties. (See, also, his letter on the 14th of October, 1782, but twenty-three days previous.) Here are both the letters, in the argument prepared for the King of Holland in 1827.

So, nearly thirty other maps, published by England and her citizens, between 1763 and 1783, draw the boundary line as we claim it. Indeed, Mr. Gallatin collected more than fifty of that kind, in all; and one in Mr. Jefferson's collection, engraved in 1783, to show the limits under the treaty, by Osgood Carlton—a man of science and practical skill, as well as belonging to Massachusetts, and well acquainted with her localities. Before any controversy, or any motive existed to mislead, he laid down the boundary there as now claimed; and, to avoid mistakes as to dotted lines or coloring, he had printed on the map itself that this eastern line, as we have always claimed it, was "the boundary line between Britain and America," under the treaty of peace. Another map before me, in Mr. Gallatin's last memoir, made by Gov. Pownal, in 1776, lays down the same line as the eastern limit of Massachusetts; and others still, of the same date, by Carver, and others; and another by Bowen, in 1763. These are all English in their origin—several of them official in their character;—and the whole, so far as regards the evidence to be derived from maps, entirely conclusive as to the right of the United States to the whole territory in dispute.

Mr. W. said he could fortify this position by a mass of documents and evidence of a different character; for he had devoted considerable attention to this topic ever since 1819, when the northwestern boundary of New Hampshire had become hazarded in the controversy concerning some of the limits in the treaty of 1783. But he should occupy too much time, if he now entered into this point further.

[Several Senators said, No: go on.]

Mr. W. observed that, at this late period of the session, he felt reluctant to do it; though, before sitting down, he would advert a moment to one other reason which had been urged for assenting to the treaty, with diminished limits on the northeast. It was, that certain equivalents had been gained elsewhere, and, among the rest, on the northwestern boundary of New Hampshire. This last impression was erroneous. He must say, once for all, that we had not gained a foot of land there to which that State was not clearly entitled.

Without entering into details, which might be tedious to others than citizens of New Hampshire, it was enough to say, on this occasion, that the northwesternmost head of Connecticut river—which was the boundary described in the treaty of 1783—was still further west than Hall's stream, described in this treaty of 1842. That head was Lynch's stream; and, as is apparent on Bouchette's map of Canada, (hanging before us,) would, if adopted, give to the United States several thousand acres more land than we now obtained. But, as New Hampshire had not surveyed and exercised jurisdiction west of Hall's stream, she could not insist on going further on her account; and the land between that stream and Lynch's, if awarded to the United States, must, therefore, belong to the General Government.

It was for them, then, and not for her to complain, as to what was lost between those two streams. But that New Hampshire had a right to go as far as Hall's stream, was apparent on all the modern maps made since the country was explored fully, as being more northwest than Indian stream, or Perry's brook, or the main branch of the Connecticut. This last was strangely selected by the King of Holland as the northwesternmost head, when it is the northeast one. It was also apparent on both Bowen's and Pownal's maps, made as long ago as 1776, as well as several others.

But, beyond this, the State of New Hampshire had, as early as 1789, surveyed to the source of this very stream, and run down to its mouth, as her northwest boundary; and ever since, when occasion required, had exercised jurisdiction to it.

All this, with other proofs, are fully detailed in a document referred to in the correspondence before us, which was prepared by myself, and published in the second volume of the New Hampshire Historical Collections, as long ago as 1827.

He took this occasion to do the justice to both the Secretary of State and Lord Ashburton, to add, that, after the New Hampshire delegation invited attention to that document, and one of them explained the strong evidence which existed in it against the narrower line first proposed in this negotiation, as set out in page 67 of the correspondence, they both seemed satisfied that New Hampshire should rightfully hold to Hall's stream.

Let our decision, then, be what it may on the whole treaty, he must insist that, if in favor of the ratification, (as it probably would be,) it should not be so on account of any just doubt created by the old maps concerning the full claim of Maine, as originally set up; nor on account of any equivalent in any new territory obtained for New Hampshire, beyond what her original limits justified, and what she had long claimed and enjoyed.

[On the ensuing day, the chairman referred to some correspondence, in 1833, between the British Government and the State Department, showing a willingness on our side to deviate west from a due north line from the St. Croix, provided such highlands as are described in the treaty of 1783 were not discovered at the end of that line. And he, as well as Mr. EVANS, argued thence, that the original claim had been in some respect abandoned by the past administration. The chairman also referred to some new letters by Lord Palmerston, showing that in the case of the Caroline the American Executive—or, at least, the Secretary of State—knew, before 1840, that Great Britain intended to make no apology for that outrage.]

Mr. WOODBURY expressed his regret that the conduct of two of his former associates in office had been called in question, who were not now here—and, he lamented to add, were not in existence—so as to vindicate themselves. He must ask the indulgence of the Senate a few minutes, to correct what he considered an erroneous impression as to the conduct of both of them.

The proposition made by Mr. Livingston, as to a deviation from a due-north line, was only hypothetical—was very limited in its effects, in any event—and originated in this way: As long ago as 1827 or 1828, when considering the convention to refer this controversy to the arbitrament of the King of Holland, some gentleman in the Senate had suggested that, after a due-north line from the source of the St. Croix crossed the St. John, and approached the highlands whence streams flow into the St. Lawrence one way, and the Atlantic ocean the other, it would first strike some streams running into the Bay of Chaleurs, or the Gulf of St. Lawrence. They thence argued that it might be necessary, in that event, to deviate a little to the west, and go round the sources of those streams till those highlands were reached from which waters flowed into the St. Lawrence to the north, and into the Atlantic ocean to the east and southeast. The treaty of 1783 also called for natural monuments at this point, by calling for highlands of that character, as well as mentioned a descriptive corner in the northwest angle of Nova Scotia. Mr. Livingston supposed that, in fact, both would be found to agree or coincide at a due north point, as he says in his letter; but if they should not, he adds—as a lawyer would, and must, on sound legal principles—that the natural monuments must govern, rather than the descriptive corner.

All he proposed, then, was what the law of the case required—which is, that if the monument and the angle were not found to coincide, a deviation might be made to the west far enough to strike the natural monument. But every one can see by this map of the commissioners that the deviation, if made at all, instead of coming down near the British line at Mars Hill, or even to the St. John, would be only a few miles west from a line due north from the St. Croix—being a gore, wider at one end, and a point at the other—leaving nine-tenths of the whole claim, if not all, with Maine, as before.

What is very conclusive evidence that the British, as well as Mr. Livingston, knew that this deviation must be small, if any, the proposition was refused by their ambassador.

So far from there being any pretence, then, that the deviation could in fact come south of the St. John, it is stated in Sir Charles Vaughan's letter expressly that it could not, in any event, probably go south of the St. John, nor even much beyond the St. Francis; and he adds that "The assent of the British Government to the proposition of Mr. Livingston would concede to the Government of the United States nearly all they had hitherto claimed."—Message to Senate, 24th Cong., 1st sess. Doc. 414, p. 17.

Let us, then, hear no more of this as an abandonment of the American claim, either in the view of the American cabinet, or of their lynx-eyed British opponents.

In respect to Lord Palmerston's recent letter, imputing to the past administration, or to Mr. Forsyth, before 1840, any official knowledge that the British Government had decided to make no apology for the outrage on the Caroline, and to assume the act as their own; Mr. W. thought, when he heard the letter read, there must be some singular misconception or marvellous impudence in the charge. No man possessed a higher sense of honor, or sterner independence, than Mr. Forsyth. He was the last man in the nation to conceal anything through fear—the last man to delay bringing difficulties to a point through subserviency.

Looking at the rest of the correspondence with Lord Palmerston by Mr. Stevenson, it appears (as was to have been expected) that the latter at once, and categorically, repels the imputations of the British Secretary. He proceeds also to prove that no just ground for them could exist, in anything communicated by Mr. Fox to Mr. Forsyth, or by Lord Palmerston to Mr. Stevenson. And when, in a second letter of Lord Palmerston, (not read by the chairman,) an attempt is made to qualify the first charge, and to soften it into one not implicating any conduct in the American Secretary, minister, or President, as at all dishonorable, Mr. Stevenson replies again, and insists that, whether honorable or dishonorable in his Lordship's opinion, the facts of the case had by Lord Palmerston been entirely misapprehended.

The correspondence, as a whole, nullifies completely the imputation made by the British Secretary; and any inference drawn from it by the chairman, [Mr. RIVES,] either derogatory to the past administration, or favorable to the greater condescension supposed to be exhibited by England in the more recent explanations on that matter since the arrest and trial of McLeod, seems to rest on a very sandy foundation.

[In voting on the separate articles of the treaty, Mr. W. voted against those in respect to the engagements to furnish a force of eighty guns towards suppressing the slave-trade. This arose, not from an unwillingness to do everything proper for abolishing that trade with alacrity and efficiency; but from an aversion to enter into an entangling alliance with any nation for any object; and from a reluctance to seem compelled by England, or bound to her, to do as to other countries what she had no right to demand or enforce. The attitude appeared on our part one of inferiority and submission, or of objection. A sovereign nation ought to do what is just and honorable, as to the world at large, or as to the general interests of humanity, without the intervention or guardianship of any other nation. Again: the quantity of force to be employed was too large, too expensive, and unnecessary, unless it was employed by detachments occasionally from our quadrons at Brazil, the Mediterranean, and the West Indies. Then, and then only, could the health of the officers and men be preserved, and a great burden in our finances averted, which England bore to protect her African colonies as well as to suppress the slave-trade. We had no such colonies belonging to our Government; and for this, and other reasons, should not be subjected to anything like equal expenses in relation to this matter.]

After the Senate had gone though with the different articles of the treaty, and were ready to act on the question of its final ratification, Mr. W. said he wished to submit a motion.

He observed that the inclination of his mind was to vote for the ratification, though he disliked much both branches of the treaty. The engagement, by any stipulation made to a foreign power, to do anything in suppressing the slave-trade, which it was our duty to do of our own accord, and without the surveillance or admonition of others, looked derogatory to us. He had an incincible repugnance to that kind of assumption by the nation, and the acquiescence in it by another. But he passed by that, to come to the Northeastern boundary, concerning which he wished to trouble the Senate with a single motion. It was made with a view to show—what he believed to be true—that the treaty in that particular was not what the country had a right to expect; and, therefore, that would not have been ratified in that particular, had not Maine and Massachusetts—the parties specially interested—agreed to the line adopted. This, at least, was his own opinion. But as their commissioners had agreed to the new line, he, for one, would waive further objections. His motion was, therefore, to recommit the treaty with instructions to report the two following resolutions to precede the resolve for ratification:

Resolved, That the provisions in this treaty, relating to the northeastern boundary, are not, in the opinion of the Senate, so favorable to the United States as they had a right to expect on the facts of the case.

2. Resolved further, That the Senate, though anxious to adjust all controversies with foreign powers, would not feel justified in advising a ratification of those provisions, had not Maine and Massachusetts, the States interested in the disputed territory, given their assent, by commissioners, to the particular boundary adopted in those provisions, [instead of conferring general authority on the Federal Government to agree to such new conventional line as it might deem just.]

[Mr. TALLMADGE moved to lay the proposition of Mr. W. on the table; but there being doubts whether this might not carry the treaty with it, Mr. T. withdrew it.

Mr. KING then suggested that the resolutions be moved as an amendment or addition to the resolve for ratification, so as to save a recommitment.]

Mr. WOODBURY replied, that the President of the Senate had doubts whether such a course would be in order, or he would acquiesce in it with pleasure.

[Some Senators called for a division of the question as to each resolution separately; being willing to vote for one, but not the other. Some expressed themselves embarrassed how to vote, as they approved one, if not both of the resolutions; but doubted whether it was expedient to make them a part of the record in the ratification, and requested Mr. W., on that account, to oblige them by withdrawing the motion.]

Mr. WOODBURY stated that his object in offering the motion and resolution was to show permanently, and in the briefest manner possible, his general views and grounds of justification in ratifying the treaty. As he had accomplished that object with the Senate, so far as regarded himself, he would not, for the purpose of placing the views of all on the journal as to these points, press other gentlemen to a vote on them which was embarrassing, and might lead to more debate and delay. He would, therefore, consent to what was asked, and withdraw the motion.

MESSAGE OF THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

We have continued reason to express our profound gratitude to the great Creator of all things for numberless benefits conferred upon us as a people. Blessed with genial seasons, the husbandman has his garners filled with abundance; and the necessaries of life, not to speak of its luxuries, abound in every direction. While in some other nations steady and industrious labor can hardly find the means of subsistence, the greatest evil which we have to encounter is a surplus of production beyond the home demand, which seeks, and with difficulty finds, a partial market in other regions. The health of the country, with partial exceptions, has, for the past year, been well preserved; and, under their free and wise institutions, the United States are rapidly advancing towards the consummation of the high destiny which an overruling Providence seems to have marked out for them. Exempt from domestic convulsion, and at peace with all the world, we are free to consult as to the best means of securing and advancing the happiness of the people. Such are the circumstances under which you now assemble in your respective chambers, and which should lead us to unite in praise and thanksgiving to that great Being who made us, and who preserves us as a nation.

I congratulate you, fellow-citizens, on the happy change in the aspect of our foreign affairs since my last annual Message. Causes of complaint at that time existed between the United States and Great Britain, which, attended by irritating circumstances, threatened most seriously the public peace. The difficulty of adjusting amicably the questions at issue between the two countries, was, in no small degree, augmented by the lapse of time since they had their origin. The opinions entertained by the Executive on several of the leading topics in dispute, were frankly set forth in the Message at the opening of your late session. The appointment of a special minister by Great Britain to the United States, with power to negotiate upon most of the points of difference, indicated a desire on her part amicably to adjust them; and that minister was met by the Executive in the same spirit which had dictated his mission. The treaty consequent thereon, having been duly ratified by the two Governments, a copy, together with the correspondence which accompanied it, is herewith communicated. I trust that, whilst you may see in it nothing objectionable, it may be the means of preserving, for an indefinite period, the amicable relations happily existing between the two Governments. The question of peace or war between the United States and Great Britain, is a question of the deepest interest, not only to themselves, but to the civilized world; since it is scarcely possible that a war could exist between them without endangering the peace of Christendom. The immediate effect of the treaty upon ourselves will be felt in the security afforded to mercantile enterprise, which, no longer apprehensive of interruption, adventures its speculations in the most distant sea; and, freighted with the diversified productions of every land, returns to bless our own. There is nothing in the treaty which, in the slightest degree, compromits the honor or dignity of either nation. Next to the settlement of the boundary line, which must always be a matter of difficulty between States as between individuals, the question which seemed to threaten the greatest embarrassment was that connected with the African slave-trade.

By the 10th article of the treaty of Ghent, it was expressly declared that "whereas the traffic in slaves is irreconcilable with the principles of humanity and justice; and whereas both his Majesty and the United States are desirous of continuing their efforts to promote its entire abolition; it is hereby agreed that both the contracting parties shall use their best endeavors to accomplish so desirable an object." In the enforcement of the laws and treaty stipulations of Great Britain, a practice had threatened to grow up, on the part of its cruisers, of subjecting to visitation ships sailing under the American flag, which, while it seriously involved our maritime rights, would subject to vexation a branch of our trade which was daily increasing, and which required the fostering care of the Government. And although Lord Aberdeen, in his correspondence with the American envoys, at London, expressly disclaimed all right to detain an American ship on the high seas, even if found with a cargo of slaves on board, and restricted the British pretension to a mere claim to visit and inquire; yet it could not well be discerned by the Executive of the United States how such visit and inquiry could be made without detention on the voyage, and consequent interruption to the trade. It was regarded as the right of search, presented only in a new form, and expressed in different words; and I therefore felt it to be my duty distinctly to declare, in my annual Message to Congress, that no such concession could be made, and that the United States had both the will and the ability to enforce their own laws, and to protect their flag from being used for purposes wholly forbidden by those laws, and obnoxious to the moral censure of the world. Taking the Message as his letter of instructions, our then Minister at Paris felt himself required to assume the same ground in a remonstrance which he felt it to be his duty to present to M. Guizot, and, through him, to the King of the French, against what has been called the Quintuple Treaty; and his conduct, in this respect, met with the approval of this Government. In close conformity with these views, the eighth article of the treaty was framed, which provides that "each nation shall keep afloat in the African seas a force of not less than eighty guns, to act separately and apart, under instructions from their respective Governments, and for the enforcement of their respective laws and obligations." From this it will be seen that the ground assumed in the Message has been fully maintained, at the same time that the stipulations of the treaty of Ghent are to be carried out in good faith by the two countries, and that all pretence is removed for interference with our commerce, for any purpose whatever, by a foreign Government. While, therefore, the United States have been standing up for the freedom of the seas, they have not thought proper to make that a pretext for avoiding a fulfilment of their treaty stipulations, or a ground for giving countenance to a trade reprobated by our laws. A similar arrangement by the other great powers could not fail to sweep from the ocean the slave-trade, without the interpolation of any new principle into the maritime code. We may be permitted to hope that the example thus set will be followed by some, if not all of them. We thereby also afford suitable protection to the fair trader in those seas; thus fulfilling at the same time the dictates of a sound policy, and complying with the claims of justice and humanity.

It would have furnished additional cause for congratulation, if the treaty could have embraced all subjects calculated in future to lead to a misunderstanding between the two Governments. The territory of the United States, commonly called the Oregon Territory, lying on the Pacific ocean, north of the forty-second degree of latitude, to a portion of which Great Britain lays claim, begins to attract the attention of our fellow-citizens; and the tide of population, which has reclaimed what was so lately an unbroken wilderness in more contiguous regions, is preparing to flow over those vast districts which stretch from the Rocky mountains to the Pacific ocean. In advance of the acquirement of individual rights to these lands, sound policy dictates that every effort should be resorted to by the two Governments to settle their respective claims. It became manifest, at an early hour of the late negotiations, that any attempt, for the time being, satisfactorily to determine those rights, would lead to a protracted discussion, which might embrace in its failure other more pressing matters; and the Executive did not regard it as proper to waive all the advantages of an honorable adjustment of other difficulties of great magnitude and importance, because this, not so immediately pressing, stood in the way. Although the difficulty referred to may not, for several years to come, involve the peace of the two countries, yet I shall not delay to urge on Great Britain the importance of its early settlement. Nor will other matters of commercial importance to the two countries be overlooked; and I have good reason to believe that it will comport with the policy of England, as it does with that of the United States, to seize upon this moment, when most of the causes of irritation have passed away, to cement the peace and amity of the two countries, by wisely removing all grounds of probable future collision.

With the other powers of Europe our relations continue on the most amicable footing. Treaties now existing with them should be rigidly observed; and every opportunity, compatible with the interests of the United States, should be seized upon to enlarge the basis of commercial intercourse. Peace with all the world is the true foundation of our policy, which can only be rendered permanent by the practice of equal and impartial justice to all. Our great desire should be to enter only into that rivalry which looks to the general good, in the cultivation of the sciences, the enlargement of the field for the exercise of the mechanical arts, and the spread of commerce (that great civilizer) to every land and sea. Carefully abstaining from interference in all questions exclusively referring themselves to the political interests of Europe, we may be permitted to hope an equal exemption from the interference of European Governments in what relates to the States of the American continent.

On the 23d of April last, the commissioners on the part of the United States, under the convention with the Mexican Republic of the 11th of April, 1839, made to the proper department a final report in relation to the proceedings of the commission. From this it appears that the total amount awarded to the claimants by the commissioners and the umpire appointed under that convention, was two million twenty-six thousand and seventy-nine dollars and sixty-eight cents. The arbiter having considered that his functions were required by the convention to terminate at the same time with those of the commissioners, returned to the board, undecided for want of time, claims which had been allowed by the American commissioners, to the amount of nine hundred and twenty-eight thousand six hundred and twenty dollars and eighty-eight cents. Other claims, in which the amount sought to be recovered was three million three hundred and thirty-six thousand eight hundred and thirty-seven dollars and five cents, were submitted to the board too late for its consideration. The Minister of the United States at Mexico has been duly authorized to make demand for the payment of the awards, according to the terms of the convention, and the provisions of the act of Congress of the 12th of June, 1840. He has also been instructed to communicate to that Government the expectations of the Government of the United States in relation to those claims which were not disposed of according to the provisions of the convention, and all others of citizens of the United States against the Mexican Government. He has also been furnished with other instructions, to be followed by him in case the Government of Mexico should not find itself in a condition to make present payment of the amount of the awards, in specie or its equivalent.

I am happy to be able to say that information which is esteemed favorable, both to a just satisfaction of the awards, and a reasonable provision for other claims, has been recently received from Mr. Thompson, the Minister of the United States, who has promptly and efficiently executed the instructions of his Government in regard to this important subject.

The citizens of the United States who accompanied the late Texan expedition to Santa Fé, and who were wrongfully taken and held as prisoners of war in Mexico, have all been liberated.

A correspondence has taken place between the Department of State and the Mexican Minister of Foreign Affairs, upon the complaint of Mexico that citizens of the United States were permitted to give aid to the inhabitants of Texas in the war existing between her and that republic. Copies of this correspondence are herewith communicated to Congress, together with copies of letters on the same subject, addressed to the diplomatic corps at Mexico, by the American Minister and the Mexican Secretary of State.

Mexico has thought proper to reciprocate the mission of the United States to that Government, by accrediting to this a minister of the same rank as that of the representative of the United States in Mexico. From the circumstances connected with this mission, favorable results are anticipated from it. It is so obviously for the interest of both countries, as neighbors and friends, that all just causes of mutual dissatisfaction should be removed, that it is to be hoped neither will omit or delay the employment of any practicable and honorable means to accomplish that end.

The affairs pending between this Government and several others of the States of this hemisphere formerly under the dominion of Spain, have again, within the past year, been materially obstructed by the military revolutions and conflicts in those countries.

The ratifications of the treaty between the United States and the Republic of Ecuador, of the 13th of June, 1839, have been exchanged, and that instrument has been duly promulgated on the part of this Government. Copies are now communicated to Congress, with a view to enable that body to make such changes in the laws applicable to our intercourse with that Republic as may be deemed requisite.

Provision has been made by the Government of Chili for the payment of the claim on account of the illegal detention of the brig Warrior at Coquimbo, in 1820. This Government has reason to expect that other claims of our citizens against Chili will be hastened to a final and satisfactory close.

The empire of Brazil has not been altogether exempt from those convulsions which so constantly afflict the neighboring republics. Disturbances which recently broke out are, however, now understood to be quieted. But these occurrences, by threatening the stability of the Governments, or by causing incessant and violent changes in them, or in the persons who administer them, tend greatly to retard provisions for a just indemnity for losses and injuries suffered by individual subjects or citizens of other States. The Government of the United States will feel it to be its duty, however, to consent to no delay, not unavoidable, in making satisfaction for wrongs and injuries sustained by its own citizens. Many years having, in some cases, elapsed, a decisive and effectual course of proceeding will be demanded of the respective Governments against whom claims have been preferred.

The vexatious, harassing, and expensive war which so long prevailed with the Indian tribes inhabiting the peninsula of Florida, has happily been terminated; whereby our army has been relieved from a service of the most disagreeable character, and the treasury from a large expenditure. Some casual outbreaks may occur, such as are incident to the close proximity of border settlers and the Indians; but these, as in all other cases, may be left to the care of the local authorities, aided, when occasion may require, by the forces of the United States. A sufficient number of troops will be maintained in Florida, so long as the remotest apprehensions of danger shall exist; yet their duties will be limited rather to the garrisoning of the necessary posts, than to the maintenance of active hostilities. It is to be hoped that a territory, so long retarded in its growth, will now speedily recover from the evils incident to a protracted war, exhibiting, in the increased amount of its rich productions, true evidences of returning wealth and prosperity. By the practice of rigid justice towards the numerous Indian tribes residing within our territorial limits, and the exercise of a parental vigilance over their interests, protecting them against fraud and intrusion, and at the same time using every proper expedient to introduce among them the arts of civilized life, we may fondly hope not only to wean them from their love for war, but to inspire them with a love for peace and all its avocations. With several of the tribes, great progress in civilizing them has already been made. The schoolmaster and the missionary are found side by side; and the remnants of what were once numerous and powerful nations may yet be preserved as the builders up of a new name for themselves and their posterity.

The balance in the treasury on the 1st of January, 1842, (exclusive of the amount deposited with the States, trust funds, and indemnities,) was $230,483 68. The receipts into the treasury during the first three quarters of the present year, from all sources, amount to $26,616,593 78; of which more than fourteen millions were received from customs, and about one million from the public lands. The receipts for the fourth quarter are estimated at nearly eight millions; of which four millions are expected from customs, and three millions and a half from loans and treasury notes. The expenditures of the first three quarters of the present year exceed twenty-six millions, and those estimated for the fourth quarter amount to about eight millions; and it is anticipated there will be a deficiency of half a million on the 1st January next; but that the amount of outstanding warrants (estimated at $800,000) will leave an actual balance of about $224,000 in the treasury. Among the expenditures of the year, are more than eight millions for the public debt, and $600,000 on account of the distribution to the States of the proceeds of sales of the public lands.

The present tariff of duties was somewhat hastily and hurriedly passed near the close of the late session of Congress. That it should have defects, can, therefore, be surprising to no one. To remedy such defects as may be found to exist in many of its numerous provisions, will not fail to claim your serious attention. It may well merit inquiry, whether the exaction of all duties in cash does not call for the introduction of a system which has proved highly beneficial in countries where it has been adopted. I refer to the warehousing system. The first and most prominent effect which it would produce, would be to protect the market alike against redundant or deficient supplies of foreign fabrics; both of which, in the long run, are injurious as well to the manufacturer as to the importer. The quantity of goods in store being at all times readily known, it would enable the importer, with an approach to accuracy, to ascertain the actual wants of the market, and to regulate himself accordingly. If, however, he should fall into error, by importing an excess above the public wants, he could readily correct its evils by availing himself of the benefits and advantages of the system thus established. In the storehouse, the goods imported would await the demands of the market; and their issues would be governed by the fixed principles of demand and supply. Thus an approximation would be made to a steadiness and uniformity of price, which, if attainable, would conduce to the decided advantage of mercantile and mechanical operations.

The apprehension may be well entertained, that, without something to ameliorate the rigor of cash payments, the entire import trade may fall into the hands of a few wealthy capitalists in this country and in Europe. The small importer, who requires all the money he can raise for investments abroad, and who can but ill afford to pay the lowest duty, would have to subduct in advance a portion of his funds, in order to pay the duties, and would lose the interest upon the amount thus paid for all the time the goods might remain unsold; which might absorb his profits. The rich capitalist abroad, as well as at home, would thus possess, after a short time, an almost exclusive monopoly of the import trade; and laws designed for the benefit of all, would thus operate for the benefit of the few—a result wholly uncongenial with the spirit of our institutions, and anti-republican in all its tendencies. The warehousing system would enable the importer to watch the market, and to select his own time or offering his goods for sale. A profitable portion of the carrying trade in articles entered for the benefit of drawback, must also be most seriously affected, without the adoption of some expedient to relieve the cash system. The warehousing system would afford that relief, since the carrier would have a safe recourse to the public storehouses, and might, without advancing the duty, reship within some reasonable period to foreign ports. A further effect of the measure would be to supersede the system of drawbacks, thereby effectually protecting the Government against fraud, as the right of debenture would not attach to goods after their withdrawal from the public stores.

In revising the existing tariff of duties, should you deem it proper to do so at your present session, I can only repeat the suggestions and recommendations which, upon several occasions, I have heretofore felt it to be my duty to offer to Congress. The great primary and controlling interest of the American people is union; union, not only in the mere forms of government—forms which may be broken—but union founded in an attachment of States and individuals for each other. This union in sentiment and feeling can only be preserved by the adoption of that course of policy which, neither giving exclusive benefits to some, nor imposing unnecessary burdens upon others, shall consult the interests of all, by pursuing a course of moderation, and thereby seeking to harmonize public opinion, and causing the people everywhere to feel and to know that the Government is careful of the interests of all alike. Nor is there any subject in regard to which moderation, connected with a wise discrimination, is more necessary than in the imposition of duties on imports. Whether reference be had to revenue—the primary object in the imposition of taxes—or to the incidents which necessarily flow from their imposition, this is entirely true. Extravagant duties defeat their end and object, not only by exciting in the public mind an hostility to the manufacturing interests, but by inducing a system of smuggling on an extensive scale, and the practice of every manner of fraud upon the revenue, which the utmost vigilance of Government cannot effectually suppress. An opposite course of policy would be attended by results essentially different, of which every interest of society—and none more than those of the manufacturer—would reap important advantages. Among the most striking of its benefits would be that derived from the general acquiescence of the country in its support, and the consequent permanency and stability which would be given to all the operations of industry. It cannot be too often repeated, that no system of legislation can be wise, which is fluctuating and uncertain. No interest can thrive under it. The prudent capitalist will never adventure his capital in manufacturing establishments, or in any other leading pursuit of life, if there exists a state of uncertainty as to whether the Government will repeal to-morrow what it has enacted to-day. Fitful profits, however high, if threatened with a ruinous reduction by a vacillating policy on the part of Government, will scarcely tempt him to trust the money which he has acquired by a life of labor upon the uncertain adventure. I, therefore, in the spirit of conciliation, and influenced by no other desire than to rescue the great interests of the country from the vortex of political contention, and in the discharge of the high and solemn duties of the place which I now occupy, recommend moderate duties, imposed with a wise discrimination as to their several objects, as being not only most likely to be durable, but most advantageous to every interest of society.

The report of the Secretary of the War Department exhibits a very full and satisfactory account of the various and important interests committed to the charge of that officer. It is particularly gratifying to find that the expenditures for the military service are greatly reduced in amount; that a strict system of economy has been introduced into the service, and the abuses of past years greatly reformed. The fortifications on our maritime frontier have been prosecuted with much vigor, and at many points our defences are in a very considerable state of forwardness. The suggestions in reference to the establishment of means of communication with our territories on the Pacific, and the surveys so essential to a knowledge of the resources of the intermediate country, are entitled to the most favorable consideration. While I could propose nothing inconsistent with friendly negotiations to settle the extent of our claims in that region, yet a prudent forecast points out the necessity of such measures as may enable us to maintain our rights. The arrangements made for preserving our neutral relations on the boundary between us and Texas, and keeping in check the Indians in that quarter, will be maintained so long as circumstances may require.

For several years angry contentions have grown out of the disposition directed by law to be made of the mineral lands held by the Government in several of the States. The Government is constituted the landlord, and the citizens of the States wherein lie the lands are its tenants. The relation is an unwise one; and it would be much more conducive to the public interest that a sale of the lands should be made, than that they should remain in their present condition. The supply of the ore would be more abundantly and certainly furnished when to be drawn from the enterprise and the industry of the proprietor, than under the present system.

The recommendations of the Secretary in regard to the improvements of the Western waters, and certain prominent harbors on the lakes, merit, and I doubt not will receive, your serious attention. The great importance of these subjects to the prosperity of the extensive region referred to, and the security of the whole country in time of war, cannot escape observation. The losses of life and property which annually occur in the navigation of the Mississippi alone, because of the dangerous obstructions in the river, make a loud demand upon Congress for the adoption of efficient measures for their removal.

The report of the Secretary of the Navy will bring you acquainted with that important branch of the public defences. Considering the already vast and daily increasing commerce of the country, apart from the exposure to hostile inroad of an extended seaboard, all that relates to the navy is calculated to excite particular attention. Whatever tends to add to its efficiency, without entailing unnecessary charges upon the treasury, is well worthy of your serious consideration. It will be seen, that while an appropriation exceeding by more than a million the appropriations of the present year, is asked by the Secretary, yet that, in this sum, is proposed to be included $400,000 for the purchase of clothing, which, when once expended, will be annually reimbursed by the sale of the clothes, and will thus constitute a perpetual fund, without any new appropriation to the same object. To this may also be added $50,000 asked to cover the arrearages of past years, and $250,000 in order to maintain a competent squadron on the coast of Africa; all of which, when deducted, will reduce the expenditures nearly within the limits of those of the current year. While, however, the expenditures will thus remain very nearly the same as of the antecedent year, it is proposed to add greatly to the operations of the marine, and, in lieu of only twenty-five ships in commission, and but little in the way of building, to keep, with the same expenditure, forty-one vessels afloat, and to build twelve ships of a small class.

A strict system of accountability is established, and great pains are taken to insure industry, fidelity, and economy in every department of duty. Experiments have been instituted to test the quality of various materials, (particularly copper, iron, and coal,) so as to prevent fraud and imposition.

It will appear by the report of the Postmaster General, that the great point which, for several years, has been so much desired, has, during the current year, been fully accomplished. The expenditures of the department for the current year have been brought within its income, without lessening its general usefulness. There has been an increase of revenue equal to $166,000 for the year 1842 over that of 1841, without, as it is believed, any addition having been made to the number of letters and newspapers transmitted through the mails. The Post Office laws have been honestly administered, and fidelity has been observed in accounting for, and paying over by the subordinates of the department, the moneys which have been received. For the details of the service, I refer you to the report.

I flatter myself that the exhibition thus made of the condition of the public administration will serve to convince you that every proper attention has been paid to the interests of the country by those who have been called to the heads of the different departments. The reduction in the annual expenditures of the Government already accomplished, furnishes a sure evidence that economy in the application of the public moneys is regarded as a paramount duty.
